Oral Answers to Questions

SOCIAL SECURITY

Students

1. Mr. Hain: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to reform the benefits available to students.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Alistair Burt): Income support, housing benefit and, from next April, council tax benefit are available to particularly vulnerable students such as lone parents and those who are disabled. However, in general it is the educational maintenance system which is designed to provide support for students and we have no plans to change this.

Mr. Hain: Is the Minister aware that hundreds of students in Wales are living in abject poverty and that others are graduating with debts of more than £3,000? Their parents are being hit, too. One of my constituents lost almost £50 a week in child benefit, income support and single parent benefit. Why do the Government not restore the vacation hardship allowance, housing benefit entitlement and income support entitlement to students —or do they want all students to be yuppies?

Mr. Burt: I note the hon. Gentleman's concern. The changes in benefit did not take place in isolation, but at a time when the total support for students was increased by £100 million. There is no evidence of any deterrent effect on students. Full-time and part-time student numbers have risen throughout the past decade; since the change in benefits and student loans, they have increased by 20 per cent.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Would my hon. Friend be interested to know that at the last count at my university there were 10 applicants for every place available? The students there work very well and those eligible have taken out student loans. The system is now working smoothly. We should like the hardship fund to be a little larger, but that is all.

Mr. Burt: My hon. Friend is right. The total package of support available for students has increased since 1988-89, when the changes in the benefit system took place. I meant what I said about the fact that there has been no deterrent to students going to university. That is evidence that this country provides generously for its students. Some heed should sometimes be paid to those who are paying for the system as well as to those claiming on it.

Mr. Bradley: It is clear that the Minister has no understanding of the financial hardship inflicted on students by Government policies. Has he read the survey undertaken by the north-western students unions, which showed that 61 per cent. of students were in debt, of whom 15 per cent. had debts of more than £500 and 6 per cent. had debts of more than £1,000? The survey showed that the main reason for the debts was the withdrawal of the right to housing benefit and the withdrawal of the right to claim income support during the vacation, when there are no jobs for students to take up. Will the Minister immediately review the financial support for students, especially for students from low-income families, for those with children, and for mature students, so that they do not fall into further debt and hardship inflicted on them by the Government?

Mr. Burt: It is sometimes suggested by the Opposition that all students used to claim benefit. That is just not true. Only a minority of students ever claimed benefit. Some 15 per cent. used to claim housing benefit during term time and only 2 per cent. claimed it in the vacation. Some 20 per cent. claimed income support during the summer. When the student loans were introduced, a calculation was done of the average amount of benefit that students took. At the time, the figure was about £327. The top-up loan was set at £420, so on average more money went to students than they had ever claimed in benefit. These matters are constantly kept under review. The evidence in this country compared with the evidence in many other countries in the western, developed world is that we have a generous system for our students. That should be appreciated by students. Society does not mind paying, but it is nice to hear about society for a change instead of always about those who are receiving the benefit.

Mobility Allowance

3. Mrs. Chaplin: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people received mobility allowance in 1979; and how many receive it currently.

The Minister for Social Security and Disabled People (Mr. Nicholas Scott): In 1979, 95,000 people received mobility allowance. By 1992, this figure had risen to 660,000—nearly a sevenfold increase. The introduction of disability living allowance will extend help with mobility costs even further.

Mrs. Chaplin: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the introduction of the lower rate of the mobility component has helped enormously those people who can work but who, because they have learning difficulties, have difficulty in getting about? Does that not further our aim of providing them with fulfilled lives in the community?

Mr. Scott: I believe that the lower rates of disability living allowance, both for mobility and care, have been an immense success. Some 170,000 awards have already been made.

Mr. Alfred Morris: The Minister has been very frank about the hardship inflicted on disabled people by the chaos in administering the mobility allowance and other disability allowances. As the author of the mobility allowance—the first of its kind in the world and the introduction of which was strongly opposed by many Conservative Members—may I press the Minister to tell us from his briefing folder in how many cases, in each of the past seven months, claims from entitled applicants were not processed before they died? In particular, does the Minister recall the very disturbing case of my late constituent Mr. Ken Vince?

Mr. Scott: I remember the right hon. Gentleman mentioning that case at the last Social Security Question Time. I cannot give the right hon. Gentleman the figure for the number of people who have been in that particularly sad situation, but the Benefits Agency has been increasing its performance steadily in dealing with claims for disability living allowance and attendance allowance. The figure of 95,000 that I mentioned in my original reply was achieved for mobility allowance after four years' phasing in. We have now reached six times that number in one year.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: Is not one of the advantages of the way in which the matter has been handled the fact that the disability living allowance has not had to be phased in, as was the case with the mobility allowance about which much has just been said? Nevertheless, it has been quite a load. Will my right hon. Friend assure us that all the applications now being handled will be properly backdated?

Mr. Scott: I can certainly give my hon. Friend that assurance. As a result of the work of the Benefits Agency, any claim received now or in the future should be dealt with within the targets announced by the Benefits Agency.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Will the Minister not be too self-satisfied, as several of my constituents have been waiting well over a year for their cases to be processed? In some cases, I have had to wait three months for a reply from the Benefits Agency. Will the Minister examine the matter closely and provide new resources to ensure that claims for mobility allowance and attendance allowance are processed quickly, speedily, and with sympathy and compassion?

Mr. Scott: The hon. Gentleman will already have heard me express my regret at the distress caused during the introduction of the benefit. I still believe with all my heart that it was right to go ahead and introduce the benefit without the phasing that the Labour Government found necessary. We are now at the point where any new claims will be dealt with within the targets that the Benefits Agency has been set. I shall be meeting the chief executive of the Benefits Agency tomorrow to discuss those matters further.

Water Charges

4. Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the total amount paid out by his Department's regional offices direct to water companies on behalf of claimants for the last year for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Burt: In the year ending November 1992, over £27 million was paid to water companies by the Benefits Agency on behalf of claimants. This represents a great deal of welcome protection for many people who might otherwise have faced the risk of disconnection of water supplies.

Mr. Pawsey: I thank my hon. Friend for that helpful and welcome reply. Can he confirm that direct payments will be made to water companies in precisely the same way as they are paid to the electricity and gas companies? Will he further confirm that all Department of Social Security area offices are empowered to do that? Can he say whether water has equal priority with gas and electricity in the direct payments list?

Mr. Burt: I can confirm that arrangements for the deduction of direct payments for water are applicable nationwide and are similar for water as they would be for fuel. The latest figures show that there were about 160,000 deductions as at November 1992, which is about 3 per cent. of all income support claimants. The figures for my hon. Friend's constituency are about comparable. Although for historical reasons water ranks behind fuel in terms of priority, there is no evidence to suggest that that is responsible for any refusal to make deductions. As the number of deductions shows, the system works.

Mrs. Mahon: Since the companies were privatised, the cost of water has risen astronomically. Is the Minister aware that that represents a tax on pensioners and on people with low incomes and does the image of politicians no good whatever when his hon. Friends are receiving large sums of money as consultants to the privatised industries? Is that not bordering on corruption and taxing the poor?

Mr. Burt: The hon. Lady's substantive point was about the adequacy of income support and the way in which payments are paid to water companies. Since water companies took on more responsibilities for collecting debts from lower-income people, it has been made clear by the Office of Water Services, for one, that the companies could develop better methods—frequent payment methods—to collect money from lower-income people. The fuel companies have done this rather more successfully than the water companies. We urge the water companies to look carefully at their low-income customers to try to make sure that they do not get into debt.

Pensioners' Incomes

5. Mr. Booth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the trend in pensioners' real income since 1979.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Miss Ann Widdecombe): The trend in pensioners' income in real terms between 1979 and 1988 has been upwards.

Mr. Booth: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is to be welcomed that even the chairman of Pensioners Voice recently said that our public sector provision compares well with that provided in Europe? Does my hon. Friend welcome the fact that real income from savings has more than doubled since 1979—it actually fell by 16 per cent. between 1974 and 1979—and that Opposition Members will never ever understand that?

Miss Widdecombe: I am pleased to confirm both points. Pensioners' incomes from all sources have increased by about a third in real terms since 1979, which is a tribute to our policies for looking after pensioners. In contrast with what happened under Labour, when income from all sources rose less year by year, we have a proud record indeed in comparison with the rest of Europe. It is confirmed by independent actuaries that for those on low earnings—that is, half average earnings—we come out among the best countries in Europe.

Mr. Winnick: Why cannot complacent Ministers understand that literally millions of pensioners—single and married—in this country are living in poverty or near poverty? Even in the reply that I received from the hon. Lady herself last week, it was admitted that 61 per cent. of single pensioners have an income of less than £5,000 a year. How many Ministers would like to try to live on the incomes that many pensioners in our constituencies are forced to live on? How would they like to live in such poverty?

Miss Widdecombe: It is precisely because we are concerned for those who depend entirely or almost entirely on the state pension that, for the past three years, we have directed immense extra resources towards raising pensioner premium and income support so that we can bring many more pensioners into the safety net. When they come into that safety net on income support, with up to 100 per cent. of rent, maximum local taxation rebate and access to cold weather payments, the value of the state pension can sometimes double just through that measure alone.

Benefit Expenditure

6. Mr. Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the total expenditure on social security benefits in 1979, 1983, 1987 and 1992, at constant prices.

The Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Peter Lilley): At 1992-93 prices, expenditure for the years in question was £47·1 billion, £57·7 billion, £68·4 billion and £71·6 billion respectively. Benefit expenditure between 1979 and 1992 increased by 52 per cent. in real terms.

Mr. Knox: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the figures show the Government's commitment to improving the position of the less well-off members of society? Does he also accept, however, that the lot of the less well off provides no grounds for complacency?

Mr. Lilley: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. That is why in this year's public expenditure round I announced not just that we had kept our pledges to uprate all benefits, particularly those for the elderly and for families, and that we had protected those most affected by the recession from its effects, but that we could channel an extra £1 billion of resources to those in the greatest need. I am sure that my hon. Friend, like all Conservative Members, welcomes that.

Mr. Frank Field: As the Government's own figures show that under the Government's stewardship the number of people on half average earnings has risen from 5 million to a staggering 12 million, will the Secretary of State tell the House whether his Department has any working parties—formal or informal—to look at ways of spending the £80 billion budget more effectively?

Mr. Lilley: That is the substance of all that we do. Our priority is to ensure that the money spent on social security is well focused on those in need with a genuine entitlement. I know that the hon. Gentleman has contributed to that process. We seek to achieve those ends, and always will. We are waiting to discover the Opposition's intention. Apparently, they have had to commission a search for policies and principles on the issue.

Mr. Clappison: Does my right hon. Friend agree that in considering the value of benefits one must also take account of the rate of inflation, as benefit recipients under the last Labour Government knew only too well when in one year the level of benefits was eroded by 25 per cent. as a result of inflation?

Mr. Lilley: My hon. Friend makes an important point. Anyone who is a friend of inflation is an enemy of the poor. The Labour party always has been, still is and always will be a friend of inflation.

Mr. Kirkwood: Notwithstanding the global increases in the social security budget in recent years, does the Secretary of State share my concern that the take-up of those benefits cannot be objectively analysed as there was a different system before 1988? Is it not a matter of concern that the statistical review recently published by the Department could not reach conclusions on take-up, but concluded—among other things—that 1·3 million people who were entitled to social security income support payments did not receive them?

Mr. Lilley: The hon. Member is right: take-up is important. If we are to get the policy on take-up right, it is important to be able to measure it. That is why I announced some time ago the introduction of a new survey to provide us with better and targeted information on household income—in place of the family expenditure survey used in the past, which was geared to establishing expenditure and not income. We shall be in a better position in future to measure income. In the meantime, we can take comfort from the fact that the measures suggested that more than 90 per cent. of benefit money is claimed by those entitled to it. By and large, those who do not take up their benefits tend to be those with the lowest entitlement in cash terms.

Mr. Dewar: The Secretary of State has been talking about the figures with some complacency, but has not the total expenditure risen because of the frightening increase in the number of people forced to claim benefit? What possible satisfaction can be taken from the fact that 4·3 million people were dependent on supplementary benefit inn 1979 but that by 1991 7·7 million were relying on income support? Shamefully, the latest figure included 2·4 million children. Is that not the bitter harvest of the Government's economic failure? Would not the best way to take the strain off the DSS benefit budget and help those on income support be to tackle the problems of unemployment with considerably more energy and imagination than the Government have shown?

Mr. Lilley: The hon. Member implicitly uses as a measure of poverty the amount of help given to those in need. Such an attitude was recently debunked by the Select Committee, which showed that if we take the number receiving benefit, as the levels of benefits have risen, the number of those on that level of income and below has increased. But the number on incomes below the supplementary benefit that the last Labour Government thought was sufficient has fallen. We must recognise that, through the social security system, the people of this country make a considerable contribution to the needy, the elderly and the sick. The average contribution from every working person every working day through the social security system is £10—a considerable sum, which shows the generosity of the British people as channelled by this Government.

Mr. John Marshall: Does my right hon. Friend agree that one of the more effective ways of helping poorer families even more would be taxing child benefit and using part of the proceeds to increase family credit?

Mr. Lilley: Logically, that is one of the measures which would achieve that end. As my hon. Friend will know, it has been looked at by a number of Ministers. It is essentially a matter for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor and for the Financial Secretary—the latter being a post which I held. It would be much more difficult to do in a world of independent taxation than it might have been in the past when man and wife were not independently taxed.

State Pension

7. Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations during the last six months he has received from pensioners' organisations about the level of the basic state pension; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: My ministerial colleagues and I receive many representations from pensioners' organisations. During the past six months my colleagues and I have met seven delegations to discuss issues of general concern to pensioners, many of which included the level of basic state pension.

Mr. Wigley: Does the Minister accept that those delegations and the very large number of representations that she and her colleagues have received are a sign of the difficulties that people on basic state pensions with no other income face in coping with fixed costs and standing charges—fuel costs, water costs, television licences and so on? Can the Government not find more resources to give greater priority to those with no income besides the basic state pension, especially single pensioners, who are suffering so much?

Miss Widdecombe: If a pensioner has nothing besides the basic state pension and only minimal savings, that pensioner is entitled to income support, with all the fringe benefits that I enumerated earlier. What I do hear when pensioners' organisations come to see me is that they value the fact that their savings are now safe and not being wiped out by the sort of inflation that occurred in the 1970s under Labour. They tell me that they are proud of the fact that we maintain one of the best safety nets in Europe and that we give extra help, particularly to the less well-off pensioners. Although there are obviously still improvements that they want, I never hear from them any suggestion that they would like to return to the dark days of the 1970s and the Labour Government.

Mrs. Roe: Does my hon. Friend agree that since 1989 £700 million in extra help has been made available to the poorer pensioners, and that that is impressive evidence that the Government are fully committed to providing assistance to the most needy pensioners? Will she confirm that the only threat of means-testing the basic pension has come from the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith)?

Miss Widdecombe: Yes, indeed. Not only has that been the only source from which the threat has come, but it is combined with a threat to private occupational pensions and personal pensions. Those threats, taken in conjunction, would mean a severe diminution of pensioners' overall incomes.

On the subject of pensioners' incomes, perhaps one of the most telling points that my hon. Friend might like to consider is the considerable rise in the percentage of pensioner households owning large durable goods. Since 1979, the number owning a telephone has increased by 37 per cent., the number with central heating has risen by 24 per cent., and so on. That is a clear sign that pensioner households are sharing in the prosperity of the nation—as is the fact that fewer pensioners are in the bottom decile of income distribution and that half of all pensioners are now in the top half of income distribution.

Mrs. Golding: As the Minister well knows, the Labour party has no plans for means testing. That is a scare being put out by the Government, and we frequently deny it. Is the Minister aware that Pensioners Voice is still concerned that the basic pension is now below subsistence level as defined by the level of income support? That causes great distress to those who have retired on small occupational pensions which make them just ineligible for the additional benefit of income support. What plans, if any, do the Government have to do anything about this poverty trap faced by people on small occupational pensions?

Miss Widdecombe: In terms of the first part of the hon. Lady's remarks, she should ask her right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition to inform the Commission on Social Justice that it should no longer consider the future of universal benefits. When we hear that the right hon. and learned Gentleman has issued that guidance, perhaps we will believe the hon. Lady. She asked about people who are managing on small occupational pensions. Not only do nearly 70 per cent. of those retiring have occupational pensions, but the average value is now nearly on a par with the state pension. We shall continue to encourage the occupational pension sector so that the value of those pensions continues to grow and forms a major part of retirement income.

Fraud

9. Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what action his Department is taking to reduce fraud.

Mr. Lilley: I am consulting local authority associations about the new initiative to combat housing benefit and council tax benefit fraud. The Benefits Agency is deploying more specially trained investigators and making greater use of new technology to weed out false claims. I am allocating an additional £10 million a year of resources to fight fraud.

Mr. Burns: Does my right hon. Friend accept that the vast majority of state benefit recipients are not welfare scroungers and are not seeking fraudulently to abuse the system? Does he also agree that every £1 lost means that there is less money for those in genuine need? Does he accept that the Government have a moral commitment to track down all fraud as efficiently as possible to ensure that the maximum amount goes to those that the system is designed to help—the people who are most in need?

Mr. Lilley: I wholeheartedly agree with my hon. Friend. The vast majority of social security claimants are as honest as the day is long. There is no similarity at all between the ordinary, honest, genuine claimant and the fraudster. It is the Labour party which identifies the two when it criticises any attack on fraud as an attack on the poor. We believe that an attack on fraud is right because every £1 wasted on fraud means that £1 less is available to those who are in real need.

Mr. Rooney: Is the Secretary of State aware that the report of non-receipt of a Giro is now considered fraudulent and that benefit claimants have to wait between seven and 11 weeks for replacement? Consequently, they approach the DSS for a crisis loan and single people are offered £2 a day. What does he think about that?

Mr. Lilley: It is not automatically assumed that anyone in that position is a fraudster, but we have to tackle the problem of false claims. About £230 million worth of orders of the type about which the hon. Gentleman speaks are reported missing every year and about £85 million worth of them are subsequently claimed. By working closely with the Post Office, we are trying to improve our work to prevent the illegal encashment of such orders. That must be for the benefit, and in the interests, of most people. We also want to stop theft, which is often wholesale when the encashment is organised not by ordinary claimants but by criminal gangs. We want to stop that and we have had some success in doing so.

Long-term Sick and Disabled People

11. Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the most recent figure for the increase in spending on benefits for long-term sick and disabled people since 1979.

Mr. Scott: Spending on benefits for long-term sick and disabled people for 1992-93 is £13·7 billion—an increase of £8·7 billion or 173 per cent. in real terms over spending in 1978-79.

Mr. Evans: I am delighted with those figures, as will be those who receive the benefits. Will my right hon. Friend confirm that extra resources have been made available for the telephone service for those who are claiming disability living allowance and wish to telephone, and for the hotline telephone service made available to Members of Parliament? Will he further confirm that those who have awards payments made to them late will have them fully backdated?

Mr. Scott: I can confirm the last point. Members of Parliament on both sides of the House have complimented those who have been running the hotline for Members of Parliament on the efforts that they have put into speedily resolving some of the difficult cases with which they have been presented. The benefits inquiry line has dealt with 720,000 calls, 85 per cent. of which are getting through the first time that people call. Minicom and tape facilities are also available to speed up the preparation of application forms and the dealing with claims.

Mr. Skinner: Is not the truth of the matter that hundreds and thousands of people have claimed disability benefit in almost every constituency in Britain but have not been able to get their benefits because the computer is stuck? Is it not remarkable that the computer that the Inland Revenue uses always works, so it can get its money quickly? However, with the computer that pays out benefits, people have been waiting for two years for their benefits to be paid out. Is it not a scandal that the Government have a system that operates on behalf of those whom it likes and a hotline that works for the Chancellor of the Exchequer and all those others who get payment for libel cases when nobody else can get one?

Mr. Scott: The hon. Gentleman performs to form. I do not know whether he was here earlier when I reminded the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr.

Morris) that his party had to phase in mobility allowance while we have been able to do it at a stroke. Some 710,000 claims for disability living allowance have been dealt with, which is an improvement of 71 per cent. over last year's performance of attendance allowance and mobility allowance. Immense efforts have been made by the staff of the Benefits Agency and Ministers to ensure that people get the benefits to which they are entitled under the Government.

Social Fund

12. Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to change the balance between grants and loans in the operation of the social fund.

Mr. Scott: The social fund discretionary budget for 1993-94 will be around £340 million, an increase of over 12 per cent. over April 1992. No final decision has yet been made on the split between grants and loans.

I am also pleased to announce, in addition to the increase of £8 million announced by my right hon. Friend on 2 November, that I have today authorised the allocation of a further £7 million to the discretionary social fund loans budget for this year. Details of individual district allocations will be placed in the Library shortly.

Ms. Quin: Is the Minister able to give us the proportion of grant applications that is successful? Will he accept that, at a time of rocketing unemployment and when people are coming back into the community under community care schemes, the pressure on grants is such that only the most needy of cases can be met? Furthermore, at a time of increasing personal indebtedness, does it not make much more sense to give priority to grants rather than loans?

Mr. Scott: We have not neglected the grants aspect, because we increased allocations for grants by 30 per cent. between April 1991 and April 1992. We shall be looking carefully at grants when we come to decide the split of the discretionary budget for the coming year. The success of the loans system has meant that many more people have been helped as a result of the recycling of loan money and that is the primary reason for the new allocation that I announced today.

Mr. Dickens: Does my right hon. Friend agree that not only is there a benefit from recycling money and thereby helping many more people, but that we were confronted with rackets and frauds set up by people who opened what they called antique shops but which were really house clearing shops? Those people gave out shopping lists of 105 or more items that one could get from social security. Someone had to have the common sense to stop those rackets, and we have done so by ensuring that people make proper applications, and prove their need. They are then given help and they slowly repay the loans so that the money can help someone else. The taxpayers are not a soft touch.

Mr. Scott: I understand my hon. Friend's strength of feeling on the matter. I do not agree with every word that he uttered, but I think that we all know that the old single payments scheme was entirely out of any sort of financial control and that it was subject to widespread abuse in various parts of the country. It was right to bring the scheme under proper budgetary control, which the social fund has achieved. The magic of the recycling of loans has enabled many more people to be helped than we were able to help before.

Disability Living Allowance

13. Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received regarding delays in dealing with disability living allowance cases.

Mr. Scott: I have received many representations about delays in dealing with disability living allowance claims. I have already expressed my personal regret that disabled people have not received the standard of service that they are entitled to expect. The Benefits Agency took urgent action to deal with the problem and it has now made around 300,000 new awards.

Mr. Pike: I am sure that everyone will be glad that the Minister has expressed his personal regret that, as a result of the changeover, many people had to wait an unacceptable time to have their allowances dealt with. It should never have been necessary to have a hotline to enable Members to expedite cases.

Is the Minister able to assure us that when we have the standard format this year we shall not have the delays that were so common in the payment of attendance and mobility allowances? Will he confirm that the aim is to handle these matters much more quickly?

Mr. Scott: I said in answer to an earlier question that any new claims will be dealt with within the targets that the Benefits Agency has set. We anticipate that new targets will shortly be set for the coming year. We are determined to keep to those targets and ensure—as I said in response to an earlier question—that claimants get the benefits to which they are entitled on time.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Racial Violence

30. Mr. Winnick: To ask the Attorney-General what recent representations he has received on prosecutions relating to racial violence.

The Attorney-General (Sir Nicholas Lyell): The most recent representations that I have received were questions asked by the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Walker). I refer the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) to the answers given by the Solicitor-General on 7 December 1992 at columns 587-88.

Mr. Winnick: Is there not some conflict at least between existing legislation on incitement to race hatred and the way in which various organisations—fascist in the main—do their utmost in certain parts of the country to promote race hatred? Is the Attorney-General taking all that on board?

The Attorney-General: The Crown prosecution service and the police are certainly astute respectively to investigate and, where the evidence is available, to prosecute incitement to racial hatred. I read carefully the speech that the hon. Gentleman made when introducing his ten-minute Bill. Racial motive is expressly a factor to be considered by the prosecution under the "Code for Crown Prosecutors". Is is also a factor which judges can and will take into account when sentencing. To make it an added and separate ingredient for an offence would be likely to make it more difficult to obtain convictions and could, therefore, hamper its proper consideration when it came to sentencing.

Police Officers (Criminal Misconduct)

31. Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Attorney-General how many cases involving allegations of criminal misconduct against police officers were considered by his Department in each of the last three years; and how many of these resulted in prosecutions being brought.

The Attorney-General: The number of such cases referred to Crown prosecution service headquarters in the three years to 1992 were respectively 4,011, 4,012 and 3,696. Proceedings were instituted in 1990 in 187 cases, in 1991 in 186, and to date 108 in respect of 1992.

Mr. Raynsford: Does the Attorney-General accept that the discrepancy between the number of referrals and the number of prosecutions may possibly give cause for concern? Will he comment on the impact of the procedure whereby an 80 per cent. prospect of success is normally required by the CPS in such instances, whereas a lower margin of about 50 per cent. would be required in cases involving allegations against other members of the public?

The Attorney-General: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman's last evaluation is correct. There are two important points to bear in mind. First, under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, the police are required to report all cases involving police officers, other than minor motoring offences. Consequently, a large number of such cases are reported to the Crown prosecution service headquarters, many of which would never be reported if they involved ordinary citizens. Therefore, the weeding out is done from a much wider band.

Secondly, it is important to remember that the same standard of proof applies to all prosecutions. A factor might arise that would cast sufficient doubt on the reliability of evidence to render a conviction unsafe, without necessarily providing sufficient reliable evidence to justify the prosecution and conviction of someone else.

Mr. Hawkins: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that concern about the rises in the number and the type of offences committed by people other than police officers are the matters which especially concern members of the public? In their minds, it is quite inappropriate that Labour Members should concentrate almost exclusively on allegations about police officers.

The Attorney-General: The point is that whoever is involved, the prosecution process must be—and it is—carried out without fear or favour, affection or ill-will. The wider questions to which my hon. Friend rightly referred are being carefully considered by the royal commission.

Mr. John Morris: Will the Attorney-General underline the assurance that I think he has given to the House, which is that the same standards prevail in deciding whether to prosecute a police officer, and that the chances of conviction are considered in exactly the same way as for any other citizen?

The Attorney-General: I am grateful to the right hon. and learned Gentleman for giving me the opportunity to confirm that there is no difference in the standard applied, whether it be to a police officer or to any other member of the public.

Crown Prosecution Service

32. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Attorney-General if he will make a statement about the staffing of the Crown prosecution service.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Derek Spencer): In the last year, recruitment in the Crown prosecution service has resulted in an extra 202 lawyers in post, bringing the total complement to 2,141. The number of administrative staff in post is 4,225.

Mr. Marshall: Does my hon. and learned Friend accept that, welcome though those increases are, there are still cases that take 18 months or two years for the court finally to determine the guilt or innocence of an accused person? Such delay is the cause of great financial, physical and psychological hardship. Will my hon. and learned Friend try to reduce the delays to a minimum?

The Solicitor-General: The problem is being tackled on two fronts—first, by increased staff and, secondly, by increased financial resources. Over the past three years, the number of lawyers in post in the Crown prosecution service has risen by 694. In the year 1991-92, expenditure was £226 million, up 13·8 per cent. on the previous year. In the year 1992-93, it is estimated that expenditure will be £263 million, an increase on the previous year of 16·4 per cent. If we add together those two increases over two years, that makes an increase of more than 30 per cent.

In addition, the national operation practice setting out improved standards of service, which the CPS provides to others in the criminal justice system, will be in operation by the summer of this year. My hon. Friend may be interested to know that last week Judge Denison, at the Central Criminal Court, observed that the backlog of cases had sunk from 1,260 to 400.

Mr. Flynn: Will the Solicitor-General direct the attention of the Crown prosecution service to a recent television programme on HTV Wales that alleged that the firm of Ring and Brymer has been involved in fraud in my constituency? As the parent company of that firm contributed £86,000 to the Conservative party this year, is not it a serious matter that the Conservative party might be living on the proceeds of social security fraud and that some members of the Government might have their legal aid financed by the proceeds of fraud?

The Solicitor-General: If the hon. Gentleman has any evidence of a criminal offence, he is duty bound as a citizen to put it before the police. The police will then investigate and the Crown prosecution service will decide whether to bring proceedings. It will make that decision in just the same way as it does in every other case, following the rules laid down in the "Code for Crown Prosecutors".

Prosecution Policy

33. Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on prosecution policy.

The Solicitor-General: The principles governing the prosecution policy of the Crown prosecution service are set out in the "Code for Crown Prosecutors", which is issued under section 10 of the Prosecution of Offences Act 1985. A copy of the code is in the Library.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: What is the policy on prosecuting for phone tapping, particularly in the light of Camillagate, where it seems likely that a fixed telephone in a private house was tapped by an individual phone tapper? Does not that appear to constitute an offence? Why has not the DPP asked the police to investigate, to see whether it is possible to establish who was that person?

Mr. Cryer: They know that it was MI5 or GCHQ.

The Solicitor-General: The hon. Gentleman will be familiar with the observations of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary over the weekend. He said that there is absolutely no evidence that the security services were involved. To answer the hon. Gentleman's question directly, if there is prima facie evidence that a criminal offence has been committed, it will be dealt with in exactly the same way as all other cases; that is, if there is evidence of an offence that affords a reasonable prospect of conviction and if it is in the public interest to institute proceedings.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Yugoslavia

40. Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the latest report he has received on the arrangements for delivering relief to former Yugoslavia.

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Douglas Hurd): The area of greatest need is Bosnia and we are concentrating our effort there. We estimate that about two thirds of the needy there are getting the essential supplies that they need, but, in Sarajevo and other besieged enclaves in eastern Bosnia, increased fighting and the winter have greatly increased the difficulties faced by all those delivering relief supplies. Since they were first deployed, British troops have, up to 12 January, escorted about 150 relief convoys, which have carried into Bosnia a total of about 12,000 tonnes of relief supplies. British civilian lorries delivered 3,342 tonnes of supplies into Sarajevo during December alone—just over half of the supplies reaching that city.

Mr. Bowis: Of course we congratulate British aid workers and service men on their achievements in Bosnia, but does my right hon. Friend agree that they went in because of Serbian aggression, yet the young British soldier who was killed the other day died not from Serbian bullets but from bullets fired between Muslim and Croatian forces? Will my right hon. Friend ensure that British forces do not become part of a four-way civil war and, to that end, that United Nations figures, which are released locally on a daily basis, on the locations from which guns are firing at Sarajevo and at British aid workers and service men are published, so that the British public can be aware of them?

Mr. Hurd: It is often extremely difficult, particularly in Sarajevo, to establish who is firing and for what reason. However, I entirely agree with my hon. Friend that where such information is reasonably reliable, it should be made available so that the public can understand the sheer complexity of the situation and the reason why we do not intend to allow British troops to become involved in civil fighting. Of course one can imagine circumstances in which the risks are so great that we will have to pull them out—but in that case, many more people would die.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Is the Secretary of State aware that we in Cheshire are very proud of our regiment's involvement in helping those most in need? However, that does not mean that it is understood why a regiment that is being badly treated in the reorganisation should be at the sharp end. There is also the question whether there is the same understanding by the Foreign Office of the need to protect British soldiers if the situation becomes even more dangerous. It would be wrong to allow British citizens to be caught in a web that is not of their own making, and which they cannot affect, without the right to defend themselves, just because the British Government are not prepared to accept that the situation has now gone beyond their control.

Mr. Hurd: Of course British citizens have the right to defend themselves: that is essential. I do not think that any hon. Member disagrees with that, doubts the value of the work that the Cheshires are doing or questions the possibility of circumstances in which it might be too risky to ask them to continue that work. Meanwhile, as the hon. Lady has said, they are doing an excellent job. I hope that the details—the facts and figures—of that job, and the job done by the Overseas Development Administration's British civil workers, will become more widely known.

Lady Olga Maitland: Are medical supplies now being included in the aid of convoys? Will my right hon. Friend ensure that there is no repetition of the occasion on which convoys arrived at Srebrenica without a single aspirin? I asked the same question before Christmas, but received an unsatisfactory reply; perhaps my right hon. Friend now has a clearer picture of what is going on.

Mr. Hurd: As I understand it, medicines have always formed a major part of the supplies, especially British medicines. We have supplied a high proportion of the medicines that have gone into Bosnia in recent months. I shall look into the point that my hon. Friend has raised about a specific convoy, and let her know the details.

Mr. Meacher: Will the Foreign Secretary acknowledge that aid supplies to Yugoslavia will constitute a mere stop-gap cosmetic until the consequences of the war are confronted? Will the Government insist that sanctions are maintained until the areas stolen by ethnic cleansing are demilitarised, and until at least a majority of the 2·5 million refugees are permitted to return home in safety?

What action—along the lines of the action taken by the French—does the Foreign Secretary propose to stop the systematic rape of thousands of Muslim women in Bosnian prison camps? Does he accept that the war will not end until the Serbs accept that Bosnian-Muslim resistance—or, at least, international intervention and the threat of such intervention—has reached such a point that it is no longer in their interests to fight on? What action does the right hon. Gentleman propose to make that threat a real one?

Mr. Hurd: Relief supplies are not a cosmetic to people living in villages or towns, cut off for many months, who depend on those supplies if they and their children are to be alive in two or three weeks' time. I do not know what the hon. Gentleman is talking about. If he means that the supplies are not enough, of course he is entirely right.

As for the allegations of mass rape, it was the present Government, when they held the EC presidency, who asked Anne Warburton, the head of a Cambridge college, to lead a mission to the area. The accomplishment of that mission put beyond contradiction the fact that those atrocities had occurred. They are no longer allegations; they are fact. That is why we agreed last week to take the initiative in setting up a criminal court—probably through the Security Council—to remind the perpetrators of such atrocities that they are personally responsible, whatever orders they may have received. There is no difference between us and the French in that regard.

The hon. Gentleman was right in his other two points. It is essential to maintain and, indeed, to intensify the pressure of sanctions, particularly at a time when there are signs that they are having some effect. Ultimately, however, these horrors will be brought to an end by a peace settlement within the framework that David Owen and Cyrus Vance are attempting to negotiate.

Africa (EC Aid)

41. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on joint EC aid initiatives in relation to Africa.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Mark Lennox-Boyd): The United Kingdom is contributing £1·3 billion over five years to the European development fund, over 90 per cent. of which goes to Africa. In addition, there are substantial European programmes of food aid and humanitarian relief.

Mr. Kirkwood: I warmly welcome the recent pledging of 680,000 tonnes of EC food aid under the food aid programme for Africa. Does the Minister accept, however, that real problems are involved in the delivery of that vital food? Will he consider setting up an EC-sponsored Africa special recovery plan to upgrade the logistics, transport and distribution facilities available on the ground, so that the aid can reach those who need it?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The hon. Gentleman is right about the difficulty of delivery, but I am afraid that it cannot be achieved in the way that he suggests. There has been some help in Somalia for relief and rehabilitation purposes by means of unutilised funds, but we cannot extend the use of unutilised funds in the way that has been previously suggested by the hon. Gentleman, because the Community works on commitments, not on disbursements. That system is different from the British system.

Sir John Stanley: Can my hon. Friend give the House an assurance that the British Government's aid effort to Somalia will be sustained for as long as famine conditions persist in that country?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Yes, I can confirm that the United Kingdom has a continuing programme of relief for Somalia. We are the world's third largest bilateral donor to the relief effort in Somalia. I have no doubt that we shall continue to give relief generously.

Flooding (Perthshire)

3.30 pm

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross) (by private notice): To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about the flooding in Perthshire.

The Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Sir Hector Monro): The Government fully appreciate the seriousness of the flooding, and have every sympathy for those who have been affected. The flooding has been caused by the combination of heavy rainfall and a rapid thaw of earlier snow. Large areas of land have been inundated and many properties have been flooded, requiring temporary evacuation of occupants.

The response to the emergency is of course primarily a matter for the local authorities, and they and the emergency services have responded well and are continuing to provide assistance. However, my right hon. Friend and I are keeping in close touch with the developing situation.

Scottish Office officials have been in regular contact with the emergency control centre in Perth and are at the ready to provide what assistance they can in response to requests from the local authority. Scottish Office officials are also in the area to conduct preliminary inspections, but the full damage will not be apparent for some days until the flood waters recede. In addition, the Royal Navy, the Army and the Royal Air Force have given extremely valuable support.

I am also pleased to announce the Government's decision to make special financial assistance available under the Bellwin scheme to the local authorities affected in the Tayside area.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: I am obliged to my hon. Friend for that statement. May I add my praise to all those—the Army, the Royal Navy and the Royal Air Force, the district authorities, Perth district council, the fire services and the local community, who—in the most appalling situation, in which at the moment the water in some parts of Perthshire is 7 ft high—have supported one another and given service? Can my hon. Friend say what assistance in the short term, financial and actual, the Government propose to give, what recompense, in the short term and the long term, the Government propose to provide, and what recompense and assistance he is going to give to farmers and householders who have been put in the appalling position of temporary if not permanent loss?

Sir Hector Monro: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend. I am sure that his comments about the outstanding work of the community would have been shared by my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker), had he been able to get here. My hon. Friend was absolutely right to give that praise, because everything I have heard about has been of the highest quality. It has been a tremendous community effort. Other than the practical assistance from officials that I have already announced, now that the Bellwin scheme has been triggered, it will be brought into operation as soon as possible and as soon as Scottish Office officials and local authorities have worked out what is involved.

As a farmer myself, I appreciate the extreme difficulties and major problems that are facing many farmers. I have seen pictures of farms under feet of water. That inevitably will damage flood banks, fences, dykes and hedges, which will need to be repaired. Two years ago, a special increase was made in the grant for flood banking, and the normal capital grant scheme will be available for hedges, walls and fences. All this will be looked at most carefully as soon as the waters recede and we know what is required.

Mr. John McFall (Dumbarton): I echo what the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn) said about the floods, which are unprecedented. I am informed that the rate of flow is 500 cu m greater than the floods of 1990 and that they dropped to 1990 levels only late last night. Tayside regional council and Perth and Kinross district council have been working flat out on the problem, but has the Scottish Office learned any lessons from the 1990 floods? Both local authorities have instituted emergency planning procedures since 1990 and are concerned to ensure that the Scottish Office is involved in the commissioning and management of investigations into flood protection.

I have a letter dated 15 May 1991 from Lord Strathclyde, the then Minister with responsibilities for agriculture and fisheries at the Scottish Office, which says that it would not be of the type mentioned. That is abrogation of responsibility by the Scottish Office, and what has happened in Perth and Kinross could have been avoided if it had been involved.

In addition, the chief executive of Tayside regional council informs me that the helicopter search-and-rescue service performs an invaluable service. We all know that that service is being withdrawn from the area, but at this late stage will the Minister praise it and reconsider his decision to abandon it?

On the issue of compensation, Council chiefs' involved in this operation informed me only 15 minutes ago that the Bellwin scheme is insufficient and restrictive, and that the whole of Tayside region has been affected by this emergency. Will the Minister do something to help Tayside region, the community, farmers and elderly people who are isolated in their areas? Will he give us a commitment now to help Tayside region and tell us precisely what the Government intend to do?

Sir Hector Monro: Of course I echo the hon. Gentleman's praise for the community and the Royal Air Force crews who operate search-and-rescue helicopters. His comments will be noted by the Ministry of Defence.

I accept that flood levels in Perth were the highest recorded for the Tay. Since 1990, we have had an early warning system for the flow of the river, which proved very effective and facilitated the evacuation of people and stock from farms early yesterday. I have explained that the Bellwin scheme has been triggered and agreed by the Treasury, the details of which will have to be worked out in discussions between the local authority and the Scottish Office. We shall consider everything as favourably as possible, because in a serious situation such as Tayside everything must be resolved.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North-East): The Minister will be aware that there has been substantial flooding in my constituency in the communities of Auchtermuchty, Dunshelt and Strathmiglo. I should like to pay tribute to Fife regional council, the fire service, police, personnel from RAF Leuchars and the voluntary organisations such as the Scottish Women's Rural Institute and the Women's Royal Voluntary Service.

Since some of the roads involved are trunk roads, will the Minister now agree to order an immediate engineering assessment to see what lessons can be learned with a view to preventing such flooding from happening again? Will he look extremely favourably on claims for compensation and ensure that Fife regional council suffers no financial prejudice as a result of its efforts on this occasion?

Sir Hector Monro: I note what the hon. and learned Gentleman has said, and I share in his commendation of the outstanding work done by voluntary services and all the other organisations which he mentioned—including, of course, the fire service and RAF Leuchars, which is where the helicopters have been based.

I said that Scottish Office officials are in the area, but it is difficult to make any firm comment on the future until we are able to see the damage once the flood waters have receded. However, as soon as that has happened, we shall be in a better position to consider the future.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): Will the Minister undertake a complete assessment of the disruption of communications which resulted from this tragedy, because north-south and east-west communications in Scotland have been severely disrupted? That has a knock-on effect on economies elsewhere in Scotland, not only in Tayside, where obviously the main crisis occured. Does the Minister accept that Tayside authority must not be expected to bear the brunt of repairs to communications services, but that it must be a Scottish Office priority? Is he satisfied that the Bellwin formula is suitable in these circumstances, given the nature of the disaster?

Sir Hector Monro: I note what the hon. Lady says, and of course one appreciates the fact that there has been very severe weather in the north of Scotland and in Morayshire, with trees blown down and much damage to property. Yes, communications are a serious problem—for example, the A9 has been opened and closed and opened and closed again in the past fortnight—which have disrupted economic progress in Scotland and must be borne in mind; but, at the same time, we must pay tribute to the men who drive the snow ploughs and gritters and who have kept the roads open in particularly ghastly conditions in the past fortnight. However, everything that the hon. Lady said will be carefully borne in mind.

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): Although there will be a general welcome for the special assistance being offered by the Minister to the victims of flooding in Perthshire, will he ensure that the assistance is not limited to Perthshire but will cover victims of flooding in whatever geographical area they happen to reside? In view of the very severe weather suffered recently by almost all of Scotland—not only flooding but very low temperatures —will the Minister have a word with his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security with a view to expediting the payment of cold weather allowances to people who require them, bearing in mind the fact that, not all that long ago during a previous winter, the Prime Minister personally intervened to ensure that cold weather payments were made to people in the south of England suffering severe weather conditions?

Sir Hector Monro: I note what the hon. Gentleman has said. As he knows, the cold weather payments are triggered by particular circumstances at particular meteorological stations, and that, if they are triggered by particular areas of cold weather, that is dealt with by the Department of Social Security, which monitors the situation carefully. However, I shall certainly bear in mind what the hon. Gentleman has said.

Iraq

3.43 pm

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): With permission, I should like to make a further statement on coalition military action against Iraq.

Yesterday and earlier today, the coalition took further military action against Iraq. There were a number of separate operations.

At 8.45 am GMT today, four RAF Tornado GR1 aircraft and two Victor tankers took part in a further coalition operation, involving over 40 United States, British and French aircraft, against Iraqi air defence facilities and command and control facilities in southern Iraq, which had continued to pose a threat to coalition aircraft in the no-fly zone. Attacks were also carried out to suppress air defence installations which threatened the security of coalition aircraft participating in the operation. All coalition aircraft and aircrew returned safely.

Four RAF aircraft participated in the attack against an air defence operations centre at Al-Najaf. Two Tornado GR1 aircraft were to use 1,000-lb laser-guided bombs against targets designated by the thermal imaging airborne laser designator pods, carried by the other two aircraft. One of the Tornados was unable to clearly identify the target and did not release its weapons in order to avoid the possibility of damage to other buildings in the area and civilian casualties. However, the other Tornado successfully completed the attack.

Like the operation on 13 January, this action was taken in self-defence to ensure the safety of coalition aircraft patrolling the no-fly zone below the 32nd parallel in support of United Nations Security Council resolution 688. This was a follow-up to the action taken on 13 January. Early indications are that further significant damage has been inflicted on Iraq's residual air defences in the southern no-fly zone. Assessment of the results is continuing.

This followed action in the latter part of yesterday, when cruise missiles, launched from United States navy ships in the region, attacked a facility connected with the Iraqi weapons of mass destruction programme. The early indications are that the facility was extensively damaged. This action was taken to ensure that Iraq complies with its mandatory obligations under United Nations Security Council resolution 687 and related resolutions. Iraq has committed a number of material breaches of resolution 687 and has wilfully ignored the warnings given by the Security Council, and by the United States, United Kingdom, France and Russia on 11 and 14 January respectively.

There has also been a number of incidents in the norther no-fly zone. On 17 January, an Iraqi fighter aircraft violated the no-fly zone in the north of Iraq. The Iraqi aircraft was engaged and shot down by coalition aircraft. In addition, coalition aircraft were illuminated by Iraqi air defence radars on a number of occasions in the past few days, including an RAF Jaguar on 16 January. This was in violation of the coalition demarche of 14 April 1992, which warned Iraq against a number of specific actions which would be taken as indicators of hostile intent.

Following one such incident, a surface-to-air missile battery was attacked on 17 January by coalition aircraft armed with the high-speed anti-radiation missile. Initial damage assessments indicate that the SAM system was put out of action. Iraqi air defence radars were again attacked using those missiles on 18 January.

These coalition actions have clearly demonstrated to the Iraqis the seriousness of our demand that Iraq should comply with United Nations resolutions and our continuing determination to maintain the no-fly zones, in the north and south of Iraq. Should the need arise, the Government will consider the need for further action in consultation with coalition partners.

The House would not wish me to conclude without expressing again our appreciation of the continuing efforts of our service men and women serving in the Gulf. They can be assured that they enjoy the whole-hearted support of the vast majority in the House and of the British public at large.

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): I thank the Secretary of State for informing the House at the earliest possible opportunity of British involvement in the allied action against targets relating to the no-fly zones in Iraq. I pay tribute to the skill of our personnel involved, and I am glad that all the aeroplanes and the personnel in them returned safely.

The Opposition have always maintained that we shall give our full support to any actions that are in accordance with United Nations resolutions and with international law. In that light, I yet again offer my support to the Government in this case.

We support the military action in the knowledge that the Kurds in the north and the Shias in the south face terrible persecution if the no-fly zones are rendered ineffective. If allied aircraft cannot enforce those no-fly zones because of the deployment of surface-to-air missiles, clearly they will become ineffective with the resultant genocide of the Kurds and the Shias. We know that tens of thousands upon tens of thousands of people have already died at the hands of the Iraqi dictator.

With that in mind, I was delighted to see that the Secretary-General of the United Nations, Boutros Boutros Ghali, had affirmed that last Wednesday's strike was within the "mandate of the United Nations resolution 687."

If that is the case, and if that is the judgment of the United Nations Secretary-General, I assume that the latest strike was, also within the remit of resolution 687.

Can the Secretary of State provide any further information about whether a Scud missile was launched by the Iraqis towards Saudi Arabia, or was that a false alarm? The Secretary of State referred to last night's raid by the Americans and the damage to the al-Rashid hotel. Has he any further information in respect of the exploration carried out by the Ministry of Defence this morning into the damage and whether that was caused by an allied missile or an Iraqi missile? The House would be reassured if we could discover the position in that respect.

Does the Secretary of State appreciate that there is a real fear that the provocations of Saddam Hussein and the legitimate responses could get completely out of hand? Saddam Hussein's brinkmanship could lead to the resumption of a full scale war. There is a feeling that we are drifting towards another bout of major hostilities. If possible, that should be avoided. With that in mind, does the Secretary of State appreciate the necessity to retain as wide a consensus as possible? This legitimate action must not be portrayed as a personality struggle between the American President and the Iraqi president.

In order to try to resolve that problem, would it not be sensible for the matter to be returned to the United Nations Security Council? There is no doubt in our minds that Saddam Hussein has breached most of the United Nations resolutions. On the other hand, we need a coherent and long-term strategy towards Iraq. The Government should demand a debate within the United Nations to that effect.

It is absolutely imperative that Saddam Hussein is not allowed to chip away at United Nations resolutions, and thus at the authority of the United Nations. However, it is equally important that the United Nations has a coherent long-term strategy towards Iraq that embodies as wide a consensus as possible.

Mr. Rifkind: I thank the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) for his support from the Opposition Benches for the operation. He is correct to emphasise that the activity has the support of the United Nations. United Nations resolution 687, as a mandatory resolution, specifically calls upon the Iraqis to allow inspection of possible sites of weapons of mass destruction. Last night's action was justified, because the Iraqis deliberately tried to thwart the United Nations inspectors in carrying out their responsibilities.

We have seen the press reports about Scud missiles. However, as yet, I have seen no corroborative evidence to support the view that that incident took place. With regard to the incident involving the al-Rashid hotel, we share the hon. Gentleman's anxiety to learn the precise cause of the explosion that affected the hotel. At the present time, we do not have a detailed response that we can share with the House. Clearly, we will all be concerned to know where the precise responsibility for that incident lies.

I share the hon. Gentleman's desire to ensure, so far as possible, that these matters do not continue. However, the remedy for that particular problem very much lies with the Iraqi regime in Baghdad. The coalition and the United Nations as a whole have been very careful to take a very measured, prudent and sensitive response to these continuing prevarications and provocations. As a consequence, our response has always been measured and proportionate to the nature of the provocations for which the Iraqi Government are responsible.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman that one must get away from any question of personalities. While we all have our views about President Saddam Hussein of Iraq, at the end of the day it is the issues that are at stake. The threat that the Iraqi Government pose to the security of the region and the international community must be the cause of the UN response that we have seen.

Mr. David Howell (Guildford): Although a very strong response is entirely the right answer to Saddam Hussein's strong prevarications, his renewed threats to Kuwait and his flouting of UN resolutions, does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that something more is needed in the way of longer-term strategy? Will he urge his right hon. Friends to urge our Security Council allies to develop a sustained set of pressures, in response to these incidents —not only military but political, diplomatic and economic for the longer term, so that Saddam Hussein's political enemies, including the persecuted minorities—we call them minorities, but they are majorities—in Iraq, to whom he is delivering death and destruction all the time, might be given some longer-term hope that he will be weakened, that the initiative will no longer be in his hands but will pass into the hands of the international community, where it should be kept?

Mr. Rifkind: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary would very much agree with my right hon. Friend's attitude. Of course it is important to take into account all that can be achieved by political and diplomatic means. We resort to military action only when it is clear that there is no alternative available to the international community. The fact that there have been a number of military operations over the past week is a direct consequence of specific actions and decisions by the Iraqi Government, for which they must take full responsibility.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North-East): Will the Secretary of State confirm that it is still Her Majesty's Government's position that every such action falls to be assessed against the criteria of, first, minimum force, secondly, consistency with international law, and, thirdly, the general support of our coalition allies? Does he agree that it is now necessary to have a long-term political objective, that it is necessary that the United Kingdom and the United States should be regarded as instruments of the United Nations, and that this matter should again be discussed by the Security Council so that we may have not only legal justification but moral authority for what we are doing?

Mr. Rifkind: It is of course desirable to continue to have a proper long-term strategy, but that must never persuade us to forget either the need to make an immediate response to those attempts by the Iraqi regime to render inoperative the no-fly zones that are the ultimate protection for Shias and Kurds in Iraq or the determination of the Iraqi regime to seek to damage Kuwait's territorial integrity. That sometimes requires an immediate response, at the same time as we continue to develop and take forward our overall strategy.

Sir John Wheeler (Westminster, North): For the avoidance of any remaining doubt, will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that the military actions by the coalition forces during the past week have been strictly in accordance with the United Nations resolution and will, and that all those actions have been entirely lawful within the terms of the United Nations statements?

Mr. Rifkind: I can indeed confirm what my right hon. Friend requests, and I can do no better than to quote the United Nations Secretary-General, who, on 14 January, said:

"The raid yesterday, and the forces that carried out the raid, have received a mandate from the Security Council, according to Resolution 678, and the cause of the raid was the violation by Iraq of Resolution 687 concerning the cease fire. So, as Secretary-General of the United Nations, I can say that this action was taken and conforms to the resolutions of the Security Council and conforms to the Charter of the United Nations."

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): What do Ministers say to Jusef al Hoei, the grandson of the Grand Ayatollah of the Shi'ites, who said on "The Sunday Programme", as indeed did Mr. Desai, the representative of the Kurds, and

[Mr. Tam Dalyell]

Mr. Barzani, that it was pointless undertaking that bombing? Surely, to justify the bombing on the basis of the needs of the Shi'ites and the Kurds is cant.

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman is of course entitled to his view, but I believe that the whole House believes that it is important that the no-fly zones should be continued. Without their protection, the Iraqi regime would undoubtedly resort to the use of aircraft to impose further punishing injury, and indeed certain injury and death, on the populations in both the southern and northern no-fly zones. I do not believe that the alternative approach which the hon. Gentleman appears to suggest would do other than render inoperative efforts by the international community to help the suffering people in Iraq.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): If we look at the position from the view of the Arabs—we have, or rather had, a number of Arab friends—if it was our intention to build up Saddam Hussein's support among his people, fire up the case for the Muslim fundamentalists and spatchcock the middle east peace process, how could we have done it better? What are we to do with Israel, which also seems to be not putting into effect United Nations resolutions? Is it the case that it seems to be politically correct to zap nasty Arabs, but to ignore what is done by the state of Israel?

Mr. Rifkind: If my hon. Friend is anxious to avoid bolstering Saddam Hussein's image, I hope that he will accept that nothing would have bolstered that image more effectively than for him to show his ability to thwart the will of the United Nations, render inoperative the no-fly zones in southern and northern Iraq, be responsible for successful incursions into Kuwait territory, and prevent United Nations inspections of sites in Iraq that are suspected of being part of the nuclear weapons programme. That would have been the alternative.

I believe that my hon. Friend would agree that to allow that would have done infinite damage to our efforts to ensure the speedy demise of Saddam and his removal from the international scene.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): All of us —Opposition and Conservatives—regret the civilian casualties resulting from the bombings. Is it not a fact that Saddam Hussein is responsible for those casualties because he refuses to conform to United Nations Security Council resolutions? Does not the right hon. and learned Gentleman agree that it is nonsense for the Iraqi regime to talk of the necessity for a political solution, as it has in the past few hours, as long as it refuses to conform to United Nations resolutions passed on behalf of the international community?

Does not the right hon. and learned Gentleman further agree that, until Iraq does so, all sanctions must be stringently maintained and military action taken whenever it is regarded as appropriate under United Nations resolutions? Saddam Hussein started the crisis, and he can end it by returning to civilised behaviour instead of continuing to behave as an international outlaw.

Mr. Rifkind: The right hon. Gentleman is correct. Anyone with residual doubts about the unreasonable nature of the Iraqis' position has only to reflect on the demand made over the weekend that United Nations inspectors seeking to go to Baghdad to carry out inspections of possible weapons sites should be required to travel from Bahrain via Jordan to get to Baghdad. Those are the sort of proposals made by the Iraqis. The United Nations spokesmen properly rejected that suggestion as intolerable in relation to their responsibilities.

Sir Michael Marshall (Arundel): While I recognise the operational constraints, may I ask my right hon. and learned Friend to take this opportunity to assure the House that a full and effective consultation mechanism is open to Her Majesty's Government to ensure that the more than 30 countries which undertook to preserve an independent Kuwait two years ago are fully in the picture and support us all the way?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend is correct to emphasise the importance properly attached to the widest range of agreement and consensus on such matters. I believe that the international community remains united in supporting the actions necessary to impress on Saddam Hussein and his colleagues the necessity of conforming to their obligations to the United Nations.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): Is the Secretary of State aware that we are signatories of the United Nations charter that pledges us to rid humanity of the scourge of war? President Bush is not licensed to kill or to speak on behalf of the international community. Is the Secretary of State also aware of a report in The Times today that the International Atomic Energy Agency inspected the site bombed 16 times last night and said that there was no military significance in it?

If it is the case that the two women receptionists at the al-Rashid hotel—whose deaths brought no sign of regret from the Secretary of State—had been killed in that raid, that would be in breach of international conventions on bombing civilian populations, and would, in effect, amount to a crime by those who conducted it.

Finally, is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that he is taking the armed forces of this country deeper and deeper into what could become a full-blown war, without any authority from the House of Commons? We have never been told the policy or invited to endorse it, and it is a policy that has diminishing support worldwide.

Mr. Rifkind: The right hon. Gentleman referred to the United Nations and its charter. I think that he will acknowledge that the Secretary-General of the United Nations—a fairly authoritative spokesman on this subject —has said clearly and unequivocally that he believes that the action is justified under the terms of the United Nations charter.

Of course we regret any civilian casualties. I said in my statement that the Royal Air Force had taken action to try to minimise that risk, as did other coalition partners.

As for the International Atomic Energy Authority, the right hon. Gentleman should recall that it published a report in May 1992 which included the two plants on the site that was the subject of last night's attack in a list of facilities identified by the Iraqis themselves as manufacturing facilities for their enrichment programme—in other words, for producing components used in the manufacture of nuclear weapons.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend (Bexleyheath): Can my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that this is the first time in the history of the United Nations that the Security Council has sought to remove from a member of the United Nations its nuclear, chemical and strategic capability, and thus that it is incredibly important for the future of the United Nations that success is achieved?

Secondly, what thought is being given to a no-fly zone for Iraqi combat aircraft covering the whole of Iraq, rather than just two important parts of it? Finally, bearing in mind Turkey's importance in the protection of the Kurds in northern Iraq, what is the position of that country in current events?

Mr. Rifkind: As my hon. Friend says, the efforts by the United Nations to deal with the Iraqi nuclear programme are part of its overall policy of ensuring that Iraqi weapons of mass destruction are eliminated. That is clearly a consequence of the Iraqi aggression and occupation of Kuwait some two years ago.

The reason for imposing no-fly zones in southern and northern Iraq was the Iraqi use of combat aircraft to oppress those who live in the northern and southern parts of the country. That consideration does not obtain for the central part of the country, so the rationale for the no-fly zones does not apply to it.

We have close consultations with the Government of Turkey. It provides facilities at Incirlik for the imposition of the no-fly zone in the northern part of the country, and we greatly welcome Turkish co-operation.

Mr. Neil Gerrard (Walthamstow): The Minister will know that a constituent of mine, Paul Ride, and another Briton are being held in prison in Baghdad. Does he share my concern that the action taken against Iraq, especially the cruise missile attack which led to civilians being killed, will make it much more difficult to secure their release? What has been done to ensure that the men are safe? What hope can he offer their families about their release?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman is right to draw attention to the plight of these people. We are seeking to keep in contact with them through the good offices of the Russian Government. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs will wish to inform the hon. Gentleman about developments.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey and Waterside): Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that, if Saddam Hussein refuses permission to United Nations teams to travel around Iraq with a view to identifying and destroying his nuclear and chemical weapons capabilities, it is hardly surprising that other means are found to do that?

What contact has there been with the incoming American president? Will the robust line in support of the United Nations resolutions taken by President Bush be followed by his successor at the White House?

Mr. Rifkind: It is reasonable to assume that the present American Administration will have the closest possible contact and consultation with the President-elect. It is clear from the public statements by President-elect Clinton that he fully supports the actions that have been taken over the past week and intends to follow a similar policy when he assumes office.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Does not the international community have two responsibilities, the first of which is to ensure that the ceasefire agreement and the Security Council resolutions are fully implemented? Critics will have to answer for what they would do in view of all the provocations if force is not used. Secondly, as we have no quarrel with the people of Iraq, we must try to ensure as far as possible the minimum civilian casualties and, hopefully, no civilian casualties at all. Apparently, there is yet no final evidence that the attack on the hotel was by the allies, but if it was, I deeply and genuinely regret what occurred. Does the Secretary of State agree that we should concentrate on weapons of mass destruction, which need to be destroyed?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman is correct. He spoke about the hotel incident and was right to emphasise that, as yet, we do not know the precise cause of the incident. I understand that the hotel is about 15 miles from the factory which was the target of the operation. I assure the hon. Gentleman that all those who take part in these operations attach maximum importance to not attacking sites that are close to areas of concentrated civilian populations. The hon. Gentleman is right to draw attention to that.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cirencester and Tewkesbury): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the resumed provocation by Saddam Hussein merely causes suffering to the ordinary people of Iraq and that, sadly, that is likely to continue while Saddam Hussein is in power? Since the end of the Gulf war, political opposition to Saddam Hussein has become even weaker. Will my right hon. and learned Friend give a possible scenario for an end to this conflict so that coalition troops may be safely withdrawn?

Mr. Rifkind: Plainly, we hope that the time will come when the people of Iraq are allowed to show their true feelings about the present Iraqi regime. In the meantime, it is crucial for the United Kingdom and for other countries in the Security Council and the United Nations as a whole to do what we can in a responsible, sensitive and moderate fashion to ensure the preservation of the interests that point towards stability in that region.

Mr. John Hutton (Barrow and Furness): While one fully supports the need for military action, in this case to enforce the terms of United Nations Security Council resolutions, does not the Secretary of State agree that there is an increased threat of Iraqi violation of Kuwait territorial integrity? Can he assure the House that steps have been taken to ensure that, if there is any such threat to Kuwait's territorial integrity, sufficient and adequate forces are in place to ensure that such an attempt is unsuccessful?

Mr. Rifkind: It has been made clear to the Iraqi Government that any violations of Kuwait's territorial integrity would be treated with the utmost seriousness. The United States Government recently announced the deployment of a battalion group to Kuwait and, of course, the coalition as a whole continues to attach great importance to the independence of that country and the preservation of its right to that status despite provocations by Iraq.

Several Hon. Members rose—

Madam Speaker: Order. We must now move on. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] Order. I wish to hear a Standing Order No. 20 application from Mr. Tam Dalyell.

Mr. Dalyell: I believe that there is a genuine case, on grounds of urgency and importance, for this matter to be discussed under Standing Order No. 20.

In the very nature of things, there are many different views in the House of Commons which, bluntly, may differ from those of both Front Benches. In those circumstances, question and answer, doubtless conducted in good faith, is insufficient to deal with an immensely important problem. There can be no doubt of its importance. Military experts, such as Colonel Dewar of the International Institute for Strategic Studies, whom the Chairman of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs heard at lunchtime, say that this could be the beginning of a Vietnam.

If, in the opinion of serious experts, we could be embarked on a situation parallel to that of Vietnam, getting deeper and deeper into a situation that may not be too obvious at the beginning, surely there is a serious case, not for the posture of arguing for two minutes for a debate but for you using your discretion, Madam Speaker, to grant a debate for those many hon. Members who have views to put on this overwhelmingly urgent matter.

Madam Speaker: I have listened carefully to the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). As the House knows, I have to give my decision without giving a reason for it. I do not consider that the matter that he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 20 —[Interruption.] Order. Therefore, I cannot submit the application to the House—[Interruption.] Order. I am on my feet. Although I do not feel, at this stage, that it would be appropriate for me to grant the Standing Order No. 20 application, let me make it clear to the hon. Member for Linlithgow and to the House that I recognise the gravity of those developments—a recognition that I hope and I believe is shared by the entire House.

Madam Speaker: Order. I hope that I have made my views on the matter known, so that there will be no further points of order.

Mr. Benn: I did not know that my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) was to seek the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 20, and it was my intention to make a request based on a narrower but important point—that British forces are being committed to military action without a debate. That is not the more general question raised by my hon. Friend. In the past—30 or more years ago—I raised a similar point when a Minister failed to give an assurance that British troops would not be used without the consent of Parliament. The House should assert its authority now, to require a statement as to the circumstances under which the forces are to be used and the seeking of its authority for such a move before we adjourn today.

I hope that you recognise, Madam Speaker, that I am not challenging your ruling on the request made by my hon. Friend, but I ask you to consider that point carefully. If we lose control of the Government, and they do everything that the American Government want, we might as well pack up and go home.

Madam Speaker: I appreciate the point made by the right hon. Gentleman. As he knows, it is a much wider point than that on which the original Standing Order No. 20 application was made. As he also knows, he should have given me notice of such an application by 12 noon today. However, I have heard what he says. I carefully considered the words that I used following the normal statement that I make on these matters. I hope that the House will allow it to rest there for the time being.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Is it a different point of order?

Mr. Corbyn: It is a related point of order.

Madam Speaker: Let me see how closely it is related.

Mr. Corbyn: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I listened carefully to your statement, as did many others. As you are aware, many hon. Members do not share the consensus between the two Front Benches on the issue. Should further hostilities be resumed tonight, and further applications under the Standing Order No. 20 procedure be made, and should the Government still be reluctant to have an open debate on their policy towards Iraq, would you be minded to ensure that the House had that debate, despite the wishes of the Government?

Madam Speaker: I am always ready, according to the rules and procedures, to look at Standing Order No. 20 applications when they are made.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Does it relate to the previous point of order?

Mr. Cryer: It is separate.

Madam Speaker: Separate and different?

Mr. Cryer: Separate and different, Madam Speaker.

During questions to the Secretary of State for Defence following his statement, points were made about the effect of the attack on citizens who are involved in Iraq. The Secretary of State said that it was a matter for the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs. As that Secretary of State is here, could you say, Madam Speaker, that, if he were to request the opportunity to make a statement later today, perhaps tonight, it would be received with approval? A serious consequence of the warmongering of George Bush is that the lives of British citizens could be at stake.

Madam Speaker: That is a somewhat hypothetical question but, as the House knows, when any Minister makes it known that he or she wishes to make a statement, that statement is allowed.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On the question of Standing Order No. 20 applications, the Speaker has to play an important role in making a decision, albeit rarely, on the requests that are made by Back-Bench Members. I specify Back-Bench Members, because on this occasion the application could come only from them. That is because the two Front Benches and the Liberal Democrats are all in cahoots.

Your role, Madam Speaker, is extremely important on this occasion, because we have an American-led war only because of the role of the two Front Benches. As we cannot expect the Government to make a decision unless George Bush allows them to have a debate, your role in responding to Standing Order No. 20 applications is more important now than on any other occasion when such applications are made. You have to overcome the two Front Benches, and the fact that we are talking about the Americans running the show.

Madam Speaker: I take my role extremely seriously. I can assure the House that I am not in cahoots with anyone.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): May I help you, Madam Speaker, and the Government by reminding you that I have introduced the Declaration of War (Requirement for Parliamentary Approval) Bill? If the measure were brought forward for swift debate, we would have the opportunity to discuss various matters. Those who think, as I do, that we are seeing a personal vendetta being pursued by the United States President would be able to explain that view. We would also have the opportunity to vote against such action.

Madam Speaker: The hon. Member is astute when it comes to public relations in relation to his proposed legislation.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I wish to ask a question on the length of statements and the time that is given to them. Are you in a position, Madam Speaker, to outline the criteria that you employ in determining just how long questions on a statement should run? In the light of the Standing Order No. 20 application and the observations that were added to the sentiments expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) by my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), it seems that some statements should be allowed to run a little longer than others, because of the gravity of the subjects that they raise.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Madam Speaker: Order. Are these points of order really necessary? I am attempting to deal with an extremely serious matter. I shall reply to the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman). I am not in a position to set out the criteria for determining the time that I allow for questions following a statement: that must be a matter for my judgment. I have to ensure that a fair proportion of Members who are anxious to put a question are able to do so. I must ensure also that there is a variety of opinion within those questions, and that hon. Members on both sides of the House are dealt with as fairly as possible.

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): I listened carefully to the Standing Order No. 20 application that was made by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) and to your measured response, Madam Speaker. Although the application followed a statement on Iraq, I did not hear the hon. Gentleman give a title to it; nor did I hear you announce the title when you gave your measured response. This is an important matter, because you gave an indication to the House of your own views. It is—[Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman has expressed concern about both Iraq and, on a separate occasion, the intervention in Bosnia. It is important that we know the heading of the hon. Gentleman's Standing Order No. 20 so that we can judge your measured response to it, Madam Speaker.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Madam Speaker: Order. I ask right hon. and hon. Members to let me do this. I am capable of letting the House know that the title of the application was

"The changing military situation in Iraq".

Mr. Derek Conway (Shrewsbury and Atcham): Having sat through the statement of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence on Thursday and again this afternoon, and having failed, sadly, to catch your eye on both occasions, Madam Speaker, and given the exchanges that have taken place over the past 15 minutes, it seems that many right hon. and hon. Members —especially the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn)—have been able to catch your eye this afternoon, as they did last week, and thereafter to raise the matter again. It seems that some Members are getting more than their fair share of debating time.

Madam Speaker: Order. If the hon. Member is seeking to criticise the method by which I call hon. Members, he had better table a substantive motion. I invite him and any other Member who is expressing such criticism to stop by my office. I shall then ensure that they are given a printout from my computer of the number of times that they have been called.

Mr. Conway: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. That is definitely not the case; you misunderstood my point. Those hon. Members who have been critical of the opportunity that they have had to express a view this afternoon have had several opportunities to do so during the last three sitting days. I make no criticism of your selection, Madam Speaker—you have a difficult job —but it appears that some hon. Members are ungrateful for the opportunities that they have been given.

Madam Speaker: How very kind of the hon. Gentleman. I am always happy to receive bouquets.

4.24 pm

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Have you had an opportunity to rule on the very serious allegations made by my hon. Friend the Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) last Wednesday about the tabling of parliamentary questions? I note that there is a question on the Order Paper today from the hon. Member in relation to whom it was alleged that a civil servant had initiated his question. Have you ruled on that, Madam Speaker?

Madam Speaker: No, I have not done so. The matter is still being investigated, but I assure the House that I shall give a ruling at the earliest possible moment.

SCOTTISH GRAND COMMITTEE

Local Government Reform

That the Matter of Local Government Reform in Scotland, being a Matter relating exclusively to Scotland, be referred to the Scottish Grand Committee for its consideration.—[Mr. Heathcoat-Amory.]

Orders of the Day

European Communities (Amendment) Bill

Considered in Committee [Progress, 14 January]

[MR. MICHAEL MORRIS in the Chair]

Clause 1

TREATY ON EUROPEAN UNION

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. You will recall that last Wednesday, under a ruling from the Chair, I was not successful in moving a motion to report progress. Of course, that is a past matter. I think that you will agree that unlike our system for applications under Standing Order No. 20, to which moving a progress motion or an amendment in Committee is at least comparable, the Chair is given no criteria on which to make a judgment. Therefore, hon. Members also do not have any distinct criteria to guide them.

Would I be correct in assuming that the major factor that the Chair takes into account when deciding whether to accept a motion to report progress—which is effectively the adjournment of the Committee—is whether information, an event or some other factor outside the proceedings of the Committee is of sufficient importance to require clarification before debate continues? I assume that that is the criterion. I do not want to hold up the Committee on a future date and if you, Mr. Morris, could endorse my suggestion, modify it or give some indication of the criteria, that might ensure that our proceedings move at maximum speed.

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Morris): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. He knows that the Chair does not give reasons. However, I can tell him that I take everything into account in reaching a decision on any point of order that is raised.

Mr. Derek Fatchett (Leeds, Central): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert '(except Article 130 on page 35 of Cm. 1934)'.

The Chairman: With this, it will be convenient to consider the following amendments: No. 3, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert '(except Article 129(a) on page 34 of Cm. 1934)'.

No. 14, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert '(except Title XV on page 37 of Cm. 1934)'.

No. 132, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert '(excluding Article G D (21) on page 16 of Cm. 1934).'.

No. 184, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 3 (e) on page 9 of Cm. 1934'.

No. 189, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 3 (1)'.

No. 190, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 3 (m)'.

No. 243, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 130i'.

No. 244, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 130j'.

No. 245, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 130k'.

No. 250, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 130f'.

No. 251, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 130g'.

No. 252, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 130H'.

No. 357, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 3(b) as referred to in Article G on page 9 of Command Paper number 1934 '.

No. 358, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 3(c) as referred to in Article G on page 9 of Command Paper number 1934 '.

No. 360, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 3(g) as referred to in Article G on page 9 of Command Paper number 1934 '.

No. 361, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 3(h) as referred to in Article G on page 9 of Command Paper number 1934 '.

No. 384, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 130l as referred to in Article G on page 38 of Command Paper number 1934 '.

No. 385, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 130n as referred to in Article G on page 39 of Command Paper number 1934 '.

No. 386, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 130o as referred to in Article G on page 39 of Command Paper number 1934 '.

No. 387, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 130p as referred to in Article G on page 39 of Command Paper number 1934 '.

Mr. Fatchett: This is a large group of amendments, which essentially deals with European Community industrial policy, consumer protection policy, commercial policy and policy relating to research and development.

Amendment No. 1 is, in some respects, rather bizarre. Its purpose is to provide a peg for debate. If the amendment is put to the vote later, I shall ask my right hon. and hon. Friends not to support it. The Labour party at both national and European Community level favours industrial policy, but the amendment would delete all references to that in the treaty. Therefore, for that reason there is a clear contradiction in our position. As I said, the purpose of the amendment is to provide a peg for a discussion on European industrial policy, the Government's intentions and the way in which the Government define that policy.

It may seem to many outside the House watching our proceedings that that is a strange way of making progress, but it is the only means of allowing us to debate issues that are crucial to many people.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): I heard my hon. Friend say that members of the Labour Front Bench—I emphasise the words "Front Bench"—support Common Market industrial policy. I hope that my hon. Friend will revise his opinion. In all the years since we joined the Common Market in 1973, we in the mining industry have been struggling to sell our coal. We have the cheapest deep-mined coal in Europe. It is twice as cheap as German and Spanish coal, yet the Common Market's tinpot industrial policy means that British miners have not been able to sell coal to the rest of the Community.

Conversely, the Common Market has been used as a laundering base for South African slave labour coal and Colombian coal. Twenty million tonnes of it were laundered in the Common Market and sold to Britain last year, with the result that the equivalent of 15 pits have been shut. If we do not change that policy, many more miners—and all those who provide goods and services to the mining industry—will be thrown on the scrap heap. I hope that my hon. Friend will take a different view of the Common Market's industrial policy. It is supposed to be based on a level playing field, but instead of buying British coal, the other member states buy German and Spanish coal—anybody's coal bar our own. It is high time that members of the Labour Front Bench took a different view of the Common Market's industrial policy. In my view, it stinks, and it has added to Britain's unemployment figures.

Mr. Fatchett: My hon. Friend makes a number of cogent and well-argued points, with which I am not unsympathetic. I suggest that he returns to them when the Committee debates the next group of amendments, which deal with transport, telecommunications, and energy policy—when the intervention that he just made will be even more apposite.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Does my hon. Friend place under the heading of the Community's common industrial policy regulations concerning terms and conditions of employment? I ask that in relation to what is known by the acronym TUPE—regulations for the protection of employees on the transfer of undertakings. I am given to understand that the Government are in flagrant violation of the directive enacted by the Community 15 or 16 years ago. What is the point of the Committee debating such important issues when we have a Government who choose deliberately to ignore a Brussels-based directive that has the force of law throughout all 12 member states?

Mr. Fatchett: My hon. Friend makes an important point. I suspect that it drifts a little from amendment No. 1, but he will have an opportunity later in Committee directly to address employment issues. No doubt my hon. Friend agrees that there is no future for any industrial economy that is based on cheap labour and poor employment conditions.

Dr. Godman: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. When my hon. Friend offered his assessment of the validity of my remarks, I thought for a second or two that you were nodding in assent. I hope that I will not be ruled out of order when I come to talk about terms and conditions of employment throughout the 12 member states.

The Chairman: Order. We shall have to wait and see what the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) does next, but I draw his attention to the marshalling of amendments on the paper. I hope that he will stay within the terms of the amendments with which we are dealing. Now that we have moved on to specific matters, we have a fairly tight debate ahead of us.

Mr. Fatchett: I was not trying to assume your responsibilities, Mr. Morris. I suspect that my task is difficult enough without my taking on additional onerous duties.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): The House will regret the curmudgeonly attitude of many Opposition Members. Do not the cohesion funds, in particular, provide tremendously exciting opportunities for a socialist Europe? No wonder those who want the power of politicians to be expanded at the market's expense were so enormously encouraged by the Government's support for the extension of the cohesion funds at the Edinburgh summit.

There is no doubt that Labour Members are presented with a tremendous opportunity by the exciting and on-going vision of cohesion funds. They will give politicians the chance to beat the market, and to select not merely individual industries but countries and even individuals for the benefactions of taxpayers throughout the Community. This is indeed a tremendously exciting opportunity: all true socialists ought to grab it, and to thank the Prime Minister for giving it to them.

Mr. Fatchett: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman's intervention—intriguing though it was—was necessarily directed at me. It may well be part of the current debate within the Conservative party, some of which I read in last week's Hansard.

Europe's key social and economic problem at present is rising unemployment. Unemployment corrodes social cohesion, lowers living standards, removes hope, creates social tension and establishes the conditions for right-wing political extremism. We have witnessed the development of all those conditions in Europe over the past 18 months to two years—which is not surprising, given the backcloth of rising unemployment.

Let us examine the standardised seasonally adjusted unemployment rates provided by the International Labour Organisation. Between June 1990 and October 1992, unemployment rose by 18 per cent. across the Community; that overall pattern however, fails to take account of the disparities between individual countries. The Danes, for example, have experienced a 20 per cent. increase, and the French a 13 per cent. increase. The Federal Republic of Germany—West Germany—experienced a 6 per cent. reduction, Ireland a 17 per cent. increase, Italy a 9 per cent. increase, the Netherlands a 20 per cent. reduction and Spain a 17 per cent. increase.

What stands out like a sore thumb is the United Kingdom figure. As I have said, according to the ILO the European Community average rose by 18 per cent. in the period concerned; in the same period, unemployment in this country rose by a staggering 81 per cent. This country's figure is four times as bad as the Community average.

When my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) drew attention to the potential for further job losses in the coal industry, he clearly had in mind the poor performance of the British economy in regard to employment.

Mr. Mike Gapes (Ilford, South) rose——

Mr. William Cash (Stafford) rose——

Mr. Fatchett: I shall give way in a moment, but it may help both my hon. Friend and the hon. Gentleman if I give some more figures. National definitions of unemployment show exactly the same pattern. Despite the Government's attempts to adjust the unemployment figures during their period in office, Britain's economic performance in terms of job creation is shown to be very bad in comparison with the rest of Europe.

For the period from June 1990 to October 1992, the increase in unemployment is sharper. Unemployment was up by 37 per cent. in Belgium; by 31 per cent. in Denmark; by 28 per cent. in France; by 38 per cent. in Greece; by 27 per cent. in Ireland; and by 61 per cent. in Luxembourg. In the Netherlands unemployment was down by 8 per cent; in Spain it was down by 1 per cent. The increase in unemployment throughout the European Community averaged 19 per cent. Yet again, however, the United Kingdom figure, under this Conservative Government, showed an increase in unemployment of 81 per cent. We are doing considerably worse than any other European Community country.

Mr. Cash: In making that extremely important point regarding the increase in unemployment in the United Kingdom, does the hon. Gentleman concede that the period that he has chosen almost exactly coincides with the period when we were members of the exchange rate mechanism? Does he not therefore conclude that that was the major contributory factor which led to higher interest rates than we could afford, together with the bankruptcies caused by the recession, with which his party concurred? Does he agree that by not repudiating the economic and monetary union provisions and the central banking provisions of the treaty, the recession and unemployment will grow even worse?

Mr. Fatchett: I suspected that the hon. Gentleman would make that point. Other members of the exchange rate mechanism experienced considerably lower increases in unemployment. The question, therefore, that he needs to ask relates to the basic strength and structure of the British economy.

The Italians left the exchange rate mechanism at about the same time as the United Kingdom. During the same period, Italy's unemployment increased by 9 per cent. according to the International Labour Office's figures, and by 13 per cent. according to the Italian Government's figures. That is a considerably lower figure than the United Kingdom figure. If the hon. Gentleman wants to do some research, he ought to remember that in any laboratory one controls for variables. I am not sure that the hon. Gentleman has controlled for the variable, which is the strength and the weakness of the British economy.

Mr. Gapes: This country left the exchange rate mechanism in September 1992. Today Plessey-Siemens, a major employer in my constituency, announced 80 job losses, with 33 people to be made redundant by 26 February. Whether we are within or outside the exchange rate mechanism, that is yet another indication of the fact that under this Conservative Government massive job losses continue in manufacturing industry. That is the fault not of the exchange rate mechanism but of this Government's lack of an industrial policy, their failure to invest in training and their lack of a strategy to help manufacturing industry. Since the Berlin wall came down in 1989, there has been a massive reduction in defence industry jobs, including those in my constituency, with the result that in the last few years it has lost about half its manufacturing employment. We need an interventionist industrial strategy on a Europe wide basis.

I am pleased that the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) is so committed to the policies that he outlined. Government intervention is needed if we are to deal with these problems. It cannot be left to the vagaries of the market. We need a national intervention policy and a Europe wide industrial strategy, as proposed by the Commission.

Mr. Fatchett: My hon. Friend asked me whether I had noticed that the Government left the exchange rate mechanism in September. I did. I sometimes wonder, though, whether Ministers in their subsequent statements remembered what they said prior to September of last year. My hon. Friend made a telling point about the need for an industrial strategy. Labour has been asking for such a strategy for a long time. Our poor performance in manufacturing trade compared with the rest of the world and the rundown of manufacturing jobs will not cease or improve until we have an industrial strategy.

Mr. Budgen: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that within the constitution of the European Community there are already the seeds of a very substantial industrial policy? That must be one of the reasons why some Opposition Members, who may have doubts about sovereignty, none the less believe that this is a practical mechanism for idealistic socialism of the most advanced sort.

Mr. Fatchett: The hon. Gentleman continues to offer the Committee some interesting definitions of socialism. May I suggest that he should wait for the Minister's reply, when we may find out how this Government define industrial policy at European Community level?

4.45 pm

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): My hon. Friend is making an extremely good speech and has put his finger on some very good points. Is he aware that France and Italy joined the exchange rate mechanism before we did and that when this country was considering joining the ERM the Employment Select Committee asked the Department of Employment what research it had carried out into the effect of ERM membership on Italy and France? We were sent two pieces of academic research which showed that the effect on Italy of joining the ERM was to increase unemployment by 1 million and that the effect on France was to increase unemployment by roughly 500,000.

The chief economist of the Confederation of British Industry said at that time that if Britain joined the ERM and things went well for us within it, unemployment would be increased by 500,000 and that if things went badly unemployment would increase by 1 million. During the period that we were members of the ERM, unemployment rose by about 1·1 million. Are not there dangers for socialists in that type of policy? In France, the socialist Government pursued the franc fort policy, which has led to even more unemployment in France than in Conservative Britain. It looks as though the socialist party in France will be massacred at the next election because of the policy that it pursued.

Mr. Fatchett: My hon. Friend was a very experienced and able Chairman of the Employment Select Committee. Therefore, I have listened with interest to what he said. May I suggest to him, however, that there is a very strong socialist argument for fixed exchange rates? The key argument relates to the level of those fixed exchange rates and the ability to adjust. I suspect that the evidence submitted to the Employment Select Committee varied in terms of its conclusions on the flexibility of the exchange rate mechanism and the level of the exchange rates within the ERM. It is those arguments which we should address, rather than arguments about a free market in currencies.

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills): Has it not occurred to the hon. Gentleman that the slavish adherence of the Opposition Front Bench to the malign policy of the exchange rate mechanism may have contributed to job losses, deflation and unemployment? Is not the essence of the debate that competitiveness often reflects the exchange rate and that adherence, therefore, to what I would describe as philosophical dogma brings about the very objectives that I take it the Opposition Front Bench do not seek? The fact is, therefore, that somebody else's industrial competitive policy depends upon matters that are better argued and determined by markets than by ourselves in this Chamber.

Mr. Fatchett: I wish to make progress, but I shall try to respond to the hon. Gentleman's point. It is a novel notion of political accountability that the Opposition should be held responsible for the policies and consequences of the Government's actions. The hon. Gentleman will remember that in the early autumn of last year, my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition and my hon. Friend the Shadow Chancellor asked for a realignment of currencies within the exchange rate mechanism.

Mr. Shepherd: That was after we left the ERM.

Mr. Fatchett: No, before.

Mr. Budgen: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Fatchett: No, I must make some progress.

Mr. Budgen: Could I make just one point on what the hon. Gentleman has just said?

Mr. Fatchett: No.

Mr. Budgen rose——

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Budgen: Will the hon. Gentleman allow me to make just one point?

Mr. Fatchett: I think that the hon. Gentleman would be the first to agree with me if I said that I have been kind to him in terms of the number of interventions that I have allowed so far.

Mr. Budgen: Yes, indeed, but I want to assist the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Fatchett: Because the hon. Gentleman has been so keen to educate his colleagues about the nature and the dangers of socialism, I am tempted to give way to him on this final occasion.

Mr. Budgen: Will the hon. Gentleman assist the Committee, because I saw many of his colleagues raise an eyebrow at his earlier comments? Why is there a socialist argument for fixed exchange rates? In 1979, Mr. Callaghan said that Britain should not enter the exchange rate mechanism—the poor Mr. Callaghan who had done the honourable thing by resigning when there had to be a devaluation in 1967. Until recently, it was the Labour party which had learnt most from the agonies of fixed exchange rates, which are an economic mistake. Will the hon. Gentleman please explain how it is a specifically socialist thing to have fixed exchange rates?

Mr. Fatchett rose——

The Chairman: Order. If hon. Members wish to amalgamate the section on economic policy with that on trade deficits, the Chair will oblige, but to date that has not been the feeling of the Committee, and I respectfully suggest that the intervention of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) is not covered by the amendments. I should be grateful, therefore, if the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) would resume his speech.

Mr. Fatchett rose——

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney) rose——

Mr. Leighton rose——

Mr. Fatchett: I shall give way shortly. It is interesting to see one or two of my hon. Friends with their hands up. That takes me back to my teaching experience, if nothing else. I shall make progress and then give way.

I was trying to show the extent to which unemployment has increased across the Community and how Britain has the worst record, with unemployment growing four times faster than the average. There is an increasing view that the world will divide into a number of economic trading blocs —Japan, the United States and the European Community. I am not sure that that view can be supported. Indeed, it is often simplistic about the flows of capital, but if the European Community is to compete, we need policies—

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cirencester and Tewkesbury): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Fatchett: May I finish?

We need policies that provide for high-technology industries and for highly skilled, well-paid and secure employment. Statistics show that, as a trading bloc, the European Community has not performed particularly well against the United States and Japan in the past decade. In each year of the 1980s, the Japanese figures for GDP growth were better than those of the European Community. The United States and the European Community have performed roughly the same, but Japan has been growing faster than the European Community. In each year of the 1980s, unemployment in Japan grew slower than in the European Community, and each year somce 1981 unemployment in the United States has grown slower than in the European Community. The European Community has performed relatively poorly against other traing blocs and has experienced a sharp increase in unemployment, with the increase being sharpest in the United Kingdom.

Against the background of relatively poor industrial performance and the growing social problems that are caused by unemployment, we argue that the European Community needs an industrial policy. Interestingly, the Government signed the Maastricht treaty, but on a domestic level Ministers at the Department of Trade and Industry have always resisted the development of an industrial strategy for the United Kingdom economy. Just before Christmas, Neil Johnson, director-general of the Engineering Employers Federation, stated clearly that the Government had no strategy for industry, no policy for manufacturing and that they were leaving the fate of British industry to the markets.

The CBI, the Engineering Employers Federation and a range of employers' and trade union organisations have been asking for a new partnership between Government and industry, yet at national level the Government resist such a policy. What is significantly different at European Community level that enables the Government to sign up for an industrial policy?

The Minister must explain that conversion because, although the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) is no longer present, some other Conservative Members will be interested to know how a Government who profess their belief in free markets for the United Kingdom can adopt a different position in relation to Europe.

Mr. Rowlands: Will my hon. Friend consider what would have happened to industrial manufacturing in Britain if the Government had got their way and remained in the ERM with 15 per cent. interest rates? That would have devastated our jobs, industrial investment and manufacturing future.

Mr. Fatchett: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. That is why my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition asked in July for realignment of currencies and cuts in interest rates, which would have enabled us to avoid the cold shower of membership of the ERM at a particular rate. My hon. Friend is right, and more jobs would have been lost.

Mr. Leighton: I agree completely with the case that my hon. Friend is advancing and should like to express my gratitude for his answer to my earlier question. I think that he was saying that there is a case for managed exchange rates. Originally, the ERM was supposed to be a system of fixed but flexible exchange rates in which there could have been a realignment, as there should have been. Has he noticed that the ERM has reached a stage at which exchange rates are supposed to be fixed irrevocably, and that, as part of the procedure for achieving a single currency, the Maastricht treaty lays down irrevocably fixed exchange rates——

The Chairman: Order. I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman is straying. I call Mr. Fatchett.

Mr. Leighton: The point that my hon. Friend made——

The Chairman: Order. I have understood the point. The exchange rate mechanism is a separate debate. I have listened attentively——

Mr. Leighton rose——

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman may wish to rephrase his intervention in a moment, but his previous intervention was out of order. I will call Mr. Fatchett, who may give way again.

Mr. Fatchett: I will make progress, because my hon. Friend will be able to return to those points later.

The Government have accepted the European Community's industrial policy. We would accept the principles and assumptions behind that policy. Some Conservative Members clearly do not do so, and the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West will be interested to hear the three assumptions that underpin a industrial policy.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Fatchett: No. I will continue for a minute.

The three assumptions suggest that an industrial policy and an effective manufacturing sector cannot be achieved without intervention in the economy or the market.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Fatchett: No.

First, any industrial policy makes it clear that the market alone cannot deliver against a set of social and economic objectives. The market cannot deliver an effective manufacturing sector. It cannot deliver, and has not delivered, in relation to the provision of skills. It has not delivered in terms of regional equality, which is why there are regional imbalances in the United Kingdom and across Europe. It has failed to provide investment—the seedcorn for research and development and for the development of new technologies and ideas.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: The hon. Gentleman has talked a great deal about unemployment in relation to competitiveness. Does he agree that, when competitiveness was operating at its best in this country—during the 1980s—we created more jobs than all other European countries put together? Having just returned from the United States, does he not agree that, unless we as a Community put the right level of research and development into our industry, we shall never be competitive? Will he therefore deal with the amendment and talk about research and development and competitiveness, not about economic policy?

Mr. Fatchett: I am delighted that the hon. Gentleman seems to be picking up the point that I was making. He may later be drawn into conversation with one or two of his hon. Friends. My point, with which he now seems to agree and about which he needs to persuade his ministerial colleagues with reference to the United Kingdom, is that we cannot merely leave the market to deliver in certain respects.

I now deal with one or two of the issues to which I drew attention earlier. The first is regional imbalances. It is clear that Governments of all parties have recognised that there are social inequalities because of imbalances among regions. That is why Governments of all parties have had regional policies for the past 30 years and why there is a need for intervention in the market. If we leave the direction and location of industry to the marketplace alone, we shall, as in the past, see the south-east prospering while other parts of the country do not. That is why we have all accepted the need for an industrial policy to deal with regional disparities.

Mr. Budgen rose——

Mr. Fatchett: No, I must continue. I have given way to the hon. Gentleman three times—I am sure there must be some biblical reference there. I must make some progress.

It is because of the market that Governments have recognised the need to intervene to provide education and training to deal with our skills deficit. Our criticism of the Government is that they have not done enough and that, in terms of skill, there is a real danger that we shall lag behind other countries.

Mr. Richard Shepherd: The hon. Gentleman is moving an amendment—there is a point to make.

Mr. Fatchett: I shall not give way to a sedentary intervention. If the hon. Gentleman allows me to make a little progress, I shall give way to him.

I was saying that Governments have intervened. I share the view, which has been expressed strongly by my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition, that the United Kingdom economy will compete effectively only if we deal with our skills deficit and shortages. That means that we need more investment in education and training.

The same applies to research and development. Because of our failure through the market to provide long-term research and development and long-term investment for research and development, the Government have intervened, often with very limited resources, to ensure that British industry and higher education have the opportunity to develop new techniques, new research and development and new ideas. As a country which recognises the need for an industrial strategy, we must ensure that our research and development is able to compete with that of other countries.

Mr. Richard Shepherd rose——

Mr. Fatchett: Let me finish this point.

The first assumption behind any industrial policy is that the market alone cannot deliver, which is why there is a need for intervention. That issue clearly unites the Opposition and it is why we, like virtually every industrial organisation in the country, have been asking for an industrial policy and why we shall continue to bang on the door for such a policy.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Fatchett: The hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) has been the most persistent. I shall then give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton).

Mr. Richard Shepherd: I understand the Labour party's position and, of course, through Maastricht, the Government support the hon. Gentleman's contentions. The Labour party could win an election and determine those priorities for itself. The difficulty under Maastricht is that they would then be subject to qualified majority voting. What if the balance of the argument goes against Britain as being an area in which investment should be made? We know that moneys from the cohesion funds will be directed to our competitors in the south and around the Mediterranean. Therefore, such judgments would no longer be within the call of a future or prospective Labour Government and are outside the call of the House. The hon. Gentleman may in fact, by his argument, be undermining British industrial competitiveness because of the distribution of resources elsewhere.

Mr. Fatchett: I fear that in many respects the hon. Gentleman fails to understand the way in which industrial capital has developed in recent decades. We now live in a global economy, and the notion that we can isolate one economy from the others is wholly out of date. The same applies to an industrial policy. We must ensure that, at certain levels, there is co-operation. The hon. Gentleman recognises that as part of industrial policy. The notion that we can develop an economy and an industrial policy which is circumscribed by one set of geopraphical boundaries is out of date.

Mr. Spearing: Like all our colleagues, I agree with what my hon. Friend says about market forces and their limitations in innovation and investment. However, I draw his attention to the numerous regulations which pour forth from the Community, relating to grants that the Community makes available to institutions of research and innovation. Is it not a fact that the Community itself, or its insitutions, decides the distribution of those grants for innovation in order that the industrial base of the Community as a whole and not necessarily one part of it can, in the Commission's view, be strengthened? Does that not mean that taxpayers' money from this country can be distributed anywhere that the Commission and the Council decide, and that the House will lose its ability to decide?

Mr. Fatchett: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point, but if he reads some of the figures from the Office of Science and Technology, he will see that, under the European Community research and development programmes—cross-programmes, such as Brite-Euran, Esprit and RACE—the United Kingdom is, although not always, one of the major beneficiaries.

Mr. Spearing: At the moment.

Mr. Fatchett: I can say only that I have a set of figures relating to history as it has so far been written and to events that have taken place; I cannot provide my hon. Friend with predictions about the future. If I could do so, I should probably win the football pools every Saturday afternoon and not be here. The current data show that under the programmes to which he referred, the United Kingdom seems to have done better than other countries.

Mr. Cash: A few moments ago, the hon. Member referred to co-operation, especially in science and technology. It is a very good idea, but article 130h states:

"The Community and the Member States shall co-ordinate their research and technological development . . . so as to ensure that national policies" are consistent with Community policies. That does not mean co-operation; it means that we shall effectively have a Community research and technology policy which will be governed by a central policy, and that will kill scientific diversity and competition. Does he not agree that that would be extremely bad news, according to his own argument in favour of co-operation?

Mr. Fatchett: I always worry when criticism of Ministers' effectiveness in European Community negotiations comes from Conservative Back Benchers. It is perhaps a criticism that we should make. In response to the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash), even under article 130h the British Government, as the Government of a member state, will have the opportunity to influence the development of any research and development policies, and I should have thought——

Mr. Budgen rose——

Mr. Fatchett: No, I shall give way later. In that context, I should have thought that the British Government, who do not have one of the best records in Europe of funding research and development and science, might gain as a result of article 130h, as might the British people and institutions.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Fatchett: I shall make some progress and come to the——

The Chairman: Order. Hon. Members keep standing up in the middle of the hon. Gentleman's speech. He has made it clear that he will give way in a few minutes. Hon. Members must learn to contain themselves.

Mr. Fatchett: You are kind to me, Mr. Morris. I have looked at last week's Hansard and I suspect that I have given way more than anyone else during my speech. I am glad that I have stimulated so much controversy and thought that I have persuaded hon. Members to wish to intervene. I am sure that hon. Members will allow me to make a little progress.

I said some time ago that there were three principles underpinning industrial policy. The first is that the market alone cannot deliver and the second, which is crucial and which will herald a shift in EC policy, is that industry policy must be more than competition.

It was interesting to read the comments of the new EC Commissioner in an interview in last Friday's Financial Times. We always criticised the approach to competition policy taken by the previous Commissioner, Sir Leon Brittan, because he took what we saw as a tight and legalistic approach which did not recognise some of the industrial policy implications. I therefore welcome the statement made by Karel van Miert, the new EC Commissioner for competition policy. In last week's Financial Times, he was quoted as saying:

"competition is not the ultimate goal of the economy. The ultimate goal is for the economy to perform for the people, so that everyone gets his fair share and companies have a good environment to prosper, to invest and to be competitive."

Commissioner van Miert then says that he would take a much more flexible approach to competition. He draws attention to the Franco-Italian takeover of de Havilland, the Canadian aircraft manufacturer. What he says, which is central to Labour's view on industrial policy, is that there must be more than the market and that there must be more than competition. We welcome that development and the statements made by Mr. van Miert.

Mr. Budgen: Many of us who find it difficult to understand the changing views of Opposition and Government Front-Bench Members because of the warm consensus between them would like a summary of the hon. Gentleman's understanding of the difference between the two parties. Is he saying that at Maastricht, the Government became converted to a European industrial policy and that he now welcomes that conversion not only to Euro-enthusiasm, but to socialism, but that if the Labour party became the Government, it would pursue those policies with more vigour and with more liberality?

Mr. Fatchett: I guess that at some stage in the debate we may have the opportunity to find out the Government's position on industrial policy. I shall put a number of questions to the Minister. I suspect that he may be in the best position to answer all the interventions from the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West.

Mr. Roger Knapman (Stroud): The hon. Gentleman is recommending interventionist policies. Some European countries followed such a policy for some years. Why, therefore, has the EC's share of world trade declined from 25·5 per cent. to just 20 per cent. in a decade?

Mr. Fatchett: The hon. Gentleman says that some Governments have followed interventionist policies; others have not. The Government who have clearly followed non-interventionst policies are the United Kingdom Government under Baroness Thatcher. If the hon. Gentleman had been here earlier, he would have noted that I quoted unemployment figures that showed that the British economy had performed less well than other economies had in terms of jobs. The hon. Gentleman needs to answer the question why a non-interventionist Government have had such an appalling record on unemployment.

Mr. Knapman: The point that I am trying to make is that our country's share of world trade has stayed—in fact fractionally increased to more than 8 per cent. The share of the EC as a whole has dropped from 25·5 to 20 per cent. What reason does the hon. Gentleman give for that?

Mr. Fatchett: I ask the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Knapman) to check his figures. His optimistic assumption about Britain's share of world trade is not accurate. The Minister may wish to look at a parliamentary answer he gave me on Thursday. If the hon. Member for Stroud looks at that answer, he will see the figures for Britain's balance of payments in manufactures against those of European Community countries and of Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development countries, and for Britain's share of world trade in manufactures. If he looks at those figures, he will see that his assumption is not wholly valid. I encourage him to do that piece of basic research.

I make three assumptions. The first is that the market alone is not sufficient and the second is that we need a policy that is more than competition. Thirdly, economic policy must have more than one objective. An industry policy via supply side measures supplements macro-economic policy. We believe that an effective and sensible policy for any country needs to be based on four economic criteria: growth, balance of payments, unemployment and inflation. Our criticism of the Government is that they have concentrated almost wholly on one criterion of economic success—inflation.

The cost of that policy to British manufacturing industry, to industry generally and to British economic performance has been great. It is easy enough to squeeze inflation out of the system. The real economic skills and success is to get a balance between the four economic objectives: growth, the balance of payments, jobs and inflation. The Government have failed to do that.

We believe that an effective industry policy acts as a vital supplement to effective macro-economic policies. Such a policy helps supply-side factors and it creates the conditions in which British industry will be able to perform. That is why we seek an economic policy for Europe and for the United Kingdom which emphasises growth and jobs. I commend to my right hon. and hon. Friends and to Conservative Members the comments made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), the leader of the Labour party, in a speech last Friday.

My right hon. and learned Friend said:

"There is clearly a danger"—

he was talking about European recession—

"that this may occur if the fiscal deficit rules of the Maastricht Treaty are rigidly interpreted. An excessively strict application of the protocol which specifies a target of 3 per cent. for government deficits would compound the existing financial squeeze which has been caused by high interests rates in Germany.

If all member states of the EC tried to satisfy the 3 per cent. target by the end of 1996, for example, (the earliest possible date for the rule to apply) the combined effect on total EC output would be a reduction of over 2 per cent. This is obviously absurd and simply not feasible for a majority of member states of the Community."

My right hon. and learned Friend's point is crucial. We need an economic policy that relates to all four criteria: growth, balance of payments, unemployment and inflation. Those criteria must be given equal importance and equal emphasis in terms of policy development. That is why we have seen industrial policy as a supplement to achieving those objectives of growth and of job creation.

It is worth taking the House back to the comments made by the new EC competition Commissioner. His words could have been those of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East. The Commissioner said:

"The ultimate goal is for the economy to perform for the people, so that everyone gets his fair share and companies have a good environment to prosper, to invest and to be competitive."

That means more than one economic objective and not just squeezing inflation out of the system. It means having low inflation, growth, jobs and a balance of payments position that is manageable. That is the objective of an industrial policy that will supplement the supply side policy.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): I have listened carefully, but I am afraid that I am not quite clear on this point. Is my hon. Friend suggesting that our erstwhile leader was disagreeing with the straitjacket being imposed by the 3 per cent. or that he was simply disagreeing with the percentage that was being imposed? The point is important. There were other aspects of that speech that I found a little difficult to understand and I mildly resented being called a barnacle.

Mr. Fatchett: I certainly did not call my hon. Friend that.

Mrs. Dunwoody: No, the reference was in the speech to which my hon. Friend has referred.

Mr. Fatchett: I am not sure whether that reference is in the speech. I will pass my script to my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody). She referred to my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition as our erstwhile leader. I am not sure whether that was an accurate description—unless there has been a palace revolution to which no reference has been made.

In respect of a further recession, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East said:

"There is clearly a danger that this may occur if the fiscal deficit rules of the Maastricht Treaty are rigidly interpreted."

That has been Labour's position throughout. There is concern about the fiscal and deficit rules and an argument that they cannot and should not be interpreted rigidly.

Mrs. Dunwoody: With respect to my hon. Friend, I am still not clear what he is saying. Do we totally accept the straitjacket of the 3 per cent. while we disagree only with the size of the percentage?

Mr. Fatchett: I am not sure why my hon. Friend is in such difficulty. The point is that Labour looks for a range of economic goals which include inflation, growth and job creation. We believe that they are the key economic convergence criteria. We have said that consistently.

Against that backcloth, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East has made an important intervention. He has stated clearly that if there is a very strict interpretation of the fiscal deficit rules, there will be a further push into recession. If my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich reads more of the speech, she will discover that my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East also refers to ways in which the rules can be interpreted more flexibly and more loosely.

Mr. Cash: It appears that the Leader of the Opposition now has serious doubts about the basis upon which the Opposition have entered into collusive understanding with the Government Front Bench in respect of the convergence and budget deficit arrangements prescribed under the Maastricht treaty. Does not the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) agree——

The Chairman: Order. Before the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) continues, I should say that the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) was referring to industrial policy, but he strayed into convergence and other matters to do with the Leader of the Opposition. The group of amendments that we are discussing are related to industrial policy, research and development and in particular, areas related to article 130. The hon. Member for Leeds, Central was being very tight in his speech and I congratulate him on that. I hope that we can continue with that tightness.

Mr. Budgen: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. Will you reconsider your ruling in that regard? The hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) made it quite clear that, in his opinion, industrial policy leads to objectives about growth, inflation and the balance of payments, all of which are generally regarded as wider economic issues. If the hon. Gentleman is allowed to discuss those points, surely the rest of the House should be able to do so as well.

Mr. Richard Shepherd: Further to that point of order, Mr. Morris. As I understand it, you said that the points that have been raised had no bearing on the amendments. However, I suggest that they should be considered in the sense that competitiveness is affected and the amendment seeks to remove powers to ensure the competitiveness of industry. Therefore, matters that have a bearing on the competitiveness of industry are surely within the call of the Committee.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): Further to that point of order, Mr. Morris. Bearing in mind the fact that later groupings of amendments deal with European monetary union, cohesion policy and many of the issues that are in dispute at the moment, when we reach those amendments, can we take into account the amount of time that we are spending on these amendments?

The Chairman: I am grateful to all hon. Members. So long as the hon. Member for Leeds, Central related his comments specifically to industrial policy, he was in order. Understandably, in his discussion with the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), he was tempted a little away from that. I hope that we can now return to that course.

Mr. Cash: Further to that point of order, Mr. Morris. You raised a point in respect to something that I was saying and not with respect to the comments of the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett).

The Chairman: The hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) was echoing and encouraging the hon. Member for Leeds, Central to go further down that road. It seemed to me to be entirely wrong of him to do that. Perhaps we can now get on.

Several Hon. Members rose——

The Chairman: Order. I call Mr. Skinner.

Mr. Skinner: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. As Chairman of this Committee, will you explain to me how it is possible to discuss industrial policy without referring to economic policy or the balance of payments. If we have an industrial policy that ends up with a £14 billion balance of payments deficit after this recession, that must affect industrial policy one way or the other. How can we eliminate the argument about growth? Since I have been a Member of this place, I have always believed that all those things hang together. I find it crazy for you to be ruling in this fashion.

The Chairman: The hon. Gentleman is correct in so far as there can be allusion to all those points. However, there is a great difference between allusions to an exchange rate or other elements of policy when there are specific amendments on the Order Paper. It may have been some time since hon. Members have been in Committee. They should remember that, when we are discussing amendments, although hon. Members may allude to other elements that affect the amendments, the primary discussion must be about the amendment. That is the only point that I am making to the Committee. The Committee should bear that in mind.

Mr. Budgen: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. May I suggest that there is a good deal of truth in the suggestions of the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner)? It seems to be the wish of the Committee to have, if possible, a slightly wider debate on the amendments. May I suggest that there was at the very least a grave misunderstanding about the decisions that were taken last week on the wider debate which, Mr. Morris, you may recall was concluded with the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) being somewhat disconcerted. There is a need for some flexibility on a wider debate. When we tried to have a wider debate last week, my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Sweeney) had been sitting here for three days and my hon. Friend the Member for——

The Chairman: Order. I probably know better than any hon. Member who was sitting in the Chamber during the previous four days and I probably know better than any hon. Member how long they had sat here.

Mr. Budgen: With great respect——

The Chairman: Order. I do not believe that the hon. Gentleman is showing great respect. We have had four days debating the titles, which were very broad areas of debate and purposely so. We are now moving to specific areas. I have made it clear that there can be allusions to exchange rate policy, devaluation and floating exchange rates and even to the coal mines that were referred to at the beginning of the debate. However, there are specific amendments on the Order Paper and the Committee has charged the Chair with having a debate on them. That is what I am trying to ensure happens. The fact that certain hon. Members have not sat on Committees perhaps for a fair amount of time and have forgotten how a Committee works means that it is my job to remind them of that.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): On a point of order, Mr. Morris.

The Chairman: I will take a point of order from Mr. Walker.

Mr. Budgen: If I might raise another point of order, Mr. Morris.

The Chairman: I will accept one more point of order from the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West.

Mr. Budgen: Of course I accept that you will undoubtedly have made a note of the right hon. and hon. Members on the Conservative Benches who rose last week. On the other hand, you may not wish to tell the Committee or give publicity to that number. Those of us who felt aggrieved and made a note of the number of Members who tried to speak may have a different purpose. I accept that you know, but the country may not know the extent to which those who had general views which they wished to express were unhappily stifled.

The Chairman: I will not hark back to last week. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that.

Several Hon. Members rose——

The Chairman: Order. I must place on the record the fact that, prior to our proceedings today, the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West has contributed more than 15 minutes—which, for some hon. Members, is long enough for a speech—simply on points of order and interventions.

Mr. Budgen: What is wrong with that?

The Chairman: I am not saying that there is anything wrong with that. I am saying that the hon. Gentleman has had a fair voice, and I hope that the country has listened to him.

Mr. Bill Walker: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I apologise for arriving late. As you probably know, my constituency is suffering very substantially. I was wandering around in my welly boots trying to find some answers to our ghastly problems.

You will be aware, Mr. Morris, that we are not about to discuss the broad issues on which we have had four days debate and in respect of which closures were accepted. We have had four days debate on the broad issues affecting the removal of one section and then the removal of others, which of course did not take place. I am the only Scottish Conservative Member whose views on Maastricht are different from those of members of the Government Front Bench, but I was not given an opportunity to express them even though they are widely held throughout Scotland. The closure motion by the Liberal Democrats on the first two days prevented a Scottish Conservative Member from being called. On the third and fourth days, I was not called.

In order to express my views and those that are held by many people in my constituency in Scotland, one will have to include in the range of amendments matters affecting finance, and so on.

The Chairman: I am sorry, but I have to inform the hon. Gentleman, who had the floor for 10 minutes prior to the debate today, that he will not be in order to bring in major matters of finance. He may allude to them. I repeat that the amendments are about industrial, consumer, commercial and agricultural issues, and they primarily refer to article 130. I ask hon. Members not to continue to rise but to read article 130 and refresh their memories on that point.

The Chairman: No "furthers". I call Mr. Marlow.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): On a totally different point of order, Mr. Morris. I hope that you do not mind my raising it. A few minutes ago you referred to the hon. Gentleman who had the floor. I have been here for about 14 years and you have been here much longer than that, and very welcome you have been in the House all that time. I do not think that I had ever heard the expression "the hon. Gentleman who has the floor" until about a year ago. We have heard "the hon. Gentleman who was speaking", "the hon. Gentleman who caught my eye", and "the hon. Gentleman who was on his feet".

"Having the floor" is an expression that is used in European Parliaments or other nation state Parliaments in Europe. This place was in being for about 700 years before the European Parliament was a twinkle in anybody's eye. I wonder whether it would be more appropriate to maintain our procedures and expressions rather than adopt those of institutions that are much younger than ours.

The Chairman: I have certainly used the phrase "the hon. Gentleman who has the floor" in Committee. It is a perfectly normal term and it has been used in many Committees. I see nothing wrong with the terminology.

Several Hon. Members rose——

The Chairman: Order. I am not taking any more points of order on that matter. [Interruption.] Order. I choose the language that I wish to express in a situation. Hon. Members have to accept that.

Several Hon. Members rose——

The Chairman: I hope that they are totally new points of order. I have dealt with the point by the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) about— [Interruption.] I have, with respect. Perhaps if he rises in his place we will see whether he can be called today. The hon. Members for Aldridge-Brownhills and for Stafford (Mr. Cash) have already spoken at some considerable length. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills, too, has had the floor before today for only four minutes—he is quite correct—but he has been making up for it this afternoon. Nevertheless, I call Mr. Shepherd, but it must be a new point of order.

Mr. Richard Shepherd: With respect, Mr. Morris, I have sat in the Chamber much longer than you have during the debate. My point of order relates to article 130, the very first words of which—forgive me for not having my glasses on—says:

"The Community and the Member States shall ensure that the conditions necessary for the competitiveness of the Community's industry exist."

Your ruling a little earlier about what one may choose to refer to seems to indicate a very limiting context. What is competitiveness unless it is formed by all elements, such as exchange rates, cohesion and diversion of investment? All those matters affect competitiveness. How can one discuss competitiveness without discussing the nature of those arrangements?

The Chairman: The hon. Gentleman is right. There is a major element to do with competition, but a whole host of matters affect competition. If the hon. Gentleman would, with respect—I do not mean this facetiously—re-read article 130, he will see that there are large elements about encouraging an environment favourable to initiative" and co-operation, and so on. Those are the main elements of article 130 and competition policy is a part of it as well, but the point that I am making to the Committee is that, in terms of cohesion, we have some specific amendments. I am thinking of 20 amendments on cohesion policy. It is appropriate to develop the whole of that argument. Today it is more appropriate to develop industrial policy and to make allusions to cohesion; otherwise we will just have a general debate from now until we reach Third Reading, and that would not be in the interests of what hon. Members want. I am here to serve the Committee and to try to keep the Committee in order.

"speeding up the adjustment of industry to structural changes;

Mr. Cash: On a point of order, Mr. Morris.

The Chairman: I call Mr. Cash with a final point of order, I hope.

Mr. Cash: Would it be possible for the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) to resume the debate? This waste of time has arisen because I merely mentioned the word "convergence". You have raised with me, Mr. Morris, the question whether that was in order. As a result of what you have said, it has now been conceded that it was. If the hon. Gentleman could now proceed, we could pick up where we left off.

Mr. Budgen: On a point of order, Mr. Morris.

The Chairman: The hon. Gentleman is approaching this matter in a very relaxed manner. Is it a new point of order?

Mr. Budgen: It is a new point of order.

The Chairman: The emphasis is on the word "new".

Mr. Budgen: It is new.

The Chairman: It is a new point of order. Thank you.

Mr. Budgen: If I could conclude by putting on the record that these points of order flow inevitably from the sense of outrage in the Committee that further——

The Chairman: Order. That is not a new point of order; it is not a point for the Chair. If the hon. Gentleman feels a sense of outrage, I regret that.

Mr. Bill Walker: On a point of order, Mr. Morris.

The Chairman: Is it a new point of order and not the one that the hon. Gentleman raised earlier?

Mr. Walker: It is a new point of order.

The Chairman: All right.

Mr. Walker: I seek your guidance, Mr. Morris. This is a United Kingdom Parliament, and the future of this Parliament vitally depends on the Union that took place in 1707. I have raised this matter a number of times and I have had some difficulty in following the changes that have been made to the 1707 Act of Union. It will not surprise you that I have spent a lifetime in politics on that topic. I do not wish to bore the House tonight, but my concern is the future of this unitary Parliament and it has little to do with expressing personal views or obtaining extra time. I believe that this Parliament is now at greater risk than at any time since 1707. [Interruption.]

The Chairman: Order. That comment could have been made on Second Reading. Nevertheless, I call Mr. Fatchett.

Mr. Richard Shepherd: On a totally new point of order, Mr. Morris. [Interruption.]

The Chairman: Order. I will call the hon. Gentleman, but I ask the Committee to recognise that the hon. Gentleman who was speaking wishes to develop his speech and to continue it. We have now spent 15 minutes on several points of order whch were not in order and one or two that were in order. I hope that this is a new point of order and that it is a specific point of order for the Chair.

Mr. Shepherd: You mentioned, Mr. Morris, that I had spoken for four minutes and you mentioned that another hon. Member had spoken for a length of time. In fact, I have not yet made a speech in Committee, as you will be well aware. I have not had an opportunity to express views or opinions other than to try to elicit information. Is it the practice, or is the Chair giving a ruling, that the length of time in an unguillotined Committee stage, and one that is subject to the acceptance of the closure only by yourself, will be a material factor in whether hon. Members are called, and in the length or shape of the debate and the freedom of speech in the Committee?

The Chairman: The answer to the hon. Gentleman's question is no.

Mr. Fatchett: It is difficult to maintain the flow of a speech after a break of a quarter of an hour. If Conservative Members wish to raise another batch of points of order, perhaps they could inform me in advance, and I can go and have a cup of tea.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney) rose——

Mr. Fatchett: I shall take one more intervention, before finishing my speech.

Mr. Shore: My question relates directly to industrial policy. I share my hon. Friend's view of the inadequacy of market determination in the future of our industries. However, I am not clear about the role that European industrial policy is to play, as distinct from the research and development, education and training policies, which are also linked. Will my hon. Friend say something about that? What is article 130 about in terms of the amendment? What will it allow the Community to do that it did not previously have the power to do?

Mr. Fatchett: I think that my right hon. Friend must have had the opportunity to look at my notes during the substantial break for points of order. The next few points that I was about to make are as follows. First, does the Minister accept the principles that I proposed in terms of industrial policy? Do the Government share those principles? If so, why is there a distance between those principles and the application of industrial policy in the United Kingdom?

Secondly—to pick up the point of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore)—how do the Government define industrial policy under article 130? How do they define European Community industrial policy? Is that policy more than research and development, more than providing help to small and medium-sized businesses and more than the development of skills at national and company level? If it is, will the Minister describe what he and the Government mean by industrial policy and how much money the Government would allocate to those policies?

Mr. Leighton: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Fatchett: I must continue, as I know that it will frustrate all those Conservative Members who are keen to intervene in the debate if I take too long and they do not have an opportunity to speak.

Will the Minister describe exactly what the Government mean by industrial policy? What will be determined at European Community level and what at the United Kingdom level? Where does the principle of subsidiarity apply to industrial policy?

The Opposition favour an active industrial policy and active intervention in the market. We strongly believe that the market alone cannot deliver an efficient economy, high levels of employment and good social provision, and that the Government must perform that role. It has become clear during the current policy debate that those with free market views are now on the defensive. In the 1990s the free market has failed to deliver in the way in which those who support the free market claim that it should.

The role of Government intervention is once again back on the agenda. We support Government intervention in the marketplace, which is why we support an industrial policy. We have argued for that and will continue to do so. We support article 130 because we support the principle of an industrial policy. What do the Government mean by an industrial policy? Why have they changed their position on an industrial policy from a national one to a European Community one?

I think that we shall have an interesting debate and I look forward to the divisions that will emerge among Conservative Members of the Committee. The Opposition are keen to have a Europe that emphasises growth, jobs and the provision of social facilities. That is why we seek this debate on industrial policy.

5.45 pm

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Tristan Garel-Jones): Amendment No. 1 embraces many of the other amendments in the group. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett)—as I am sure the Committee is—for stating that he will not press the amendment to a Division. I agree that the amendment provides the House with an opportunity to debate the industrial, consumer, commercial and research and development policies of the Community.

The issues under discussion are, by and large, covered in the treaty of Rome and the Single European Act. Therefore, incorporation of the issues in the Maastricht treaty does not signify a particularly dramatic departure from existing Community practice. Whereas new chapters were included in the treaty for the first time on industrial and consumer issues, action was already possible under the treaty of Rome. Consumer protection legislation has been an important element of the single market programme.

Issues under discussion all fall within title II of the Maastricht treaty and amend the treaty of Rome. All the provisions are capable of action at Community level and are ultimately justiciable before the European Court of Justice. The principle of subsidiarity will apply in relation to those issues and others covered by the treaty. Her Majesty's Government will ensure that action respects that principle.

The amendments largely echo the arguments relating to the debate on the development of the Community held in the House in the mid-1980s and before. Amendments Nos. 358 and 361, in the name of the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) remove the establishment of the internal market as one of the Community's objectives. I cannot believe that hon. Members would seriously wish to undermine the achievement of the creation of the single market less than a month after the United Kingdom presidency has brought the project to a successful conclusion.

Amendment No. 1 takes issue with the functioning of research and development policy as it has devolved under the Single European Act. I accept, of course, that the hon. Member for Leeds, Central moved the amendment to stimulate a debate. The Parliamentary Secretary, Office of Public Service and Science, my hon. Friend the Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson), who is present in the Chamber, can confirm that the United Kingdom has benefited from Community research and development policy and there is no case for reversing that achievement of the Single European Act.

A further characteristic of some of the issues under discussion is the influence that the United Kingdom can exert on the negotiating processes through the unanimity provisions negotiated at Maastricht. That does not apply to all sectors, but action under the industry title can be taken only with the agreement of all member states. The retention of unanimity when agreeing the research and development framework programmes allows the United Kingdom to play a decisive role in shaping future research and development policy.

One element that I believe will emerge from the detailed debate is the extent to which the Maastricht treaty—as it affects the specific issues under debate today—marks a substantial improvement in the position of the United Kingdom Government after the Single European Act.

Mr. Marlow: I totally agree with my right hon. Friend, and I believe that the single market is important. However, I question the extent to which we have achieved it. Let us consider two important industries in this country: steel and coal. The hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) made an apposite point when he asked whether there was a single market in the coal industry. The same could be said of the steel industry. Our coal and steel industries are more effective and efficient than others in the Community, but the others are larded with direct and indirect Government subsidies and other support, to the disadvantage of our industries. So there does not appear to be a single market in coal or steel.

Will my right hon. Friend point out to the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) what regional policy means—which is, that we shall have to put more of our money into the Community budget to be spent in other parts of the Community?

Mr. Garel-Jones: Of course I agree that the establishment of a single market in which anti-competitive practices are wholly eliminated would be a perfect state of grace, but I doubt whether the Community will ever attain it. The United Kingdom Government made it perfectly clear when we announced on 31 December that the single market was "complete" that the struggle to maintain competitiveness and to seek to eliminate uncompetitive practices must continue unabated—as the Communists would have said, "La lutta continua".

My hon. Friend referred to regional policy, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) in a characteristically moderate intervention. I say "moderate" because he asserted that the Community was a machine for idealistic socialism. In that, he was rather more moderate than our hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) who believes it to be a machine for communism. So I commend my hon. Friend's restraint.

Opposition Members believe the treaty to be an unbridled machine for the pursuit of capitalism and market economics. My belief is that the treaty of Rome does not fulfil for Europe Professor Fukuyama's prediction that history is over. It merely provides a framework within which European socialists—or whatever they call themselves these days—and those of us who are part of the centre-right family of European political parties will pursue the sort of market-oriented policies in which we have always believed.

It is worth remembering that the agreed seven-year financial perspective running through to 1999 will by then have involved an increase in the total public expenditure of the United Kingdom of 0·1 per cent. That is certainly a large figure—it is £200 million—but it is a very much smaller figure than the one that we agreed to at the time of the Single European Act.

One should also bear in mind the fact that the cohesion countries would say that their chemical, insurance, brewing and service industries are increasingly being taken over by large transnational companies based in the United Kingdom, Holland and Germany, producing enormous benefits for those latter countries. So even the large sums of money which will be spent on cohesion and on improving the trans-European network—roads, communications, and so on—will rebound to the benefit of British companies and industries which are making inroads into important sectors of industry in southern Europe, to the benefit of workers and investors in our country.

Mr. Budgen: Is it a fair summary to say that, at both Maastricht and Edinburgh, the Government made substantial concessions for the cohesion fund, and that the hon. Member for Leeds, Central was thus perfectly right to say that the Government had made a substantial concession? They had agreed to the principle of socialist intervention, so the only difference between the Front-Bench spokesmen—who so often agree on these subjects—is that the Government agree in principle to this socialist intervention but do not wish to spend quite so much money as the Opposition do.

Mr. Garel-Jones: That is not a correct appraisal. There is certainly no collusion between Opposition and Government Front-Bench spokesmen: there is consensus about policy, which is quite different. The only collusion of which I am aware is that between my hon. Friend and some of his colleagues and certain Opposition Members. That collusion is perfectly legitimate. They are a tiny minority in the House and if they are to have any impact on our debates it is perfectly understandable that there should be cross-party collusion on this matter.

I hate to disappoint my hon. Friend by saying that, although there is no collusion on our part, there is an element of consensus about our membership of the Community. To make a point at the expense of the Opposition: if our party has stood for anything over the past 20 or 30 years it has stood, first, for our independent nuclear deterrent; secondly, for our belief in social market economics—I see my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West frowning, so I will leave out the word "social" for his benefit; and thirdly, for our membership of the European Economic Community.

By consistently standing on those issues, our party has won three large victories. By opposing them for the past 20 or 30 years, the Opposition have produced a generation of politicians looking at us now—people who by and large have been deprived of office—[Interruption.] I seem to hear my hon. Friend asking for a referendum. The last time I spoke to him he was not in favour of one, but my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) was prominent in arranging a protest in favour of a referendum last Sunday——

Mr. Leighton: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. How does a referendum relate to industrial policy?

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): We are indeed straying rather wide of the amendment.

Mr. Budgen: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I support my hon. Friend the Minister in referring to a referendum, and suggest that you——

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. I have just ruled that out of order.

Mr. Garel-Jones: As you would expect, Mr. Lofthouse, I respect your ruling. When we come to certain other amendments which have been selected, I shall torture my hon. Friend about referendums later.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow) rose——

Mr. Cash rose——

Mr. Garel-Jones: I am told by those who advise me that in my two speeches before the Committee thus far I have given way 50 times, as my hon. Friends would expect me to, but I also intend to do my best to get what I need to say on the record and to make some progress, so that other right hon. and hon. Members will not be disappointed when they try to speak. I shall give way to my hon. Friends after making a little more progress.

The emphasis of the new industry chapter on the creation of a favourable environment for industry is directly in line with United Kingdom policy. The industry chapter will not open up European industry to policies which are interventionist or dirigiste. The unanimous voting provisions of the chapter are welcome to the Government. Under the Single European Act, the Community could already adopt measures affecting industry through the internal market by qualified majority voting, by the research and development provisions and, of course, through article 235. Only measures supported by all member states will be acceptable under article 130. The United Kingdom attaches particular importance to the explicit statement that article 130 does not provide a basis for Community measures that would distort competition. Free and fair competition is essential to the functioning of the single market.

Mr. Gill: My right hon. Friend spoke about trans-European networks. My constituents who go to other member states see enormous amounts of European Community money being spent on roads and other infrastructure. That happens in countries whose populations are sparser than in Shropshire, but in some parts of that county it is impossible in some places to get roads that are wide enough for two vehicles. How can I explain to my constituents that their money can be spent in southern Europe and even in Madeira, whose population is smaller than that of Shropshire, when they have to put up with an antiquated and totally inadequate road system?

Mr. Garel-Jones: I shall try to help my hon. Friend in two ways. I would tell his constituents, as I could tell everybody in Britain, that the United Kingdom is lucky to have about a third of the major transnational companies in the Community. Those companies, which provide employment and wealth for my hon. Friend's constituents and for mine, are making large and successful investments in the industries in which Britain is especially good. Insurance is a good example. That is thanks not least to the removal of anti-competitive practices in other European markets. Such investments and services provide substantial benefits for our constituents.

A substantial British transnational company has just made a huge investment in southern Spain. If such a company seeks to move consumer products not just in Spain but around the Community, it is in the company's interests that the road and rail network be as efficient and as well invested in as possible. Of the three substantial contributors to the European Community—the Federal Republic of Germany, the French Republic and ourselves—the Federal Republic contributes about 30 per cent. of the cohesion fund, the French Republic contributes about 20 per cent. and, because of our abatement, we contribute about 5 per cent. I think that those percentages are right, but I am quoting off the top of my head. Even by 1997, the total increase in Community spending to which we agreed will represent only 0·1 per cent. of total public expenditure in Britain. My hon. Friend's constituents and mine are getting a jolly good bargain.

Mr. Rowlands: I am following the thrust of the Minister's argument, but I want to make sure that I understand it properly. Is he saying that all the provisions of article 130 on industry and research and technology do not in any way enhance the competence or the responsibilities of the Commission and the Community in those fields?

Mr. Garel-Jones: I am saying more than that, and I shall deal with the issue in more detail later. In some specific areas—education and health are good examples, and I shall deal with them in detail later—the position of the United Kingdom is substantially improved compared with that which pertained under the Single European Act to which my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) is so attached.

Mr. Cash rose——

Mr. Garel-Jones: I shall make a little more progress and then give way to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Shore: Will the Minister further clarify that point?

Mr. Garel-Jones: I shall not give way to the right hon. Gentleman, who has trailed his question. I shall clarify the matter later and give way to the right hon. Gentleman when I have done so.

I should like to deal with the common commercial policy and refer to article 3 and the extension of Community competence. The common commercial policy has been at the heart of the European Community's activities since its inception in 1957. It is a basic provision of the treaty of Rome, and its importance has been reaffirmed in all subsequent amendments to the treaty, including those advanced by the treaty on European union.

The new title updates the existing provision and in addition—this is one of the areas in which there has been substantial improvement—removes the obligation under article 116 of the treaty of Rome, as amended by the Single European Act, on member states to co-ordinate their positions where there is no established EC competence in the area. We shall continue to act together, because in most cases it is in our best interests to do so. As before, there is no provision for European Parliament involvement. The new titles should reinforce transparency and predictability in the Community's trading patterns with the rest of the world.

Article 3 is billed in shock-horror terms by some hon. Members as containing new competences. It lists the Community's activities. The list is longer in the Maastricht treaty than in the treaty of Rome, as amended by the Single European Act. That is because the list has been extended to include references to the new competence chapters included in the Maastricht treaty for the first time. Nine new policy areas are listed in article 3, but that does not mean that there are nine new areas of competence. In all these areas, competence has already been exercised under the provisions of the treaty of Rome and the Single European Act.

Mr. Cash rose——

Mr. Garel-Jones: I shall give way later to my hon. Friend with relish. I think that my hon. Friend remains a staunch defender of the Single European Act. I shall seek to establish that the matters that I am about to enunciate are an improvement on that Act and why the position that he supported with such enthusiasm in 1985-86 can be supported now. I shall explain how the Maastricht treaty codifies and clarifies competence in these areas, extends it to a small degree and contains it to a large degree. Article 126 deals with education——

Mr. Budgen: Will my right hon. Friend give way? [Interruption.]

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. The Minister will be aware that education is the subject of another debate.

Mr. Garel-Jones: With respect, Mr. Lofthouse, we are dealing with article 3 and the competences that it lists. Although I stand to be corrected by you, Mr. Lofthouse, one of those competences——

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. The Minister should address article 130.

Mr. Budgen: Perhaps I may be allowed to defend my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash). My hon. Friend voted for the Single European Act, and some of us have teased him about that, but he did not do it with any enthusiasm. Like many Conservative Members, he did it out of mistaken loyalty to the Government; it was a good illustration of how the House often does not represent the true views either of the Tory party or of the nation.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I realise that my hon. Friend frequently regards support for the Government as mistaken.

Mr. Budgen: Sometimes it is.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I agree that that is sometimes the view, but some of us have not consistently taken it. I have dealt with the common commercial policy.

Mr. Marlow: My right hon. Friend made a robust defence of the cohesion fund, and said that to a certain extent it is in Britain's interests. He said that the fund is to be spent on infrastructure projects to help trade within the Community. Will he confirm that the fund will be spent on nothing other than infrastructure projects to help trade within the Community. Will he confirm that the fund will be spent on nothing other than infrastructure projects? Will it be spent only on transport?

Mr. Garel-Jones: Of course I cannot confirm that. I am simply giving it as an illustration. I was invited by my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) to illustrate why it was that the cohesion fund could be seen as beneficial to his constituents. I gave him an example. No doubt, when we come to debate the cohesion fund in detail, I shall be able to provide my hon. Friend with many other examples.

Mr. Shore: Article 130 is at the heart of the debate. Will the Minister make it clear whether anything in it deals precisely with industrial policy? By that, I do not mean research and development, education and trade. Does anything in it add anything to, or take anything from, what was previously available under the treaty of Rome or the Single European Act?

Mr. Garel-Jones: The answer is virtually no. The only additions were inserted at the request of the United Kingdom. They include, for example, the last sentence of article 130, which reads:

"This Title shall not provide a basis for the introduction by the Community of any measure which could lead to a distortion of competition."

I see my advisers nodding. That sentence was new and was inserted at the express intervention of the United Kingdom and will give comfort to those Opposition Members who seek, quite contrary to what my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West is doing, to demonstrate that the whole of the treaty is a capitalist plot.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): I have been following the Minister's arguments, in which he has denied that there is any potential for an increase in competence over industrial affairs—the point addressed in the amendments. Will he accept that, as the European Community grows and as we see changes in the patterns of companies and transnational activities, there may need to be increased competence to ensure that the European Community is able to deal with companies which may be so large that a single member state could not deal with them?

Mr. Garel-Jones: Of course I agree with that. One of the points that I made when I appeared before the Select Committee the other day was that one of the advantages of the Commission is that it is not a member state. Like all others, our member state would protect and support its industries up to a point. Some industrial practices and environmental policies will require a strong Commission which is not a member state and does not have the competing vested interest that any member state will have.

In view of your strictures, Mr. Lofthouse, I shall not extend myself on my next point. No doubt I shall have opportunities to do so later. The education competence in article 126 states clearly that the content of teaching and the organisation of the education system are for member states. Community competence is limited to co-operation among member states—teacher and student exchanges, for example. I believe that most hon. Members will support those new competences. As a further barrier to creeping competence, all harmonising measures are specifically excluded, and those words are repeated again and again in the so-called new competences.

In addition, if that were not enough of an improvement on the Single European Act, under which such matters were dealt with by a simple majority, it is now levered up to qualified majority voting. In many other instances, we shall discover as we go through the will the improvements that have been made. In some sectors this will involve the extension of competence, but in many it will tighten and define competence. As the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) rightly pointed out, there are no substantial changes over the Single European Act other than, through our successful intervention, the introduction of the sentence that I read out.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): The Minister is being generous in giving way. I should like to put on the record the fact that some hon. Members—their number is not confined to Liberal Democrats—do not regard qualified majority voting as a bad thing and also consider that bringing in a unanimity rule, which is another word for veto, is often a barrier to progress.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Yes, I understand that. I do not regard qualified majority voting as necessarily a bad thing. Indeed, one of the reasons why I and so many of my hon. Friends supported the Single European Act was that it introduced into the Community the greatest measure of qualified majority voting that has ever been introduced in one single dollop.

Mr. Budgen: Yes.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I am glad that my hon. Friend agrees with that. We did that for the very reason that the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) set out—because we appreciated that, in our drive towards a single market, the vested interests of single member states might prove such that we would never make any progress.

My noble Friend Lady Thatcher, then the Prime Minister, calculated that the liberal instincts of the British Government would put us in the position where it would be extremely rare that we would be out-voted. I think that I am right to say that we have been out-voted on only four occasions throughout the whole process of negotiations on the single market. My noble Friend was right in calculating that, in our drive to obtain the single market, it would be in our interests to go for qualified majority voting was right. Some member states have been out-voted more often than us in one day.

Mr. Budgen: Lady Thatcher gave her support to the Single European Act because she made two false assumptions. The first was that she would be the Prime Minister and leader of the Tory party for a long time. Secondly, she believed that the Tory party would always be in power and would always control things in Europe. As my right hon. Friend knew at the time, she was wrong in both assumptions.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Lady Thatcher must speak for herself as to why she commended the Single European Act. I was amused the other day, as my hon. Friend no doubt was, to see my hon. Friend the Member for East Lindsey (Sir P. Tapsell) pray in aid Lady Thatcher when he rose to defend my hon. Friend the Member for Worcestershire, South (Mr. Spicer), who had got into a bit of trouble. I was amused——

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. We do not seem to be making progress, and it might be an idea if we did.

Mr. John Biffen (Shropshire, North): On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. As a privilege, could we just hear the end of the story?

The First Deputy Chairman: The answer to that is no.

Mr. Budgen: On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. Is there not a general request for an opportunity to debate the wider issues? There is a great and continuing sense of outrage that many of us have stifled in previous days. My right hon. Friend meets the needs of the Committee in referring to wider issues.

The First Deputy Chairman: That is not a point of order for me. My duties are to chair the Committee and to see the Bill progress in a reasonable way. For the life of me, I cannot see what the opinions of Lady Thatcher have to do with the debate.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I accept your strictures, and will seek not to be drawn down those paths, Mr. Lofthouse.

We were talking about the Single European Act and the way in which amendments Nos. 1, 3 and 14 allude to areas of the treaty where, to the extent that a comparison can be made to the Single European Act, the changes are minor and strengthen and reinforce the competitiveness either of the Community or of the United Kingdom's position.

Mr. Rowlands: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Garel-Jones: No. I wish to conclude my remarks, so that the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney, and others, may speak. I do not want to disappoint my right hon. Friend the Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen), so I shall just say that I found it amusing that my hon. Friend the Member for East Lindsey, while trying to defend my hon. Friend the Member for Worcestershire, South, should pray in aid my noble Friend Lady Thatcher, as it was he who, it might appropriately be said, cast the second stone against her.

Mr. Leighton: I do not want to become involved in arguments about Baroness Thatcher. Instead, I shall take up the arguments that were advanced by my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) on unemployment. In a previous debate, there was much mention of article 2 of the Maastricht treaty which sets out all sorts of things in motherhood and apple-pie wording. It does not state, for example, "We propose to put the economies of western Europe into recession and to have mass unemployment." There were similar words in the original Rome treaty. Nevertheless, within the Community, about 17 million are unemployed. It seems that the proof of the pudding is in the eating. We should question why 17 million are unemployed. When we have chronic mass unemployment—it is often long-term—it is meaningless to use words such as those that appear in article 2.

The operation of the exchange rate mechanism meant that the weaker countries had to link their currencies to the deutschmark, which meant that it was deflationary. It has resulted in considerable unemployment in countries such as Italy and France. It is a great embarrassment to me that a socialist Government in France, in carrying out these policies, have even higher unemployment than we have in Conservative Britain. The socialist party in France will pay a very high price for having pursued such policies at the next election.

The aim behind the treaty is price stability, and any fool can achieve price stability and low inflation if he is willing to put the economy into recession and have large scale unemployment. An interesting situation has arisen in Ireland. The Labour party there is going into office and Dick Spring will become deputy prime minister. Inflation is low in Ireland—about 2·3 per cent.—but unemployment is 17 per cent. I wonder what Dick Spring will do. It would seem that he will be unable to reduce unemployment unless he cuts the very high interest rates that apply in Ireland, but those high rates are operating to keep up the punt in the ERM. It seems that it will be possible for the Irish Government to reduce unemployment only if they reduce interest rates, and that will mean leaving the ERM and, probably, devaluing the punt.

Mrs. Currie: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Leighton: Whenever I speak, the hon. Lady becomes excited and wishes to intervene. I think that I had better get the intervention over with now.

Mrs. Currie: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that it would be possible for all the countries that are within the ERM to cut their interest rates together? The ERM does not require high interest rates as such. If all the countries that are members of the ERM had their heads screwed on, they would all get their interest rates down.

Mr. Leighton: That is an interesting idea. Quite often we do not talk about reality. Instead of talking about the real ERM, we discuss someone's vision of an ERM that he or she would like. I suggest that the hon. Lady moves around the Community and tries to convince the various member states that she has the right idea.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I know that my hon. Friend will not want to misrepresent Mr. Dick Spring. When he becomes Tanaiste he will undoubtedly have a strong commitment to dealing with unemployment first and foremost. I am sure that we wish to support him in every way. We understand the problems that he will undoubtedly meet in dealing with the economic situation in Ireland.

Mr. Leighton: I accept that completely. I hope that I did not give any other impression. I was trying to outline the problem that Dick Spring will have to solve. I am certain that he will want to do so and will have a shot at it, but he will have to cut interest rates, which means coming out of the ERM and, I would think, devaluing the punt in the process.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central contrasted what is happening in western Europe with that which is happening in Japan and the progress that the Japanese are making. He mentioned also the United States. Those countries have not had fixed exchange rates. They have not had the nonsensical ERM.

The truth that we must face is that western Europe is the unemployment blackspot of the world. We were blown out of the ERM and we must try now to remedy the damage. If we had economic and monetary union, we would be locked into the system.

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. Is the hon. Member going to reach industrial policy and article 130?

Mr. Leighton: I want to talk about the effect of industrial policy on unemployment. The single market is an area of fierce competition and it seems that we shall see a rash of mergers. Indeed, it is inevitable that companies will merge. After all, that is the object of the exercise. Eventually, each industry is likely to be dominated by two or three major firms. In this process, many firms will go to the wall. In an area of fierce competition, there will be winners and losers. What protection will there be for employees?

There has been a merger in the industry in which I worked before I came to the House of Commons, and that is the printing industry. On 17 September 1992, it was announced that the boards of Elsevier and Reed International had decided to merge their businesses to create one of the world's largest publishing and information groups, with a combined market capitalisation of about £5·2 billion. The combined Anglo-Dutch group will employ over 25,000 people—11,000 in the United Kindom, 4,500 in the Netherlands and 7,500 in North America. Reed is an international publishing and information group, covering professional publishing, business-to-business publishing, travel information, exhibitions and consumer publishing.

In the document that was issued to Reed International shareholders, there was a direct reference to the fact that, in the case of Elsevier, the merger was dependent on consultations and discussions with the relevant Dutch trade unions and the works council before the two parties entered into a formal agreement. That was in stark contrast to the British experience. The British work force of Reed International found out about the merger from radio and newspapers.

On 29 September, Tony Dubbins, the general secretary of the Graphical, Paper and Media Union—the printing union of which I am a member—wrote to Mr. Peter Davis, the chairman and chief executive of Reed International, seeking an early meeting at which there would be open-ended discussions on the implications that the merger would have for GPMU members in Reed International's employment.

Mr. Davis replied on 5 October to the effect that Reed International did not centralise its industrial relations, that any discussions would have to take place with the individual managements of each of its subsidiary companies in the United Kingdom, and that he had no idea what the reaction of individual managing directors would be to the GPMU's request. That statement must be viewed against the aggressive anti-trade union stance of Reed International over the past 18 months in its regional newspapers in particular and in its subsidiary, IPC magazines, where it has terminated recognition of the GPMU and withdrawn negotiating rights in respect of the terms and conditions of employment of the union's members.

On 22 October, Tony Dubbins and Chris Harding, the GPMU national officer, met senior works council representatives from Elsevier and Rene Van Tilborg, the general secretary of Druk En Papier, the Dutch Graphical Union in Amsterdam. It transpired that the works council representatives there had had a number of meetings with Pierre Vinken, who will be chairman of Reed/Elsevier until his retirement in 1995, and Peter Davis, chief executive and deputy chairman, who will become chairman upon Pierre Vinken's retirement.

At those meetings, Mr. Davis, in particular, stressed that there was no intention to change the current arrangements in Elsevier in Holland, but confirmed that Reed International would be loth to introduce those arrangements into the United Kingdom. Nor is the company prepared to recognise and deal with trade unions in the United Kingdom in any manner other than that which it currently adopts. Therefore, it is clear that unions will not be recognised. The point that I wish to make to the Minister is that it appears that the proposed merger is well within the criteria for reference to the competitions directorate. How will the Commission deal with that and similar cases? What criteria will the directorate use? What rights will the work force in that company have?

On 18 November, Reed International gave formal notification within its publishing sites that it was withdrawing recognition from both the GPMU and the NUJ. That announcement was made within 48 hours of the Reed International shareholders meeting that endorsed the merger with Elsevier. That means that some 762 GPMU members and 584 NUJ members currently employed in Reed International companies will have their individual right as employees to be represented by the union of their choice arbitrarily withdrawn by Reed International.

That merger is one of the first to take place under the single market, but the employees in this country will be worse off and their conditions will deteriorate. I hope that we will be told this afternoon what protection and what rights employees will have in the inevitable mergers that will occur. I should like to be told what the social dimension will do for them. We have heard about the economic dimension—it was to be accompanied by the social dimension. What rights will that give to employees, or will its effect be nugatory? Is the Reed International-Elsevier merger and the way that it has been done to be the pattern for the future? Do the Government approve of what has happened? Are they willing to take any action?

My hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett), who made an excellent speech, said that there were four aims of economic policy. That is absolutely right, but unfortunately only one—low inflation—is included in the treaty and within the objectives of the bank. Therefore, what my hon. Friend and the Labour party have always wanted is not there. My hon. Friend also gave us the good news that our right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) has denounced the convergence criteria, or at least that aspect under which Government borrowing must be limited to 3 per cent. in any one year. He said that applying that criterion in a recession would push countries even further into recession and create further unemployment.

I do not know whether my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central can give me an explanation, but I assume that, as three of the four aims of economic policy are not there, and as our right hon. and learned Friend has denounced the 3 per cent. limit in the treaty, that means that we shall vote against the Bill on Third Reading.

Mrs. Currie: I am glad to have the opportunity to speak in this debate on article 130 on industry and on article 130f on research and development. The articles offer us some very fine words. That has been forgotten in much of the waffle that we have heard so far in the debate. It is honourable and remarkable that we should be in a position to put into United Kingdom law the statement —and I shall quote fairly selectively:

"The Community and the Member States shall ensure that the conditions necessary for the competitiveness of the Community's industry exist."

Among the elements that are regarded as important, actions should be aimed at

"speeding up the adjustment of industry to structural changes; encouraging an environment favourable to initiative . . . fostering better exploitation of the industrial potential of policies of innocation, research and technological development."

To me, that statement is wonderful, and I am glad that we have the opportunity to put it into our law. Some of my hon. Friends should also take that view and not try to get it removed from the Bill.

I had one of the best experiences of my life this morning when I visited the new Toyota factory that has just opened in my constituency. It is a truly amazing place, and it is extraordinary that that factory is already up and running. The company has a work force of some 1,200 in the United Kingdom, and by Easter that will rise to more than 1,500. By the mid-1990s, it will have 3,000 employees in my constituency and in Shotton in north Wales.

The vast majority of the 20,000 people who have applied to work for the company live within a 15-mile radius of the factory. The implication for employment in the area is immediately obvious. I am sure that the factory is already having an impact. At the end of the year, the unemployment rate in my constituency was 6·7 per cent. —one of the lowest in the country—having fallen during the autumn. We hope that that trend will continue.

The company is also having an impact on other businesses throughout Europe. From the beginning, it said that it hoped to purchase 60 per cent. of the input for the cars, by value, from European companies. It tells me that it has already managed to achieve that. It intends that, within a couple of years, the figure should rise to 80 per cent. Half its component suppliers are from the United Kingdom—for example, GKN and Triplex—or companies that are based in the United Kingdom, such as Pirelli. The other half comes from companies mainly in the European Community, especially in Germany and Belgium. Only a small number of the businesses from which it buys components are Japanese, and several of those are already planning to move to the United Kingdom.

If we consider the components, the services and the consumables, it is clear that the factory is already having a huge impact on the midlands and the north-west. I believe that, before the year is out, direct and indirect employment in the United Kingdom associated with Toyota will reach 10,000 jobs.

Mr. Michael Spicer (Worcestershire, South): I fail to understand my hon. Friend's argument that she would not have that Japanese company in her constituency were it not for political union under Maastricht. Everybody accepts that there should be free and closer trade in Europe, and surely it is that which the Japanese companies are interested in. I presume that they are not very interested in the enormous new social and industrial costs that will occur under the treaty of union signed in Maastricht—surely that is the one thing that will deter those companies. Therefore, although I well understand why those companies have come to this country in the past, the question is whether they will still come or will expand under the Maastricht treaty.

Mrs. Currie: My hon. Friend is well ahead of me: I had only just finished describing what I saw in the factory this morning. I have not yet begun to deal with the question of why Toyota is in this country. If my hon. Friend will bear with me a little longer, I shall come to that matter and also to what will happen if this country is hesitant about its membership of the European Community, as I know my hon. Friend wants.

Most of the production of the Toyota factory is for export. Indeed, its output will help to turn around the British balance of payments and move us from deficit to surplus on cars, if not on manufactures in general. On those grounds alone, if for no other, Toyota's arrival is most welcome and timely. I want to put on record my tribute to everyone associated with Toyota, in particular its directors, managing director and chairman for the skill and professionalism with which they have built the plant and brought that remarkable project to fruition. Most of all, I thank them for the tact, courtesy and consideration that they have shown to my constituents, especially their immediate neighbours in Burnaston, which include myself and my family.

Mr. Roy Hughes (Newport, East): I note that the hon. Lady has expressed many thanks to various people. One person whom she did not thank was the former Prime Minister, Lady Thatcher, who was instrumental in bringing that factory to the hon. Lady's constituency because of its marginal nature.

Mrs. Currie: I am not sure what the hon. Gentleman means when he says that it is of a "marginal nature". The factory is very far from marginal in our part of the world. It owns more than 600 acres and currently employs 1,200. It is likely to employ far more in future. That is hardly marginal. If the hon. Gentleman wants me to make a speech of thanks to everyone, I shall do so—but I have a feeling that you, Mr. Lofthouse, would shake your head and rule me out of order.

I want to make a number of points about how today's debate might affect Toyota and its view of some of the matters that we are debating. Toyota is in this country partly because the European Community is one of the largest and most important industrial markets in the world. With 340 million people, it is already much bigger than the United States of America and Japan put together. With the level of growth seen during the period of increasing co-operation between those economies, that is likely to be even more so. Europe's economy has grown because of the development of the single market.

Toyota is also here because of fears of exclusion from the European Community. In my constituency today, I saw cars being made by British people from scratch, to be sold all over the world—but aimed particularly at the European market. Those cars are not transplants or implants but British cars. They are as British as the Peugeot cars made in Coventry, the Honda cars made in Swindon, and the Ford cars made in Halewood or anywhere else—when hon. Members back and support those companies in their constituencies.

Mr. Cash: Does my hon. Friend have a new Toyota?

Mrs. Currie: I have an old one, and I am awaiting the delivery of a new one. I have been told that they are only available in three colours at the moment——

Mr. Cash: Now I realise why my hon. Friend had lunch there.

Mrs. Currie: I did not have lunch there. I was on the train to London. The three colours are red, white and blue. I have chosen a blue one.

I put it to my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Government Front Bench that the day may come when they will have to defend businesses such as Toyota, Honda and Nissan. If we mean what we say about the European Community being an open and free market, we may find ourselves having to challenge other countries and Governments through the European Court of Justice and whatever other systems are available—insisting that the cars that I saw being made today are British cars and are not to be excluded or treated differently from the cars of any other British manufacturer.

I saw the sheet steel from British Steel being delivered, the equipment that is used to stamp out the bodies, and new engines arriving from north Wales. It is noticeable that, while everyone is aware that the main Toyota plant is in my constituency, hardly any right hon. or hon. Members has the foggiest idea in whose constituency is Toyota's engine plant. That is because it is in the north Wales constituency of a Labour Member, who would much rather no one knew about the success story on his patch.

Mrs. Dunwoody: On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. Is it not customary to give notice to an hon. Member if one intends to make a personal attack on them? I hope that you will bring that convention to the attention of the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie).

The First Deputy Chairman: I am sure that the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) is aware of that convention.

Mrs. Currie: If the hon. Gentleman were present, I would not have to give him notice—he would be on his feet backing and supporting the Toyota company in his constituency. Nevertheless, I note your point, Mr. Lofthouse.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): Did the hon. Lady give him notice?

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. It would be helpful if the Committee could make progress.

Mrs. Currie: I mentioned that Toyota is in Britain because Europe is one of the most important markets in the world, and because of its fear of being excluded from other European markets—an aspect that the Government may have to take on board at some future point.

Toyota is also here because our country offers natural economic advantages. Its work force is largely strike-free. In south Derbyshire it is almost entirely strike-free. On a ballot, it decided not to strike in the miners' dispute nine years ago. The United Kingdom also has low manufacturing costs—and we want to keep them that way. That is why our version of the treaty is not the same as that which other countries have. That is why we have no involvement in the social chapter. I believe that is right, and should continue to be the case. I am not hostile per se to legislation that affects the work force. In fact, I believe that Toyota's working practices are better than many for which one could legislate. My opposition to the social charter is that, if we restrict employment, that will be inimical to jobs.

Toyota is here because Britain has a Conservative Government who are favourable to business—a point made for me by Opposition Members. In 1989, 28 sites were proposed for the Toyota plant. One of the stranger questions put to me by Toyota's advisers was how come that of all those sites only one was in a constituency served by a Conservative Member for Parliament. My answer was that my constituents have their heads screwed on.

Toyota is here because we have a competitive exchange rate, and I hope that our competitive actions will keep it that way.

6.45 pm

Mr. Gill (Ludlow): Is my hon. Friend saying that she would resist Britain re-entering the exchange rate mechanism?

Mrs. Currie: No, but competitive exchange rates only work if one country is competitively changing its rates. If everyone starts messing around with their exchange rates, they will get into a total mess. I would much rather my constituents, and those employed in my constituency by the many international businesses located there, are competitive not because of the exchange rate but because they offer first-class working practices, in which quality, safety and the consumer are put at the head of the game—rather than be for ever looking over their shoulders at the value of sterling.

The policy implication of article 130 is that it must mean what it says about Community action not distorting competition. I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Government Front Bench will make other countries hold as firmly to that as we intend to do. There should be no subsidies for competitive businesses. There should be no subsidies for Renault or Fiat.

Last year, I queried a subsidy agreed by the European Commission, for Ferrari of all companies. If people can afford to fork out £40,000 or £50,000 for a Ferrari, they should do so without being subsidised. I was told that Ferrari was given that subsidy because it was producing in a particular part of Italy having assisted area status.

I do not believe that subsidies of that kind should be paid. If an area requires a subsidy, it should be channelled in other ways. Such subsidies merit the most careful scrutiny. The Council, the Commissioner, and everyone else concerned should have a predisposition to say no to subsidies to car companies in other countries.

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Richard Needham): My hon. Friend may like to know that Ferrari's grand prix cars are now made in Britain.

Mrs. Currie: The company still should not receive a subsidy. The subsidy that I queried, which was equivalent to about £4 million, was paid to Ferrari in Italy.

Mr. Fatchett: Does the hon. Lady favour subsidies being paid to the shipbuilding industry, and would she agree with the President of the Board of Trade if he advocated subsidies for the British coal mining industry?

Mrs. Currie: As to the latter point, the Whips Office already knows my view—[Interruption.] If Opposition Members want an answer, they must shut up and listen while I give one.

All industrial subsidies ultimately distort competition and trade, and do not create employment—they weaken it. A subsidised business is encouraged not to look hard at how best to serve its existing customers and to win customers from its competitors. Instead, the managing director and the senior management are concerned only about beating a path to Whitehall—and that is where they spend all their time. As a result, the business becomes even less competitive than it was in the first place, which destroys employment. Coming from Liverpool, as I do, I can tell the hon. Gentleman in all honesty and sincerity that I believe that it also destroys entire environments, cities and regions.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mrs. Currie: I will not give way; I want to make progress.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. I am sorry to take up the House's time in such an important debate, but I understand that, when an hon. Member makes remarks about another hon. Member, it is traditional for the latter to receive some indication that that will happen. The hon. Lady may now wish to repeat the references that she made in my absence, or, alternatively, to withdraw them.

The Chairman: That point has already been dealt with.

Mrs. Currie: If the hon. Gentleman wishes to behave in a way that prevents the House from knowing that Toyota is in his constituency, that is for him to decide.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. The hon. Lady was asked to withdraw her remarks, but she has not done so. All she has done is repeat her original slur in the presence of my hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones)—which she made without giving him notice. She should be asked again to withdraw it.

The Chairman: The hon. Lady has said nothing that was out of order. This is not a matter for the Chair.

Mr. Barry Jones: On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. I do not wish to challenge your ruling, but I wish to ask the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) whether she wishes to repeat what she said when I was not present.

The Chairman: I do not think that that is necessary. It is fairly obvious that the hon. Gentleman knows what was said then. I dealt with it at the time, and addressed the hon. Lady accordingly. Let us now make some progress.

Mr. Jones: On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse.

The Chairman: Is it the same point of order?

Mr. Jones: I seek your guidance, Mr. Lofthouse.

The Chairman: Is it the same point of order?

Mr. Jones: No, Sir. However, I shall be very brief; I am sorry to take up the time of the House in such an important debate.

I do not know the details of what was said by the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South, but I have been informed that she made a critical reference. I thought it reasonable, therefore, to ask her to have the courage to repeat that reference now that I am in the Chamber.

The Chairman: I repeat that I dealt with the point at the time.

Mrs. Currie: Thank you, Mr. Lofthouse. It is open to any hon. Member to read Hansard tomorrow.

Toyota is here in the United Kingdom because we are part of Europe: that is the last and main reason for Toyota's being based in our country. That means that we should be at the heart of Europe. It will never be easy for the United Kingdom to be at the heart of Europe, because we are geographically on the fringe and because we have been historically outside, tending to look down on continentals. That is all the more reason for sadness over the fact that we may be the last to ratify the Maastricht treaty: wanting to be at the heart of Europe means actions, not words.

If we are not at the heart of Europe, industry and employment will be most affected and most damaged. Businesses such as Toyota, which was raised earlier, will eventually revise all their plans for manufacture in this country if we pretend, or hint in any way, that we do not want to be at the heart of Europe. Under phase 1, output is planned to rise to 100,000 cars a year, probably by the end of next year; phase 2 will increase output to 200,000 cars a year by about 1995. That can be done by means of expansion within the existing buildings.

It is the phase after that which is at risk, and I am sure that the pattern will be repeated in many other businesses throughout the country. I am talking about the increase in output to 400,000, which we hope will happen by 1999 and which would mean the company's expanding to occupy more of the 600 acres that it owns—as well as, probably, an investment of the same order as the £700 million that it has already invested in this country.

That is the investment that matters most to the United Kingdom, because it takes production past the critical mass to roughly the same as the output achieved by Rover at Longbridge. At that point, it is worth while for far more suppliers to come to the United Kingdom—to come close to the factory, and thereby to increase employment.

Mr. Michael Spicer: In order to achieve that critical production level, the firm will need a large market. Everyone agrees that a free trading market should exist with European countries. I do not think, however, that Toyota wants a mass of impositions involving additional costs as a result of political union. That is what we are really discussing. My hon. Friend is not making that distinction, but she should.

Mrs. Currie: I am not sure what all those fantastic costs might be. The most expensive thing that the company had to do was install a pile of machinery. It did so according to its own choice. It has two pieces of pressing equipment which had cost £10 million apiece. That is what such companies mean by expense.

As for the free market, I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. He and I sit on the same side of the House, and we share many ideas about the development of the free market and its importance. In view of that, I find it strange that my hon. Friend should object so strongly to proposals in the Maastricht treaty that will strengthen the competence of the European Court of Justice and the efforts of Ministers to make the free market stick, and to insist that restrictions and subsidies are removed.

Mr. Needham: I agree with what my hon. Friend has said about Toyota and the Japanese. The Minister of International Trade and Industry was in London last week. What he consistently wanted to know was whether Britain would sign up, whether we would stand by our position on the social chapter and whether we would be seen as driving forward the European debate and being able to defend and support Japanese car companies as British car companies within Europe.

Mrs. Currie: The Minister is absolutely right: he has put it far better than I have. Our British view on industrial policy is widely shared, particularly by Japanese companies. The trouble is that, if we are not at the heart of Europe, if European countries move at different paces and we are not at the centre, if we are in any way hesitant and if we fail to use Community institutions to enforce the provisions—I am entirely serious about this—Ministers will, at some stage, be obliged to take another country's Government to court over the question of subsidies to competing car companies, some of which they own. As I have said, certain key companies are state-owned and subsidised by taxpayers.

If we do not take that approach—if we are not vigorous in our defence of new businesses operating in our country—when the next phase decisions are on the table in Tokyo or wherever, it will be in Spain, Germany, Hungary or some other country with a clearer vision than ours that such companies will open the next European Toyota, Nissan or Honda factory. Ultimately, we shall be the losers.

I believe that article 130 is a modest improvement on previous legislation, but it will serve us only if the Government put their heart and soul into ensuring that the Community is a free market—that it is open to competition, free of subsidies and free of interference in business. If that happens, our industry will be efficient and strong, and fit to compete throughout the world.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): I am sure that you will be relieved to hear, Dame Janet, that I intend to concentrate on a single amendment, on which I hope to speak very briefly.

Amendment No. 184 deals with the inclusion in the Bill of the common policy on agriculture and fisheries. The amendment would delete all reference to agriculture and fisheries.

I am sure that other hon. Members share my concern about some of the changes that have taken place in the common agriculture and common fisheries policies. No doubt other hon. Members believe that some of the proposed changes will prove mistaken, retrograde and—probably for that reason—transitory. Few hon. Members —at least, those representing fishing and agricultural areas —would wish to tear up the existing European Community common policies and make a completely fresh start. The amendment puts nothing in the place of the existing policies.

The common agricultural policy as it stands—the common agricultural policy is a moving target, as we all know—had, we thought, several core objectives. They were identified and analysed by Mr. MacSharry while he remained the Commissioner. During the negotiations in the Council of Ministers, they were analysed all over again. The intention seems to be to increase the simplification of the CAP, to eradicate surpluses, to reduce costs, to remove all artificial price mechanisms, to increase environmental benefits and, perhaps most important of all, to reverse the widening gap between farmgate and retail prices. The Agriculture Ministers set themselves those objectives. The Commissioner also set himself those objectives. We have yet to see whether the proposals that were made following that process meet the objectives.

Mr. Cash: When it comes to British farmers, upon whom the hon. Gentleman no doubt wishes to concentrate, does he not agree that they have paid a price for the policy that he advocates so strongly, in that net farm incomes fell between 1975 and 1985, to the extent that they were halved? According to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, between 1988 and 1992 dairy farmers' incomes fell, in real terms, by 45 per cent., those of cereal farmers by 75 per cent. and those of livestock farmers by 90 per cent. Given that this is such a comprehensive policy, does the hon. Gentleman not think that there is a case for absolutely radical reform, let alone all the fraud that the system represents?

Mr. Tyler: If the hon. Gentleman had been patient and allowed me to warm to my theme, he would have found that I sympathise in some respects with his point of view. There is a dramatic difference, however, between radical reform and tearing the whole thing up, with nothing to put in its place. Those hon. Members who represent agricultural or fishing constituencies would need their heads examining if they went to their constituents and said, "We should vote for the complete abolition of this policy." If they said otherwise, it would mean that they had huge majorities.

It is important to identify the objectives of the reforms and to measure whether the proposals meet those objectives. That does not mean, however, that we want to go back to square one, or that we want the CAP to develop in the 11 other member states, with us outside. One only has to contemplate what the position would be if we were unable to deal with GATT on a Communitywide basis. Chaos would ensue. The fact that there has been radical change and reform in the Community, within the CAP context, demonstrates that the CAP is a moving target and that one can negotiate and move forward. It would be absurd if we, as an offshore island, were to be deprived of the opportunity to take part in collective, corporate negotiation.

Mr. Michael Lord (Suffolk, Central): I am one of those Members who seek the abolition of the CAP. It is a total nonsense. I would argue firmly and, I hope, fairly sensibly for the repatriation of agriculture to this country, which I believe will happen sooner or later. Does the hon. Gentleman not agree that anybody who understands anything at all about Europe says that the CAP is a total nonsense and that in the same breath they say that it is a linchpin of the Community? What sort of an organisation is that?

Mr. Tyler: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making that point. I do not regard the CAP as the linchpin of the Community. Much wider issues are at stake. However, it is critical for the future of our producers and fishermen that we should be able to negotiate in the world, within the GATT context, as a member of the European Community. Without that network, we should literally be at sea—an offshore island without any negotiating rights.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I have been trying hard to follow the hon. Gentleman's argument. It would help the Committee if he could refer to any other time in our history when we were subjected to an agricultural policy that was decided outside this country, a policy that owed none of its allegiance to our climate, to our market needs, to the abilities of our people or to the needs of our countryside. If the hon. Gentleman could tell me when, at any other point in our history, we have been put in that position I should be prepared to accept what he says about the need to protect our existing agriculture.

Mr. Tyler: I am very grateful to the hon. Lady for making a typical Little Englander contribution to our debate. It is absurd to suggest that any institution of which we are a member somehow imposes on us alien and totally hostile proposals. Her argument would mean that our membership of the United Nations somehow allows the United Nations to impose sanctions upon us—sanctions against a foreign power.

I am glad to see that the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is sitting on the Treasury Bench. I hope that that is an indication of the importance that Ministers attach to the significance of the common agricultural policy. I warn the Minister, however—I think that he will accept the point—that we are not setting in aspic, to use a phrase that was used during our earlier debate, the CAP as it now is. We are seeking to maintain a framework within which our farmers and producers—and our fishermen in the parellel policy for fisheries—are able to negotiate from a position of strength.

It is often said by the farming community and by the general public that one of the objectives of our participation in such an international framework should be to seek a level playing field. One of the most serious criticisms of the United Kingdom's presidency of the European Commission is that we made virtually no progress towards a single market, in terms of the way in which farmers are controlled and helped. One of the explicit advantages of the Maastricht treaty proposals is that, at long last, some sort of mechanism has been provided and is ready for us to use to ensure that member states, which abide by the rules but not all of which have the same effective inspection and professionalism, are able to put the decisions of the Council of Ministers or the Commission into effect with equal rigour.

One of the advantages of the Maastricht treaty is that at long last we can ensure that all the high-flown proposals that emerge from Brussels are imposed on a much more level playing field throughout the whole Community.

Mr. Marlow: This is a very important point. Many people in this country are uneasy about the common agricultural policy and the common market because of the level playing field. Can the hon. Gentleman tell us when milk quotas will be applied effectively and accurately in Italy? Will it be this month, this year, in five years', 15 years' or 20 years' time? We know that the Government of Italy cannot run affairs in Italy. At least half of it is run by the mafia. How convinced is the hon. Gentleman that European institutions will be able to operate these policies in Italy?

Mr. Tyler: If the hon. Gentleman had a little patience and if he were to vote for the Bill, there might be a better chance of that happening. His present position is entirely antagonistic to the effective policing of the European Communitys' decision-making process. I see that some Ministers are nodding in agreement. A critical part of the treaty is that we should make certain that future decision-making is carried right through to every level of Government.

There are a number of features of the reforms that we are applying in a way that does not make good sense. That is up to the British Government. For example, their reliance on set-aside as the core of the proposals is nonsense, but I do not see the Governments of other member states falling for this with the same enthusiasm as our Minister. To blame the common agricultural policy for something that, by definition, is a subject for national decision-making—derogation or development within the United Kingdom—is particularly absurd.

Similarly, there is a complexity about many of the regulations imposed in this country that is not to be found in other member states. By definition, that must be open to our Government to modify. The classic example—I see a number of hon. Members in their places who have raised the issue—is the food and hygiene regulations for slaughterhouses. I understand, and I hope that I am reasonably correct, that the Commission proposed about four paragraphs, but by the time the Ministry's multiplication system had worked, there were about 94.

I am glad to say that the Minister is now retreating. That is good news for those concerned about animal welfare as well as for the farming industry. It shows that what is at fault is not the Community or common agricultural policy but the way in which the regulations are being applied in this country.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): The hon. Gentleman and I have made common cause on this issue, and rightly so. Does he agree that, if meat from abattoirs is not for export but for domestic use, it should be a national responsibility, as the Germans have suggested, rather than a European responsibility? Is not that a good example of where subsidiarity should work and where we should insist that it does?

Mr. Tyler: I am grateful to the hon. Member, who makes a fair point. The corollary is that meat for export should meet the same conditions for rearing, animal welfare and so on. It is a national scandal that young calves are bought in Britain and exported by French buyers to the continent only to return as veal. Often supermarkets do not identify where rearing took place and may pretend that the animal originally came from this country. These are examples of how Maastricht could make improvements, and we should welcome that.

Mr. Cash: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the Maastricht treaty makes no attempt to do anything about agriculture, which in itself is a major omission from the negotiations and one of the reasons why I take such exception to it? Does he agree that the intensification of production will lead to more land being set aside? Recent calculations suggest that the amount set aside will increase by 20 per cent.

Mr. Tyler: It would not be proper to go into detail on set-aside. However, the Government's insistence on making set-aside the core of their proposals, which is not shared by other member states, is a fault of the system, but the common agricultural policy cannot be blamed for that.

What is far more significant is that, if the amendment were made, it would tear up not only set-aside but the whole support system without proposing anything in its place. No doubt the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) has such a large majority that he does not worry about the farming vote in his constituency, but if he has any concern for the future wealth and health of agriculture in his constituency, he cannot expect the common agricultural policy to be dismantled overnight, as the amendment would ensure.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does the hon. Gentleman accept and understand that if, by some miracle, we were to abolish the CAP tomorrow, Parliament has the ability and means quickly to rectify matters and make changes? One of the reasons why we are unhappy about the European Community is that it cannot act as quickly as Parliament to change mistakes. That is where the strength of this Parliament lies. The hon. Gentleman is not right: we could quickly make changes.

Mr. Tyler: If the hon. Member is suggesting that a mistake such as the poll tax can be made in the House quickly only to be reversed and replaced with another mistake—the council tax—I accept his point. Mistakes are made more quickly in this House than anywhere else that I have known.

That is not an argument for tearing up the common agricultural policy, and it is even more fallacious when it is applied to the common fisheries policy, about which the hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) and I are very concerned. If we opted out of the common fisheries policy, we could easily allow other member states to adopt the conservation measures that they prefer, and gain access to our natural waters. We cannot deny them access if we opt out of the common fisheries policy and say, "We will have none of it"; we should be left floating out to sea.

I have been diverted by a number of interventions. I wish to be brief and stick to the amendment.

7.15 pm

Mr. Quentin Davies (Stamford and Spalding): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Tyler: No.

Sir Richard Body (Holland with Boston): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Tyler: No. I have given way a number of times.

I ask hon. Members who represent agricultural and fisheries constituencies to ask themselves a simple question. If they were meeting those interests tomorrow, would they be prepared to say, "Every element of the common fisheries policy is now a dead letter and we should get out"? If they believe that, they are effectively not only pulling out of the only framework that those interests understand——

Mr. Lord: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Tyler: No, I have given way a number of times.

One could do that only if one were prepared to sacrifice the fragile confidence of farmers and fishermen, which has been knocked far more by a succession of Government policies than by anything from Brussels. My colleagues and I are not prepared to do so, and for that reason will vote firmly against amendment No. 184.

Mr. Marlow: We have had an interesting debate so far. I very much enjoyed the speech of my right hon. Friend the Minister of State; I am sorry that I had to leave for a short period. We heard an interesting comment from him, which will be emblazoned throughout the rest of the debate in the House and in the country—his belief that there was consensus on policy between the Front Benches. The House should beware when there is consensus on policy between the Front Benches. If he looks at the Official Report he will see those precise words; I listened carefully.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Naturally, the Official Report will reflect what I said, but I believe that I said that, after 30 years of pro-European campaigning by the Conservative party, it had finally reached the minds of Opposition Members that there should be consensus on our membership of the Community. That is what I intended to say. If the record does not show that, I shall have to seek to qualify my remarks later.

Mr. Marlow: I am happy that my right hon. Friend said that, but I believe that it is perceived throughout the country, whatever he may say or whatever alterations he may wish to make to the record later, that there is a cosy consensus between the Front Benches on this treaty.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda) rose——

Mr. Garel-Jones rose——

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. May I be clear to whom the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) is giving way?

Mr. Marlow: My right hon. Friend has been so gracious in giving way to me that I give way to him first.

Mr. Garel-Jones: My hon. Friend is being mischievous. The point that I was seeking to make is that there is no collusion between Ministers and Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen. The only collusion is between my hon. Friend and some Opposition Members.

Mr. Marlow: My right hon. Friend may say that, and may have used the word "consensus". As the debate proceeds, we shall see to what extent there is collusion between the Front Benches. It has been impressed on the country that the Government Front Bench and those of the Liberal and Labour parties are at one on the Maastricht treaty and we who oppose some elements of it have great difficulty in the face of that consensus, if not collusion.

Mr. Rogers: For once, the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) is right and, as usual, the Minister is wrong. This afternoon, the Minister said that there was consensus between the Front Benches but added later that there was collusion between groups in the various parties. The hon. Gentleman is right—unusually.

Mr. Marlow: I am grateful for any support, especially from the hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers), for whom I have great respect.

The hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) spoke about the benefits of regional policy. My understanding of regional policy in the Community is that one takes money from Community countries and shifts it in the directions in which one feels it should go. What worries me is that the great panjandrums in the European Community think that the countries to which it should go are those which they feel, if they were to massage and give money to them, would be inclined to support the ambitions of people at the centre of Europe for a more centralised federal Europe. Mr. Rogers indicated assent.

Mr. Marlow: The hon. Member for Rhondda nods his head, so perhaps he shares that view. He may be in favour of regional policy, but fearful that it might be used as an effective slush fund to bring about what he and I would perhaps not wish to see happen.

We saw the amazing spectacle of the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) blessing, praising and indentifying with the common agricultural policy. I am not very assiduous, but I do not think that I have heard any other politician, especially not one speaking for a majority party—or a minor party in his case—setting out the benefits of the common agricultural policy. It is something with which we must live and which we must endure, but to talk of the benefits of the CAP——

Mr. Tyler rose——

Mr. Marlow: I shall give way in a moment. First, I must declare that I have agricultural interests of my own.

Mr. Tyler: I am delighted to hear that the hon. Gentleman has agricultural interests. If, tomorrow morning, the common agricultural policy did not exist, I suggest that he would be in considerable difficulties—much greater financial difficulties than he, as a normal working farmer, presumably already is.

Mr. Lord: Will my hon. Friend give way to his hon. Friend?

Mr. Marlow: I shall give way in a moment, but let me attempt to deal with that point. If there were no CAP, it would not mean that the United Kingdom would be bereft of an agricultural policy—we could have our own agricultural policy. Most people in Britain would realise that it would serve us a damned sight better than that which we now have strung around our neck.

Mr. Lord: My hon. Friend will be aware that we ran our affairs satisfactorily before we had the common agricultural policy. We had systems of guaranteed payments and deficiency payments, which got food cheaply to the consumer but ensured that the farmers got a reasonable return. It is nonsense to say that we have no alternative—we could have what we used to have. Is there not something nonsensical in the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) asking whether we can find nothing good in the common agricultural policy and whether we would not be embarrassed if it disappeared altogether? I suspect that he is saying that, if there is a rotten apple in which one can find a tiny bit that is worth keeping, one should keep the whole apple—which is absolute nonsense.

Mr. Marlow: My hon. Friend makes a powerful point. He says that we had an agricultural policy before the CAP was imposed on us, and that policy brought a great deal of benefit. We bought and sold food at world market prices, which meant that the poorer people in this country and those for whom we rightly provide through our welfare schemes bought food at lower prices than they can now, because they bought it at world market prices. The scheme benefited them, and us as taxpayers—in such circumstances, the transfer payments which we would make to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security would be lower, so taxes would be lower. As taxes would be lower, our industry would be more competitive and our entrepreneurs would be more aggressive.

In addition, we were also able to take advantage of the cheap food available on the world market. We paid our farmers what was right to encourage them to produce as much food as they could economically do so. When food was not available from our own farmers, we were able to buy it on the world market at cheap prices. If we were not in the CAP, think how massively we could benefit from the beef, butter and grain mountains—they would be available to us at low subsidised prices. Instead of sending the benefices to the Soviet Union—or to Russia, as it now is—we could benefit.

Mr. Tyler: Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that by leaving the common agricultural policy, we could benefit from the beef and other mountains? How? If we were not in the CAP, we could not benefit.

Mr. Marlow: If we were not in the CAP—the hon. Gentleman must bear in mind where we started from. We did not invent or want the CAP; we decided that we were going to join the European Community. The CAP had been stitched together for other countries in Europe and was totally inappropriate for the United Kingdom. However, once we had joined, as a massive part of our membership contribution to the Community, we had to pick up and live with it.

The hon. Member for North Cornwall has great respect for the other European countries, so he must surely realise that if we left the CAP, the Community would continue to have an agricultural policy and would continue to get it wrong—[Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman makes a sedentary intervention. Is he saying that it would sell its surpluses to Russia but not to the United Kingdom? If that is what he is suggesting, I shall be happy to give way.

Mr. Tyler: Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that the people of this country, and especially the farmers in his constituency, would welcome the dumping of cheap food on the market in this country?

Mr. Marlow: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman is unaware of what happened under deficiency payments. Under that system—I hope that I will not be had up for tedious repetition—a price level was set for agricultural commodities which, by and large, ensured that our farmers got a fair and adequate return. That encouraged farmers to produce as much as they could if it was economically beneficial to the nation. The system worked well. I think that under that system the vast majority of farmers felt that they had a fair deal, and they prospered—they certainly prospered to a much greater extent than they prosper now.

Mr. Cash rose——

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. David Curry) rose——

Mr. Marlow: I see that the Minister is minded to intervene. I am not saying that we can wholly return to a system of deferred payments.

Mr. Curry: I fear that my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) and the hon. Member for North Cornwall are both wrong. It is true that, if we were not members of the system, we could no doubt benefit from the surpluses but the problem would be the effect on prices in the United Kingdom. What deficiency payments and Exchequer costs would my hon. Friend be willing to accept, given a price level set by the presence of dumped surpluses from the Community on our market?

Mr. Marlow: The Minister makes his point, but I am sure that he will bear in mind the fact that in the past four years our net contribution has hovered between £2 billion and £2·5 billion a year. We could do an awful lot to ensure that the consumer gets cheaper food and that our agriculture gets an adequate return for its work with even a small portion of that sum. Our being in the CAP also imposes on us the Community budget, which takes vast sums of money from this country to be used for the benefit of our competitors in Europe.

Mr. Curry: The difference between the two situations is that British self-sufficiency is much greater now than when we joined the CAP and the Community. Therefore, the amount of produce that it would be necessary to support by deficiency payments is significantly larger than it was and the Exchequer cost would be very much greater. In the allocation of expenditure between Departments, one would have to judge the priority that agriculture would command.

Mr. Marlow: The Minister is right—our self-sufficiency is greater now than when we joined the Community, but it was increasing and would have done so without the Community. If it were not for the Community, our self-sufficiency would be at a much higher level.

I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister is aware that there are dairies—where people take milk from the farm and make it into cheese and butter—that cannot make as much cheese and butter as they could in the past because of milk quotas. We could produce more milk and we could become more self-sufficient in dairy products, but because of the common agricultural policy, even though our farmers in most areas are among the most efficient in Europe—and in some areas, are the most efficient in Europe—we are unable to take advantage off the additional potential for self-sufficiency.

7.30 pm

My hon. Friend the Minister talked about the additional costs. That depends on the price that the consumer pays. If we are able to have prices at a lower level or at world market levels, the consumer may consume more. We shall have greater consumption. We may have to have more subsidy. My hon. Friend the Minister says that the Treasury would be jealous about the subsidy and would try to take it from the farmers and put it elsewhere. I wonder. Farmers have taken their chance with the Treasury in the past, and they did a damned sight better with the Treasury than they did with Mr. Delors and his cronies.

Mr. Cash: Does my hon. Friend agree that the average size of a British farm is about 65 hectares, which is more than twice the size of the average farm in countries such as Denmark? In Portugal, the average is 4·3 hectares and in Italy it is 5·6 hectares. The very efficient British farmer is at a considerable disadvantage under the existing system, because we have a high level of productivity in relation to the hectares used.

My hon. Friend's argument in relation to what is effectively a probing amendment is having a profound impact on the debate, as is being shown by the interventions to which he is being subjected. The plain fact is that my hon. Friend is hitting a raw nerve. The system is not in the interests of the British farmer and must be reformed.

Mr. Marlow: My hon. Friend is right. I shall come later to some of the points that he makes.

Mr. Curry: I am sorry to intervene again, but the remark that the United Kingdom farm was disadvantaged by the system is one with which I take issue. Payments are made per acre in production, so the farmers with the most acres collect the biggest payments. If my hon. Friend is looking for the areas in the European Community in which the level of subsidies is highest, he must look to East Anglia, to the area around Paris and the area around Beaune. The subsidies are not at their highest in the small farms, many of which are too small for many of the mechanisms. That is one of the problems about which small countries' Ministers tend to complain.

In the recent reform, the one thing that we defended at the demand of all hon. Members was that there should be no discrimination according to size and that there should continue to be an absolutely straight expendiential relationship between size and benefit.

Mr. Marlow: My case is that the CAP is not, as the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) said, the best possible agricultural policy for the United Kingdom. We had a previous policy which was a system of deficiency payments. I am not saying that we can go wholly back to the policy that we had before. However, we could devise for the United Kingdom a far better policy than the CAP.

Mr. Knapman: My hon. Friend will be aware that the average family pays £18 a week as a result of the CAP reforms. If every family is to pay £18 a week, would it not be cheaper to aggregate the contributions of all the families of the country and to hand that vast amount to each farmer? They could all run around in Rolls-Royces.

Mr. Marlow: I would not suggest that, and I do not think that the farming community would like it. However, it is true that the CAP costs us money, both through subsidies and through prices higher than we should otherwise have to pay.

The Minister said that it is the bigger farmer who gets the most subsidies. That is true. The problem with the CAP is that it is a bastard policy. It is not an agricultural policy alone; it is half a social policy, and in much of Europe it is more a social policy than an agricultural policy.

In the United Kingdom, we want within our agricultural policy an environmental policy to ensure that we look after the land, that we look after the hillsides and that we keep people in the villages in the more remote areas and in the less-favoured areas. That is right. That is our special way in which to look at our agricultural policy. Unlike the Italians or the Portuguese, or even those in parts of Germany, we are not concerned to have a social policy within our agricultural policy. Our responsibilities and our interests in agricultural policy are different from those in Europe. If we could extricate ourselves from the mess that comes from Brussels, the United Kingdom would be better served.

I shall now deal with some of the more specific areas of the CAP. I do not want to fall out with my hon. Friend the Minister because I want favours from him. However, I must point out that the one thing about which people are irritated is the ridiculous system whereby, if farmers put in a return to the Ministry, they do not fill in the figures in acres. Everyone in the House knows what an acre looks like. It is a chain, a cricket pitch by a furlong. We can all visualise an acre. Everyone in the farming community knows what a United Kingdom or an English acre is. It is what a ploughman can plough in one day with a horse and plough.

As a result of some bureaucratic reason on high—I do not blame my hon. Friend the Minister for this—we seem to have ditched the acre, to have surrendered it and to have kicked it into touch. Farmers now put in their agricultural returns with the figures not in acres, but in something called "hectares". That area is 100 m by 100 m.

Like every other hon. Member—this is not really a diversion, so I hope that you will bear with me, Dame Janet—I enjoy watching rugby internationals on television. We no longer have the 25-yard drop-out, but a 22-metre drop-out. That is ridiculous. Do we really have to impose that change on the most traditional, patriotic, sensible and loyal part of the British people—the agricultural community? Let me get down on my knees before my hon. Friend the Minister. Now that we are in the time of subsidiarity, please may we have our acre back? It will not cause his Ministry any problems.

Mr. Harris: The hon. Gentleman says that he enjoys watching rugby. Does that explain his absence from the so-called "gigantic demonstration" which my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) promised the House would take place yesterday? The hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) was obviously not at that demonstration in Trafalgar square, and nor were many others of his supporters.

Mr. Marlow: If I followed that line, Dame Janet, you would very properly call me out of order. The fact that there is a good case for a referendum has nothing to do with meetings in Trafalgar square.

Mr. Curry: In my constituency, when it comes to putting in applications for subsidy, the farmers' ability to translate from acres to hectares is instantaneous.

Mr. Marlow: That may be the case. I am sure that my hon. Friend agrees that the farmers in his constituency would be happier filling in the applications with the figures in acres rather than in hectares. It is not necessary to put the figures down in hectares. We are now, God be praised, in the days of subsidiarity. May we please have our acres back? Everyone would be pleased and it would not cause any problems for my hon. Friend's Department. If Brussels needs to have its figures and its bits of paper in hectares, I am sure that there could be a statistician in the Department who, in the twinkling of an eye, could give Brussels precisely what it wanted. There is no problem.

There are other problems with the CAP. I was talking about self-sufficiency. We believe in the market, although I realise that with agricultural commodities, with their dependence on the weather, all sorts of difficulties arise. We have to keep agricultural production going year on year.

The solution to over-production which our mentors in Europe provide for us is a system of quotas and set-aside. I have a great deal of philosophical difficulty with that. I am not saying that I could come up with a better package starting from the European end, but if we had a British agricultural policy, I am sure that we could come up with a better package.

What do quotas mean? They mean rationing. If a farmer has some cereals in this year, he can have some in next year, although not so many. If he keeps cows that produce milk, he can have cows next year, although not so many. If he has some sheep, he can keep some sheep next year. If he has some cattle, he can keep some cattle next year. By golly, it is just like the dock labour scheme—the rule seems to be, "If you have got it and you own it, you can keep it; if you do it, you can continue to do it." If someone from outside wants to compete and has new ideas, suggestions and more efficient ways of using a country's agricultural resources, that person is excluded. People say, "Not on your nelly." That person does not have a chance, and that is one of the problems with the CAP.

Mr. Rogers: The hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) is making a very evocative speech and has painted a nice rosy picture of the countryside with horses pulling ploughs, the sun setting, and so on. Will he now talk practically about the difficulties and problems of the CAP, not just for farmers, but for consumers?

Mr. Marlow: I thought that I was doing just that.

Mr. Rogers: What about consumers?

Mr. Marlow: Our overwhelming interest is for consumers. As I have said, consumers should get their food as cheaply as possible. That applies particularly to the less wealthy and less prosperous members of the Community. I believe that the CAP does everything but secure competitively priced food in the marketplace for the people of this country.

My hon. Friend the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and I were discussing self-sufficiency. Thanks to the effectiveness and productivity of our farmers and the agricultural community that supports them, self-sufficiency has increased in this country in respect of cereal growth. We used to import cereals in many areas, and we still import the hard wheat to make bread. However, we are now cereal exporters.

The Community has now decided that it must do something about cereal surpluses. It has therefore introduced set-aside. There may be no alternative to that, but we must consider the effect of agricultural set-aside. If one has a farm above a certain size involved in cereal production, one must lay fallow a portion of that land.

We have an effective and efficient agricultural structure in this country. We have large farms and, in particular in East Anglia, we have large cereal farms. The average size of our cereal farms is greater than anywhere else in Europe.

Mr. Rogers: That is big business.

Mr. Marlow: Indeed. We are all concerned about British business and UK Ltd. We are all interested in ensuring that money comes to the United Kingdom and does not go elsewhere. I am sure that the hon. Member for Rhondda would agree with that.

[Mr. Marlow]

Since Portugal, Spain and some other countries in southern Europe have joined the Community, with what they consider to be the benefits of the CAP, they have massively increased their cereal production. That is one of the reasons why we have surpluses.

The effect of set-aside is that the United Kingdom, which, with Denmark and Holland, is one of the most efficient cereal producers in Europe, is required to take more cereal land out of production than any other country in Europe. The Greeks and Portuguese, who have recently increased production to take advantage of what, for them, has become a bonanza, must take only a relatively small proportion of land out of agricultural production.

This country, as UK Ltd. and in terms of being able to produce and to obtain subsidies, is being discriminated against to a greater extent than any other European country. However, we are the most effective and most efficient. That does not make sense in market terms or any other terms.

Sir Richard Body: The discrimination goes way beyond that. The position is much worse. We classify our land according to five grades. No one would doubt that cereals and other arable crops should be grown on grade 1 and grade 2 land. I am glad to say that my constituency consists entirely of grade 1 and grade 2 land. However, our farmers are being penalised because we must have the same degree of set-aside as poor-quality grade 3 land—the typically poor land in Northamptonshire—even worse grade 4 land in Cornwall, and even grade 5 land which has been growing cereals. That must be done at vast expense to the CAP.

Surely one of the arguments for repatriating agricultural policy is that we would be able to tailor a set-aside policy—if we had to have such a thing—according to our own needs, instead of according to the men in Brussels, who have no idea how our land is parcelled out and at great disadvantage to my constituents.

Mr. Marlow: As usual, my hon. Friend is absolutely spot on and quite right. He is correct because, as I said earlier, the CAP is not just an agricultural policy—it is an agricultural and social policy. The social needs of the rural areas in the United Kingdom are very different from the social needs of the rural areas elsewhere in the Community.

Because it is a social policy, it is applied in a blanket way. The best and more efficient land is taken out of production when it should be in production while the less good land, on which other things could be done, particularly in southern England, is being allowed to produce in much greater quantities.

Mr. Cash: In line with what my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body) said, does my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) accept that the method of parcelling out land is also directly related to land registry? According to the Court of Auditors reports that we debate once a year, it is clear that many other members states simply do not know who owns the land. Therefore, the massive fraud identified by the Court of Auditors militates dramatically against the interests of the British farmer. That is another scandal which must be sorted out.

Mr. Marlow: The CAP is very unevenly applied in terms of ensuring that the right person does not get the wrong subsidy. I believe that it is effectively applied within the United Kingdom, but there are parts of Europe, which I must not mention for fear of offending my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, which are less rigorous in the application of Community rules than the United Kingdom.

Those parts of the Community have not been particularly rigorous about such matters by custom and practice. If they are not rigorous, they get more money from Brussels. It is therefore in the national interest to be sloppy about the application of Brussels regulations. I do not wish to be derogatory when I say that the southern European attitude is different from the northern European attitude. The southern Europeans see the benefits of letting things go and of laissez-faire.

I understand that there is a great thing about olive trees. It has been explained to me that in Italy, in respect of olive trees, one must submit an application for subsidy through a local co-operative, which manages the application and forwards the papers. Although I am sure that I have got it wrong, I have also been told that in Italy there are no regional co-operatives. There is a kind of communist co-operative, a kind of Church co-operative and a kind of geographical co-operative.

Therefore, in every area in Italy, there are three co-operatives all ready, willing and able to handle an application for subsidy. One co-operative will not ask whether another is handling an application, because the producer will cease to do business with it. There was a time, therefore, when applications for subsidies in respect of olive trees in Italy outnumbered the number of olive trees that there could possibly have been in Italy. Even if Italy had been covered by olive trees from one end to the other, there would still have been more applications for subsidy than olive trees.

Mr. Leighton: Is not one of the main motivations of the CAP the way in which the ruling parties on the continent bribe their peasant farmers to vote for them? I do not mind that, but I object to the British paying the price.

Mr. Marlow: As the hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) is aware, there is Salic law in Germany. If a landowner dies and he has 17 children, they each receive a 17th of the property. There tend to be smallholdings in Germany. People like to have smallholdings, which are not particularly efficient. They therefore have another job as well. They like to get some money to their smallholdings. As markets drop, they must get a lot of ecus for their land.

Although Germany claims to be effective and efficient, it is actually a secret admirer of the CAP because it allows Germany to provide through the back door subventions to the rural communities in Germany which the German taxpayers would not accept through the front door. That is their way of doing it. That is how they want it done.

I apologise for boring my hon. Friend the Minister of State about the CAP. However, I want to refer to sheep.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does not my hon. Friend agree that one of the great tragedies of the CAP is that it has required some of the best minds in the British Government to devote so much of their time to activities which bring them little or no reward?

Mr. Marlow: I would not say that. My hon. Friend and our right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food struggled valiantly in the jungle and the morass of the common agricultural policy to do what is right and best for Britain, but they are one among 12. As I have said before, we normally play by Queensberry, whereas the rest play by Italian rules, and that makes life rather difficult.

Mr. Gill: My hon. Friend is making a most interesting and wide-ranging speech about agriculture, which he clearly recognises as a practical industry. It is regrettable that, in that highly practical industry—my hon. Friend might agree—the least consideration is now given to the practical aspects of agriculture and its products. For political reasons, each decision is inevitably a compromise, and almost invariably is too late for the practical farmer.

I am interested in my hon. Friend's views on that subject. If we go down that road and make decisions too late to be of any practical use, decisions which at the best of times are only a compromise, and decisions which are purely political, the long-term future for farmers must be pretty bleak.

Mr. Marlow: My hon. Friend is right to an extent. There are grave difficulties for people running the common agricultural policy at the moment because of circumstances, and they have to introduce policies. I hope that they will introduce policies in time for farmers to know what to do, what to sow, what to buy and what their programmes will be next year and the year after that. That is very difficult at the moment. I do not know what they can do to improve it, but improve it they certainly should. It is very difficult.

As we have different agriculture, a different society, a different rural mix and all the rest, if we had our own agricultural policy in our own country, that would not mean that we could not have a common market with Europe and that we cannot have one big level playing field —it would take some time to get there, but one big commercial and industrial playing field in Europe. We do not have to be part of a common agricultural policy to do that. If we had our own agricultural policy, I believe firmly that we could provide a much more flexible system so that our farmers were aware in time of what was the best programme in the interests of the United Kingdom so that they could follow that programme.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Marlow: I am getting confused.

Mr. Quentin Davies: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Marlow: I am getting even more confused. Our problems at the moment are, first, that farmers do not know what to do in time and, secondly, that there is an increasing tendency among farmers not to plant crops but to plant subsidies. If we had our own agricultural policy we would have a far more genuine and sensible approach.

Several Hon. Members rose——

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. Before another hon. Member intervenes, I remind hon. Members that interventions should be short. They have been becoming progressively longer as the evening has passed.

Mr. Knapman: My intervention will be short, as is my custom. Does my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) believe that one of the dangers might be that, in essence, civil servants in Brussels have views on slaughterhouses, for instance, and when the matter comes back to this country we have another group of civil servants, also with views on slaughterhouses, who build one lot of regulations on top of another? If the treaty is passed, will it affect the number of civil servants in this country?

Mr. Marlow: As night follows day, if we introduce legislation, particularly European legislation, there is a geometric progression in the number of civil servants. My hon. Friend reinforces a point that I have been making. Complex regulations are sometimes made in Brussels and we, because of our very honourable traditions, enforce them to the letter by the Queensberry rules, whereas others do not. My hon. Friend has referred to slaughterhouses. They are causing great grief to many people. Fallen stock or dead cattle—casualties—have to be moved. That is causing problems in agriculture at the moment.

Also, if an animal is fit but has to go, and it has to go fairly quickly, one does not want to have to put it on a lorry and trundle it 10 or 15 miles across the country to the nearest slaughterhouse. One needs somewhere small and close. All our traditional little butchers that have had their own slaughterhouses have produced an excellent service for the public for generations. I am not aware of any great hue and cry about people getting food poisoning in the village of Braunston where Berry's has been producing meat for many years. However, apparently we are going to be obliged by the great high-ups in Brussels to jettison our traditions, our culture and our butchery trade so that we can all have it nicely sealed in hermetic packages that come from Sainsbury's. I prefer the old system and I am sure that my hon. Friend does, too.

Mr. Lord: My hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) posed a question about how difficult it is to fix prices promptly when there are so many people to think about. Is it not a basic problem of the common agricultural policy that, when dealing with 12 nations with different climates, cultures and political outlooks, it is bound to take a lot of horse trading, if my hon. Friend will forgive the agricultural allusion, to get it right? We have been asked what are the advantages of our old system. In the old days, when such matters were the responsibility of our own Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, on one particular day of the year all agriculture prices were fixed and everybody knew precisely when that was going to happen and where they stood.

Mr. Marlow: My hon. Friend is quite right. There are disparate agriculture economies in the European Community. We are trying to force them all into the same mould. That has not worked—it is not working. Also, some countries within the Community have a far higher proportion of people who live on the land, work on the land, work with people who work on the land or who have families who work on the land. Therefore, those countries have a disproportionate influence on agricultural policy which is then handed down to us. Our agricultural policy —the European agricultural policy—is less apt and appropriate for the United Kingdom than it is for many other countries within the European Community.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Knapman) asked a question about slaughtering. One thing that tears people's hearts is that, if we are to move towards the European system of having a slaughterhouse every 50 miles or so, animals will have to travel much greater distances before they are slaughtered. I should have thought that animal welfare groups would have had a say in those matters.

Mr. Quentin Davies: I am going to try to help my hon. Friend. In fact, I hope that I can help him to avoid falling straight into a major trap. He has been arguing that we should repatriate agricultural policy while having a free market with the rest of the Community in agricultural products. Does he appreciate that the result would be that the continentals would subsidise their farmers to a much greater extent precisely because of the greater political pressures on the farming community that have already been referred to, and our farmers would be undercut because they would not have the benefit of the same subsidy? As a result, our farmers would be wiped out and consumers in this country would be totally dependent on continental producers.

Mr. Marlow: I have heard of scaremongering and bogus scare stories, but I draw my hon. Friend back to the point that I made some time ago. We are making a massive subvention each year to the European Community, basically through the common agricultural policy and the European budget. By some judicious arrangement, if we did not have to make such massive subventions to the Community, we could make sure that our farmers were all right, that they were producing more, that they were producing as efficiently as they are at the moment, that we were more self-sufficient than we are at the moment, that our consumers and our poor would be able to have lower food prices which would enable us to keep taxes lower —my hon. Friend has connections in the City—and business would boom with the most prosperous economy in Europe because our taxes would be so low because we had to pay relatively smaller amounts.

I said that I would say a few words about sheep. We have a European policy with regard to sheep. My hon. Friend the Minister of State has struggled manfully in this matter, as in all others. Last year, one had to apply for subsidy, and so on. If one had a ewe that died, one had to inform the local office of the Ministry that the ewe had died, within 10 days of one's having discovered that the ewe had died. I think that there are 20·5 million ewes in this country. My hon. Friend the Minister of State will tell me what proportion of ewes die in childbirth, so to speak—it must be 2 per cent. or 3 per cent., which is about 500,000 ewes dying each year.

Have half a million letters been turning up at the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food? If they have, what has been happening in France and Italy? Within 10 days of the discovery of the loss of an animal, have the returns been sent in? Last year, it was easy, but this year we have directives from Mr. Delors and his friends—it is not the fault of my hon. Friend the Minister of State.

This year, one has to provide, in advance of a 100-day season, the number of ewes, including ewe lambs, that are about to give birth. If, during that period, one loses an animal, within 10 days of discovering the loss, one must let the Ministry know. If one gets rid of an animal, within seven days of doing so one has to replace it. Let us suppose that it rains heavily and spoils the pasture so that one has to get rid of some animals. One must replace them within a week. If the pasture cannot sustain them, why should one obtain more animals just because Mr. Delors says so?

If the farmer is dealing with lambing or some other task on the farm, he may not be able to replace losses within seven days. He will not be able to go to his neighbour to replace a sheep as the neighbour will have to keep up his quota. The farmer may well not be able to get to market to buy the sheep to keep up to quota. What will he do? Will he say, "I am sorry—I have lost some sheep"? In addition, his bank manager may be sniffing over the farmer's shoulder and wanting cash. The only way the farmer can raise some cash is by selling a few ewes. If he does so, he will be in trouble with Mr. Delors, and for every ewe sold he will lose three or four times as much subsidy.

We all play cricket in the United Kingdom, so our farmers will all admit that the pasture was wrong, the bank manager was getting on to them, and they had to sell 40 out of their 200 ewes. The farmer will say, "I am an honest man—it was an fair cop and I will write to the Ministry to say that I have got rid of 40 ewes." He will lose the subsidy on the other ewes. Will that happen in Italy and the rest of Europe? Or will the regulation merely discriminate against people in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Gill: My hon. Friend is out of order in ascribing all that to Mr. Delors. The Council of Ministers has approved such matters.

Mr. Marlow: My hon. Friend is being a little harsh. I know that it is the Council of Ministers that takes such action. My hon. Friend also knows of the long nights spent in discussion, when we lose 20 and win one. In order to ensure that we win one concession, we have to lose 20. I ask my hon. Friend to put himself in the Minister's position to see how difficult it would be to achieve a better deal. The cards are stacked against us. Our boys have struggled manfully on behalf of the Government.

Sir Russell Johnston: The hon. Gentleman is wrong on another matter——

Mr. Marlow: I am sure that I am wrong on many issues.

Sir Russell Johnston: That is also true. I am tired of hearing the hon. Gentleman say, "The rest of Europe is dishonest and we are the only honest people around." That is simply not true.

Mr. Marlow: The right hon. Gentleman was not present when I intervened in the speech of his hon. Friend the Member for North Cornwall. I am sure that the right hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) talks to farmers in his district about milk quotas. I asked the hon. Member for North Cornwall when milk quotas would be applied in Italy. We have had them here for years—we are under the same regime, in the same common market—but the Italians have not had them. Will they be imposed in Italy this month, next month, this year, in five years or in 10 years? The right hon.

Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber said that we should not say that there was an uneven level of application of Community regulations. Can he tell me when milk quotas are to be applied in Italy? I shall gladly give way. I give him the chance, but he is not taking it.

Mr. Lord: Is there not a basic difference? I think that the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) is talking about fraud and cheating, whereas my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) is talking about ridiculous machinery. There is, in fact, common ground. My hon. Friend referred to Italian milk quotas. I was a parliamentary private secretary in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when milk quotas were introduced—it seems a long time ago.

In this country, we flick a switch and, because we have a milk marketing board, all our farmers are called into line the next morning. They fill in their forms and do what they are told. In Italy, it is not known where the dairy farmers are, so there was no question of the milk quotas being enforced in the same way as we were able to do here. There is an uneven playing field, which discriminates horribly against this country. That is not the result of fraud, but because we are much more competent and organised, and have been penalised for it.

Mr. Marlow: My hon. Friend has been characteristically generous. He likes to see the best side of people. I am not critical of southern Europeans for having a different attitude to such matters—that is to do with their culture and way of life. I am worried that the difference discriminates against us. As my hon. Friend said, in matters of regulation and record, the southern Europeans, for reasons of their own, have different standards and attitudes from those of the United Kingdom. I am concerned about Britain. I want us to get a fair deal, and I do not think that we do.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my hon. Friend agree that, before we entered the common agriculture policy, the structures and civil service which existed in this country —such as the marketing boards—gave us a framework within which it was possible to change policy quickly? That is why it is easier for those in other parts of Europe to cheat if they want to.

Mr. Marlow: I am grateful to my hon. Friend but, with respect, I think that we have exhausted that subject.

I shall make one comment on sheep and then move to other issues, unless someone is bursting to talk about other matters. There are many important subjects that I want to mention, but I am not mad keen to do so if other hon. Members want to speak on them.

I understand that, as a result of a decision by our bureaucratic masters, we will have to identify all animals, including sheep, for the purposes of avoiding fraud. In this context I do not mention Italy, but Greece and Portugal. How are we to mark the sheep? As I said to the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber, I get many things wrong, but I understand that we must ear-tag sheep, which worries me.

I doubt whether the people who make the regulations have ever put on a pair of Wellington boots, let alone gone on to a farm. My hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Central (Mr. Lord) knows considerably more about the subject than I do, but I have spent nights with sheep—I shall rephrase that: I have helped sheep to lamb, I have experience of catching sheep and dealing with sheep, and I know a certain amount about sheep.

It is a savage thing to do but—because I want to identify sheep and how well they are lambing—I put ear tags on sheep. Sheep are funny animals, which burrow around in hedges and get caught on barbed wire. If we ear-tag sheep, I bet a pound to 20 shillings that, within three years, the tags will have been ripped out. I do not know of an identification system that will work properly. Again, I get on my knees to my hon. Friend the Minister of State to ask him not to introduce a system that will not work just to please our bureaucratic masters in Brussels.

I congratulate the Government on a difficult task that has been almost adequately performed. The amendments are probing amendments which relate to many of the issues in article 3, which is part of the meat—the sirloin —of the treaty. They constitute the 10 commandments from Brussels and have involved long negotiations in Brussels.

If we look back to the dark days of the Maastricht meeting about 15 months ago, we see that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister performed magnificently. He had a difficult task. He did not want the Maastricht treaty. He did not initiate or give birth to it. It was foisted on him; he was ambushed. In those circumstances, the treaty could have been much worse.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones). He has shown charm and a considerable knowledge of Europe. I disagree with him on many of these policies, but in the circumstances he has done a good job. The trouble is that, despite heroic efforts, we still have this treaty and certain of the amendments to it.

The world has changed since December 1991, and when judging the treaty we ought to look at the motive behind it. Whose fingerprints are on it? We need look no further than the three wise men, or perhaps wicked uncles: Kohl, Mitterrand and Delors—two Frenchmen and a Hun. They are old men in a hurry, anxious to impose their own chapter on the history books of Europe before it is too late. They have said many times that Europe is changing and that the window of opportunity is closing fast, so they want to spirit the treaty through before the window is closed forever.

They display the ambitions of a generation of the past to fix Europe for ever in its own time warp. It is almost like a mad perversion of Sleeping Beauty—not to kiss the European princess and wake her to the glories of the Maastricht castle but to rape her while she slumbers before she is sensible to the realities of her degradation——

Mr. Tim Devlin (Stockton, South): I hesitate to interrupt my hon. Friend's reverie, but perhaps he will reflect on the fact that we are not moving into some wonderful new Europe, as he seems to think, because we have come to the end of the cold war. The cold reality, as witness Yugoslavia, is that we have reverted to the old Europe—full of national hatreds, competing nationalisms, ethnic unrest and factional groups. Had Yugoslavia been in the Community for the past 30 years, it is very unlikely that the sort of conflict taking place now would have happened. I am worried that people like my hon. Friend who talk of Huns and Frenchmen carving up Europe want to invoke again the old nationalisms and to cause again the old problems which the EC is designed to prevent.

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not go down that road; it is not strictly relevant to the amendments.

Mr. Marlow: Some of my best friends are Huns, Dame Janet. The treaty will impose on the Community the very problems that Yugoslavia and the Soviet Union have experienced. I am in favour of European co-operation and greater European unity. The trouble is that the contents of the treaty have been devised on high by a group of bureaucrats who believe that they know what is best for us. If we want Europe to come together and co-operate so as to generate a moderen and prosperous Europe, that must be done in a natural and developing process. It cannot be imposed. In the Soviet Union, communism was imposed; what happened in Yugoslavia with the ending of the Austro-Hungarian empire after the first world war, was also imposed. That is why it did not endure, and why I seek, to amend the treaty so that the same sort of nonsense and damage is not imposed on Europe. But I am every bit as keen on progress as the Minister of State is.

Sir Richard Body: Does my hon. Friend agree that a major argument against the common agricultural policy is that it has driven a wedge between us and France—two countries which should be at peace and working together in comity, which they are not doing now?

Mr. Marlow: Yes. The agricultural needs of France are different from those of the United Kingdom. The French will realise as time goes on that we must return to a balance of power in Europe. Germany has problems which I hope, from its point of view and from ours, it will overcome. There is no guarantee that it will—it might start to spiral downwards—but if it gets through its financial problems and unification problems and refugee problems and regains its self-confidence, it will become incredibly powerful in the European Community, so there is a natural alliance between ourselves and the French in maintaining the balance of power. Increasingly, some French statesmen, not politicians, understand that.

8.15 pm

Mr. Richard Shepherd: I am not sure whether our hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Devlin) is trying to say that there would not have been a war in Yugoslavia if it had been a beneficiary of the common agricultural policy, but his historical analogy is in any case a poor one. From 1815 to 1914, the United Kingdom was not engaged in continental warfare, so long periods of our history——

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman is going down precisely the road that I suggested that he should not take.

Mr. Shepherd: I was trying to emphasise that, during those hundred years, we did not have the benefit of the common agricultural policy, so there was no basis for tension. I was trying to suggest that the CAP perhaps gives rise to tension rather than the contrary.

Mr. Marlow: My hon. Friend is right. The CAP does give rise to tensions in Europe, because the needs of our agricultural economy are very different from other parts of Europe. By repatriating agricultural policy we would cater for our own needs better, as would the countries in Europe, so there would be fewer grounds for conflict.

The world has changed a great deal since December 1991. The European bicycle is still pedalling, but intermittently, and it is swerving from side to side. It is in grave danger of being squashed by a juggernaut. First the Danes said no, then only 33 per cent. of the French said, oui. As they become aware of the contents of the treaty and the amendments proposed to it, the people of Britain are becoming more reluctant to embrace it.

Mr. Curry: If we did not have the CAP, does my hon. Friend think that Britain would have any more success at getting her consignments of lamb into France? Does he appreciate the extent to which upland constituencies depend on exports and the extent to which United Kingdom sheep producers depend on this market place? Would it be easier to get our consignments into France if we were not partners in the common agricultural policy and thus had no right to send our lamb to France?

Mr. Marlow: I regret that intervention. I respect my hon. Friend as someone who is much more intelligent than I am. He should realise that, if we were not in the CAP or could derogate from it and had our own structure of agriculture—British agriculture is still not self-sufficient—it would be markedly different. If farmers were not raising sheep, they might be doing something else. The prices might be lower. Red meat consumption has fallen in this country, but if prices were lower it might increase. The problem is not as straightforward as the Minister suggests.

Mr. Lord: It is not just we who might seek to repatriate agricultural policy. Perhaps other nations will think of doing the same. Every nation should look after its own agriculture as it thinks best and have trading arrangements which suit it.

To answer the Minister's point about lamb, surely the answer is that people will buy our lamb if it is the right lamb at the right price. It will be in their interests to do so. Otherwise, they will be biting off their noses to spite their faces.

Mr. Marlow: I have been boring the House for far too long—[Interruption.] I am sorry to see the Minister of State agreeing with that remark. While he was away—I know that he had good reason to be—I was polite about him. My hon. Friend has a strength which is a weakness in me. He is fair to all the other countries and peoples in Europe. I am not—I am purely concerned with the interests and policies of the United Kingdom, which would be better effected if we had a level playing field and proper co-operation with our European partners. We shall not achieve those ends through the treaty. That is why I support the amendments.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): The amendments, of which I have tabled six or seven, propose that certain sections of the treaty be omitted so that they can be discussed. I wish that I was dealing with economic issues but we have had one debate on those and shall return to the topic in other debates. The main problem with the treaty is that monetarism is the cancer at its core.

I should like to deal with three broad areas, the first of which is commercial policy towards the single market. The second area is research and development and the third is primarily concerned with the common fisheries policy and its legal basis. It is important to raise those issues because in many ways the treaty is all things to all people. It is deliberately designed and written in that way.

As we saw earlier in the debate, the simple position of my party is that the treaty means what we wish it said, to the Government the treaty means what the Prime Minister wants it to mean, and the European position tends to be that the treaty means what it says. The European approach will prevail because the damaging evidence and the results of the treaty are clearly spelled out in it. The debate has been a process of wish fulfilment, with people arguing that the treaty does not quite mean what it says or that it will all be different when it is implemented. Therefore, it is important to ask what will be implemented.

I have tabled amendments Nos. 357, 358, 360 and 361 on commercial policy, the internal market, competition and the approximation of laws. What do the sections of the treaty that I propose to remove add to the provisions of the Single European Act? We are all attached to the principle of fair competition, but all hon. Members are deluged with complaints from constituents and firms that the level playing field does not operate. Even now in 1993 with the single market nominally with us there are still inhibitions on competition and areas in which British firms cannot compete on an equal basis. There are many barriers to the operation of the single market and they must be removed.

What difference will the Maastricht treaty make to the barriers to fair competition for our firms and industries that operate in the EC? Some of the barriers are social, some are institutional and some are legal, and they will not be effectively removed by the provisions of the treaty that my amendments would remove. I want Ministers to justify the treaty's proposals and tell us how they will help British firms facing inequal competition.

There is a series of inequalities. For example, there is the inequality of the ability to take over and develop representation or to take over firms to obtain a distribution network in Europe. Britain has the most open takeover market in Europe. It is possible for any firm to come here and launch a contested takeover bid for a British firm and then dismantle it. That has happened many times and firms have been reduced to shells. The manufacturing capacity was removed and production on the continent was substituted. The firms were used as a distribution network for imported manufactured goods from outside, usually from Europe.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Does my hon. Friend agree that that happens not just in manufacturing? Nationalised companies in France use taxpayers' money to buy large numbers of assets that have been sold by the British Government and which belonged to the British people. Large companies such as Compagnie Generale des Eaux control many British assets through quite legitimate acquisitions of rights.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: As usual, my hon. Friend is absolutely right. Wherever the investment money comes from, those firms have a freedom which our firms do not have. There are all kinds of inhibitions—legal but mainly institutional, and especially the close nexus between firms and the banks which provide the finance and have an interest in the firms—to the ability to make contested takeovers in Germany. In that sense a British firm is on its own. It is nominally controlled by its shareholders who are nominally all-powerful. In practice they sell to the highest bidder, but there is investment by the banks and lander in German firms.

Competition is rendered unfair because of effective subsidies through lower prices charged by nationalised industries in Europe, especially Electricité Generale de France, which provides an effectively subsidised lower energy price which reduces costs for French firms. There are also problems with subsidies to Italian firms. All those subsidies take time to define and explore and it takes time to make representations to the Commission.

The other hidden obstacle to genuine competition is that, as far as I can see, there is no strengthening of any ability to strike down the barriers and no sign of an ability by British firms faced with such barriers to have them dealt with promptly before those firms are ruined by the barriers. Those who are inhibiting competition and distorting the playing field survive and prosper to take over an increasing share of our market and repel the exports that we need to make to Europe.

What do the provisions which my amendments seek to remove mean for the effective establishment of a genuine, open, single market with effective and free competition? The Minister must deal with that question in length. We have had many assurances that in voting for the Single European Act five or six years ago Conservative Members entered into all kinds of commitments. To what did they commit themselves in terms of accomplishing the single market that they support?

The second group of amendments are Nos. 384, 385, 386 and 387, which deal with research technology and development. The whole tenor of Government policy for the past 13 or 14 years has been to weaken and undermine the manufacturing base upon which the economy rests. Research technology and the kind of development that the Commission wants to be able to foster through the treaty's provisions do not spring fully armed from the head of the Commission. They are generated, supported and financed by a powerful, effective, competitive industrial base. That is exactly what has been undermined in this country.

Instead of building up British industrial and manufacturing capacity, the process over the past 13 years of diminished competitiveness, over-valuation and deflation has been deeply damaging, especially from 1979 to 1982 but also from 1989 onwards and particularly after we joined the exchange rate mechanism in 1990. The result is that over a quarter of our manufacturing capacity has closed and our manufacturing base has shrunk too far to be viable to support a healthy competitive manufacturing economy and our standard of living and institutions.

That weakness will be disastrously difficult to remedy. It gives the lie to all the Government's hopes that we are in a 1973 situation—one little dollop of devaluation and we can produce a new economic miracle. When that happened in 1973, our manufacturing base was stronger and more competitive and it could be revived by devaluation. It has now been undermined too far for that policy to be effective.

8.30 pm

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): Given what my hon. Friend said about the decline and the destruction of a large part of our manufacturing industry, would it not be necessary to do an awful lot more than have a level playing field? My right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) and I were involved in the earlier devaluation, when we had a manufacturing base, but the problem now is that if we do not have the power to act, it will not be possible to——

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. We cannot hear the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) because he is turning and talking to his colleague.

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Morris): The right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) may have noted what the hon. Lady has said.

Mr. Mitchell: My right hon. Friend is right. To revive, expand, widen or deepen our industrial base will be a more difficult challenge and it will not be achieved either by getting an effective level playing field in Europe or by just redressing the terms of manufacturing trade through competitive devaluation, which is what we have had. That devaluation must go further and deeper and there must be measures to manage the economy and encourage investment in manufacturing. The whole job will be much more difficult.

My point was simply that the weakening of the industrial base has meant that substitution of a large part of domestically controlled manufacturing capacity by Japanese investment, which will not generate the same investment in research and development. To call it "screwdriver investment" is to put it too harshly and strongly, but all that it will bring us is the assembly of cars and other goods from materials manufactured in Japan. More importantly, the high value-added element in the research and development equation will be kept in Japan because the Japanese, unlike us, know where their real interests lie.

All that means that we have been weakening research and development and technology at the same time as the European Community has been trying to build up a competence in that sector. I do not quibble with that—it is bound to follow that course, particularly because Europe too has been burdened with over-valuation. The emphasis in research and development and technology is now all on competitiveness and on increasing the competitiveness of Europe as a whole through investing in that sector. That becomes a substitute for the competitiveness which should be there through the exchange rate, but which we lost through the exchange rate policies that dominated in Europe.

There was an over-valuation of European currencies as a block throughout the 1980s. That over-valuation, which has made the Community the unemployment and low growth black spot of the west, has also made it an area of diminished investment and the Commission has had to come forward with its own programmes and policies.

Mr. Cash: Does the hon. Gentleman remember that the percentage of sales in the United Kingdom that goes into research and development is only 2 per cent., whereas in Germany runs at 6 per cent.? That tells a story, and shows what we must rectify. Is the hon. Gentleman also aware that research and development for the benefit of the so-called Euro-champions—for example, Phillips-Siemens and the APT-Spanish telecommunications venture—have been singular failures? Pouring in money in an attempt to restrain the invasion by the Japanese of mega-bids, as they call them, is not working. Indeed, it is chucking money away.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman is right. He used the argument that I was about to advance. He has stolen my thunder and hon. Members will say that I am being boring when I make the same point, but it remains valid. Research and development and technology, have been weakened, in Britain and in the Community, compared to the Japanese competitor particularly. The Commission has attempted to substitute its own research and development programme. We shall have to pay for that—because, under the present system of financing the Community, we shall be major contributors—without getting the benefit of it. Because it is a bureaucratically handled system of investment and technology, it will often—not necessarily always—be wasted. The problem is that it will go to the kind of prestige project that a bureaucracy is likely to invest in rather than to the kind of project that the market would drive investment to if we had a healthy competitive manufacturing base.

We are preparing the way for an extension of that policy by the provisions of the treaty and in particular those that my amendments would remove. I have tabled the amendments to find out what Ministers expect to see as a result of those provisions in the treaty. I am worried about what will be the nature of development. We have seen it already in high definition television. As the Community has concentrated on the D-MAC system, it has invested in a technology that is manifestly outdated rather than moving ahead to the latest technologies. That will benefit companies in Europe that the Community wishes to protect—in Holland and France—but it is of no benefit to Britain, although we shall have to help pay for it. The Government have rightly opposed that. The treaty will lay us open to a whole series of such bureaucratic investments, which will have to be fought each time. That will be a wasteful process.

I notice in the Commission's document, "Research after Maastricht: an assessment, a strategy", it says, almost rhapsodically:

> "The 'research' part of the Treaty has been amended, and while the changes are not earth-shattering in absolute terms, as with music very small differences of emphasis may alter the overall effect."

That is beautiful stuff but it must be taken in conjunction with another sentence, which reads:

> "The impact of the Delors II package, which contains an entirely new part devoted to competitiveness, can be seen in terms of its research application."

What are we embarking on by the research and technology provisions in the treaty, which my amendments would strike out? What will Ministers accept and go along with? Is not the policy dangerous in that we shall contribute to the paying of it, but will not get the benefit of it? What provisions do Ministers envisage under the Delors proposals to finance them at our expense? The document on the assessment of research after Maastricht gives the new purposes of research.

I shall not bother the Committee with them all, but page 35 sets out four new objectives for research. They also include the following provision:

> "The framework programme shall be implemented through specific programmes".

On page 33, on the financial perspective on research and development, it also says:

"An examination of the figures appearing in the R and DT item in the financial perspectives shows a significant progression. R and DT expenditure increases from ECU 2·4 billion in 1992 to ECU 4·2 billion in 1997. The annual increase is about 11·5 per cent. The increase from 1992 to 1997 is about 71·6 per cent. In 1997 R and DT expenditure will reach approximately 5 per cent. of the total Community budget." What is our position on that? Do we accept that? Do we accept that the provisions in the treaty will have the implications that the Commission is setting out in its document? That question must be answered so that we can know exactly on what we are embarking in terms of the Maastricht treaty.

The next part of my argument is based on the common fisheries policy. I am glad to see the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on the Government Front Bench. I hope that he will respond to my remarks. I shall not deal with the common agricultural policy, which I dislike intensely. The hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) assessed it correctly. There is a need to repatriate the CAP. I hope that the Committee will divide on amendment No. 184, to which I am speaking and which, if agreed, would repatriate the policy.

It is a disastrous part of the EEC. It is still taking nearly two thirds of the Community's budget after all these years of reforming, changing and modifying it. There have been so many "triumphs" in the negotiating chamber, but the CAP still absorbs the overwhelming part of the budget. It is still unmodified, and it costs more every year. There is still massive fraud, and the policy continues to suit the United Kingdom as little as it ever did. It costs every family of four in this country between £17 and £18 a week. It imposes a burden on our industrial costs and competitiveness. We are being asked to support inefficient agriculture in other parts of Europe.

I am baffled by the position of the Liberal party. The Liberal spokesman represents the party of free trade. We recall that Cobden and Bright led the movement to abolish the corn laws, yet Liberal Members are now the foremost defenders of the new corn laws.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): The hon. Gentleman has referred to the excellent speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall, North (Mr. Tyler). My hon. Friend said that the alternative policy, as the wrecking amendments before us signify, would be to take Britain out of the common fisheries policy and out of the CAP. They would be removed from the part of the treaty that we are discussing. I shall be interested to hear the hon. Gentleman's response to the question that my hon. Friend put to the Committee: does he think that Britain would have more influence in trying to see, for example, the furtherance of the GATT and global free trade on its own or as an integrated member state of the European Community?

Mr. Mitchell: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman is falling into the same trap as his Liberal confreres. It is obvious that they are producing a sort of brain rot that is affecting his position on these matters. As for the GATT negotiations, it has been extremely difficult to stop the Commission negotiating from a French point of view and instead to negotiate from the point of view of consumers in the United Kingdom.

If we came out of the CAP, we could buy food on the cheapest market and reduce our costs. The basis of our agriculture has been distorted. We would be better repatriating the CAP. Great play has been made about the cost of returning to the old deficiency payments, but those would be domestic costs. Those costs would not go across the exchanges. We have a massive balance of payments deficit and we are having to contribute to a policy that does not suit us. The system of payments within the Community distorts the United Kingdom's position. We are not contributing in terms of our ability to contribute: we are contributing instead in terms of the overall situation of agriculture and imports of food into the country. We are a net contributor, and the second highest contributor.

Sir Russell Johnston: We hear so much talk about cheap food, but there is none unless we choose to take cheap food by exploiting the third world.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman's shape suggests that he has found access to cheap food or that he is extremely well paid. What he has just said is nonsense. Food outside the EEC is much cheaper than food within it. If we resumed our old pattern and repatriated our policy on agriculture, we could do what comes naturally to us, which is to buy food on the cheapest markets and send out our manufactured goods in return for that relationship.

8.45 pm

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Kennedy: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Mitchell: I have obviously touched a nerve. I give way to the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy).

Mr. Kennedy: I do not know why the hon. Gentleman is expressing surprise. He has touched a nerve by attacking my party. Surely it is reasonable to respond. The hon. Gentleman talks about going back to the old patterns, but what sort of argument is he trying to re-run? I remember the literature that the Labour Government distributed. It was supposed to be neutral material. In 1975, we had the "yes" literature and the "no" literature. The Government advice was to vote yes.

We were told in the literature that various Prime Ministers of Commonwealth countries—for example, Australia and New Zealand—were urging us to vote to stay in the European Community. I am taking up the hon. Gentleman's reference to exporting patterns. It was said that we should opt to stay in the Community and then to renegotiate terms. The Labour Government are on record as recommending that course to the British people. Why is it that, nearly 20 years later, the hon. Gentleman cannot come to terms with reality and with the decision that was then made?

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman is seeking to divert me from the path of rectitude. I was praising the past of his party, not attacking it. He is attacking the past of his party. Indeed, he is betraying every principle for which it ever stood in the context of these matters. It is incomprehensible that he should be doing so.

To answer the hon. Gentleman's question, are we to be forced to escalate payments to agriculture by accepting the CAP in a form which French farmers determine for the Community by means of political power or intransigent obstinacy, inappropriate though that might be for the United Kingdom? Why cannot we repatriate the CAP in bits? Why cannot extra payments be made domestically if a Government want to make extra payments to their farmers to support them at the level of the French peasantry, or to those German part-time farmers who work in the car industry but who have a few cows? Why cannot there be that form of repatriation? It does not have to be done in one fell swoop. The answer to the hon. Gentleman's question is that, if we took that course, we would be more competitive economically. The cost of living would be lower if we repatriated the entire policy.

Mr. Corbyn: Is my hon. Friend aware that one of the consequences of the CAP has been the destruction of agriculture in many third-world countries? The CAP is directed towards producing food products within western Europe that could be produced elsewhere at less cost and at much greater social benefit. Examples are the fate of the banana industry on the Windward Islands, of the cane sugar industry and of the maize industry in many countries throughout the world. The policy of the EEC has been detrimental to third-world economies. The last Lomé convention to be signed gave the lowest ever real rate of increase in food prices to the ACP countries, and produced the greatest interference in those economies. Is that not an example of Euro-arrogance, to the detriment of the peoples of the third world?

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend is right. At this stage, however, I shall leave the CAP. I never intended to deal with it. I mentioned it only in passing. It is because the Liberals are so guilty about their position on the CAP that I have been diverted. My hon. Friend has made a powerful and effective point.

I move on to the common fisheries policy, which would be struck out, as it were, by the acceptance of amendment No. 184, but in a different way and on a different basis. If we accept amendment No. 184, which advocates the striking out in article 3e of the reference to a common policy for agriculture and fisheries, there will still be a common agricultural policy. That policy is set out in the treaty of Rome, a treaty that we will not be amending. The important distinction is that there will not be a common fisheries policy, because there is no legitimate, legal provision in the treaty of Rome for such a policy.

I hope that the Minister will respond to my argument. If we accept the amendment and strike out the common fisheries policy as it is referred to in article 3e, we leave ourselves without such a policy except that which is agreed between Governments.

It does not have any basis in a treaty in the way that the CAP does, because that is written into the treaty of Rome, whereas that is an argument for accepting the amendment and striking out the CFP.

I want to develop my argument about why, if we accept the amendment, effectively we will be eliminating the CFP. It is a difficult argument. I hope that the Minister will bear with me because he will have to reply to it. I want to refer to a book by a Mr. R. R. Churchill called "EEC Fisheries Law". On page 23, he says about the treaty of Rome:

"At first glance, it is not obvious that there is any provision in the EEC Treaty that could form the legal basis for a common fisheries policy or for fisheries legislation, since no article of the Treaty is overtly concerned with fisheries."

In other words, any assumption that the CFP has been provided for in the treaty of Rome is wrong. It has been provided for only by a series of distortions and dodges and doubtful interpretations. Therefore, if we agree to the amendment and strike out the CFP, it will no longer exist in a treaty.

The book then says, however, that evidence for a common fisheries policy is to be found in the provisions dealing with agriculture:

"After providing in Article 3(d) that the activities of the Community shall include 'the adoption of a common policy in the sphere of agriculture,' the Treaty goes on" to argue that agriculture actually includes fisheries.

As I read the treaty—I want the Minister to deal with this point—article 38 does not deal with agriculture in that way. It states:

"the common market shall extend to agriculture and trade in agricultural products."

Those are two matters with a distinction between them. The book states that in the treaty

"Agricultural products are defined as 'products of the soil, of stockfarming and of fisheries".

The extension to fisheries applies only to agricultural products, not to agriculture. Therefore, the common policy for agriculture does not extend to a common policy for fisheries. That is an important distinction because although we can regulate the trade in fish products, we cannot regulate the catching and the conservation of fish and other such aspects.

My argument is supported by the fact that article 40(1) of the treaty of Rome specifies that a common policy should have been adopted by the end of the transitional period—that is, 31 December 1969. No policy was developed——

Mr. Spearing: My hon. Friend means 1979.

Mr. Mitchell: No, I mean 1969. I am talking about the treaty of Rome.

No common policy was developed for fisheries by that time; it was developed only subsequently, in the early 1970s. It was clearly developed then as a means of gaining access to the waters of those fishing nations with rich fishing grounds applying for entry—Britain, Norway and Denmark.

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli): My hon. Friend will correct me if I am wrong, but my understanding is that, during the negotiations in 1972 on Britain's accession to the treaty, there were not specific negotiations on fisheries. That bears out what my hon. Friend has said.

Mr. Mitchell: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend. His point emphasises the basic difference between our approach and that of the Norwegians. Fisheries were not important to our Government, who were desperate to get into the EEC because they had no policy for the independent development of our country. They were prepared to accept any humiliation and any inadequate deal for the fishing industry in their desperate desire to get into the EEC. That was not the attitude of the Norwegian Government, who obtained stronger defences for their fishing industry. However, even those subsequently proved to be inadequate because the Norwegian electorate rejected them.

However, I am not sure that my hon. Friend is right in what he says, because, on page 29 of his book, Churchill argues that article 102 of the treaty of accession mentions fisheries and provides:

"From the sixth year after Accession at the latest, the Council, acting on a proposal from the Commission, shall determine conditions for fishing with a view to ensuring protection of the fishing grounds and conservation of the biological resources of the sea."

However, Mr. Churchill argues that that cannot be a legal basis for a common fisheries policy. He says:

"Article 102 cannot be considered as a legal basis for fisheries legislation . . . because the intention in adding Article 102 to the Act of Accession was that a specific time limit should be laid down, rather than a new power conferred on the Community".

It is important that we consider the argument, and that the Minister deals with it when he replies. There is no legal basis in either this treaty or in the treaty of Rome for a common fisheries policy that has been bedeviling the fishing industry for so many years.

Mr. Cash: One point slightly troubles me, and that is the Factortame case. Whether or not we like it, the European Court has adjudicated on that case on the assumption that there is a fisheries policy, including quotas, when in fact it appears that there is no such policy. Was the Churchill book published after Factortame?

Mr. Mitchell: The book was published before Factortame. The judgment is a further force behind my argument. The court made a decision, based on a principle that is in the treaty of Rome, that companies within the Community should be able to establish themselves wherever they wanted—that there should be the right of free circulation of business within the Community. The judgment was not reached on the basis of any common fisheries policy that gives nation states a measure of control or influence over the catches in their waters or that allocates catches on the basis of contributions to the common fisheries pool. The court effectively said that the principle included in the treaty of Rome was more important than the principle which I am arguing is not in that treaty. That was the basis of the judgment.

Mr. Spearing: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, because some hon. Members have assumed that those of us who follow these matters know all about the treaty. In fact, this is the first time in 20 years that I have realised that there is no sound basis for the common fisheries policy, with its attendant problems for fishing vessels and policing the seas. The House and the country are much obliged to my hon. Friend for making that clear.

Does not my hon. Friend's point clearly show that the moral throughout these debates is that there are always surprises in any EC treaty? If the basis of the CFP is rocky, does not that show that in many of the treaties we have passed, especially the Single European Act, there are constant surprises? We do not know to what we bind ourselves.

Mr. Mitchell: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for that compliment. To have added to his stock of knowledge on Europe is, perhaps, the most significant contribution that I have ever made to the proceedings of the House. I am genuinely flattered, because it is difficult to add to what my hon. Friend knows about Europe. We have mistakenly acknowledged that the treaty of Rome provides for a common fisheries policy, but it does not. If the amendment is passed, we will be able to decide what action we want to take about a fisheries policy to suit our purposes.

The fisheries policy does not have a legal basis in the treaty. It is sometimes argued that fish do not carry flags and do not have any national allegiance. The argument does not have a biological basis. It is nonsense to say that other nations will fish out those fish that migrate across the North sea just out of spite. The normal process of migration would continue. That inhibition has not prevented Norway from enforcing and administering a most efficient fisheries policy, which has done far better by that country's industry than the common fisheries policy has done by ours.

Only this nation state is concerned to conserve and to build its fish stocks so that they can be passed on to the next generation. All the other nations have a predatory interest in our fish stocks because they want to keep their industries, which are too large, in existence. That is why they wanted access to our waters in the first place. That is why they framed that pastiche of a deal in the form of a common fisheries policy just before the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) initiated negotiations. Those nations knew what was coming and wanted access to our stocks.

There is no legal or biological basis for the common fisheries policy. For a nation whose waters contain more than two thirds of the stocks and more than 70 per cent. —probably three quarters—of the stocks by value of those fish most needed for human consumption, we secured a pathetically bad deal in being allocated one third or less of the catches made in waters to which we make such a large contribution. That happened after losing access to Icelandic waters as well.

It would be in our interest to repatriate our fisheries and agricultural policies. We could administer and enforce them. The waters are ours, and we have the Fisheries Limits Act 1976 as a basis. We would only have to relist the countries exempted from that legislation. It is spectacularly in our interests to do that.

The Minister has created a situation in which our fishermen will be stopped from putting to sea to catch our fish in our waters, while at the same time not imposing any effective control on continental competitors whose landings are not administered, checked and policed in the same way, but who are allowed to fish on uncontrolled in our waters. The British fishing industry will not accept that for a minute.

Mr. Cash: As to south-west area 7, does the hon. Gentleman recall that Britain is allowed to take only 10 per cent. of quotas and stocks, whereas our so-called partners in the Community take 90 per cent? That is a curious partnership. In 1993, the quota in the south-west will be nearly halved. Is that not a disgraceful state of affairs? How in heaven's name did we reach that position?

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman is right. In this context, "partners" means bitter competitors. The fisherman is by nature a predator. While our fishermen are shackled and kept in port by Government policies, their fellow predators are not held back, checked and controlled in the same way. The odds must be redressed in favour of our industry. Aneurin Bevan said that our island was built on coal and surrounded by fish. It is inconceivable that it should find itself in the present situation. We are closing our coal mines and allowing other nations to catch our fish. That is a result of a misguided emphasis on developing a common fisheries policy.

Mr. Spearing: To complete the Bevan trio, is my hon. Friend aware that there is considerable doubt and argument about sovereignty over the oil beneath the sea? Perhaps that ought to be considered in a future debate, Mr. Morris—but it is quite as murky as the non-fisheries policy.

Mr. Mitchell: I will not extend myself like an oil slick across the surface of this debate and address the oil industry, otherwise people will say, "Well, well—he has gone too far." Nevertheless, my hon. Friend is absolutely correct.

I have asked a series of questions arising from the Government's perception of what will happen following the introduction of the single market, which is supposed to introduce a genuinely level playing field for our businesses exporting to and competing within Europe. I have asked about research and technology, and the consequences to our contribution and our benefits if this inflated programme goes ahead.

Mr. Lord: Is not repatriation a double-edged sword? Would it not help both our farming and our fishing industries? The whole tenor of the hon. Gentleman's argument—with which I greatly sympathise—has been almost one of helplessness, on behalf of the fishermen in his constituency. His ability to represent them in the House, as Members of Parliament for his seat have done for centuries, has been taken from him.

My principal interest is in farming rather than fishing, but the hon. Gentleman's problems are even greater than mine. I wait with interest to hear the Minister's justification for what the Community has done to the fishermen, and his explanation of the benefits that they are to receive.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman is quite right. Great Grimsby is still England's premier fishing port, and ours is still a major fishing industry. It is very frustrating to have to go back to fishermen who are already bitterly disappointed—fishermen who have had an extremely raw deal, whose take-home money and catches are substantially down and who are now stopped from going to sea at certain times—and tell them. "I am sorry, but I can do nothing about it; it is the common market. We accepted what the common market said. The Minister did a deal. I know that the result of that deal will be enforced more vigorously on you than on your competitors, but we are not our own masters."

We shall all find ourselves in that position in regard to a range of policies—particularly the central policy that governs the way in which our economy is run to achieve growth or full employment—if we accept the deflationary monetarist cancer that lies at the core of the Maastricht treaty. We shall all be in a position in which I have been for years: a position that I would not want to inflict on anyone, because it is a national tragedy and a personal humiliation.

I have presented three serious arguments about three matters of prime concern to me. I hope that they will be dealt with seriously—especially the argument about fishing—because the House and the country are becoming fed up with continually being told, "Never mind the text; feel the glory of the union. Never mind what the treaty says; think how it will be when wishes are horses." We must consider the reality—what the treaty really says. I hope that the Government will justify that.

Mr. Bill Walker: The concluding remarks of the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), who represents a fishing constituency, could well have been my concluding remarks about the Scottish constituency and interest that I represent. There is no doubt that, when Scotland joined the Union and created this unitary Parliament, that Parliament had powers to make decisions about all the matters that affected our constituents. The more powers that we give away—however good our intentions—the more we will weaken this Parliament. We must reach a point at which the people of Scotland will ask, "What is the advantage to us of a unitary Parliament, given the powers involved?"

I want to consider those powers under the amendments that we are discussing. If I had drafted them myself, they could not have been more relevant to my constituency. I do not think that it will be long before the people of Scotland point out that they could do better on their own, whether they are inside or outside Europe. I suggest that at that point the days of this Parliament will be numbered.

The group of amendments that we are considering deal with industrial issues. I represent a 2,000 square mile Scottish constituency which is under water today. Last week it was under a lot of snow, with blocked roads causing many problems. That snow has largely melted, so my constituency is now under water. Horrendous transport problems therefore face my farmers and constituents. Yesterday I had to drive about 60 miles in order to reach my stables, only seven miles away, so that my daughter could feed the horses. Earlier in the day I could not have reached the stables. No roads were open. Eventually, however, one road became just passable with the right kind of vehicle.

The wealth of my constituency was built on whisky, textiles, food production and food processing. I invite those who believe that the whisky and textile industries and food production and food processing have had a good deal over the past 20 years to come to my constituency and talk to the industrialists there.

The whisky and textile industries believe that they have not had a fair deal. The food production and processing industries, in particular the canning factory and the chicken processing factory in my constituency, believe that there is no level playing field for the rules. French factories are desperately trying to penetrate United Kingdom markets. The maintenance of common European standards on hygiene and other matters costs money. Those standards are not common, however. We have to shoulder costs that they do not have to bear.

The tourist industry creates much employment in my constituency. Anybody who is involved in that industry knows that if we do not satisfy the customers they do not come back. One of the greatest attractions in the winter months in my constituency is the skiing in Glen Shee. We have snow on the mountains this year, but the roads are not open. There have been two landslips on the road up from Blairgowrie to Glen Shee. Anybody who has studied the problem realises that we need snow in quantity this winter in Glen Shee if the skiing is to remain viable. With the roads closed, the skiing industry faces financial disaster.

It is important to understand how great a magnet skiing has become in drawing consumers to the area. Without the skiing, Blairgowrie, where I live, would have died many years ago. Why do I say that? I return to our membership of the European Community and the impact of our membership on the canning industry. It was the largest employer in Blairgowrie. The industry employed more than 400 people. Blairgowrie also had spinning mills. At one time it had 19. When I stood as a candidate, Blairgowrie had four working spinning mills. Just before I became the Member of Parliament—it was fortunate for me that it happened no later—the canning factory and the spinning mills closed down, and more than 600 people, in a very small community, lost their jobs. Only the magnet of the skiing industry has offset the huge problems that the closure of those industries caused.

Mr. Charles Kennedy: I am listening, as ever, with care and attention to the hon. Gentleman's detailed comments about his constituency. I accept that he approaches the debate from an anti-Maastricht view, or at least from a somewhat sceptical view about the European Community as a whole. I cannot speak with authority or knowledge about Glen Shee, but does he recognise that other major skiing developments, such as Aonach Mor in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston), were possible only because of European regional development fund support? He is highlighting the importance of the ski industry, but the point could be made equally about other sectors. He should recognise that the ERDF has made the difference in the development of the skiing industry.

9.15 pm

Mr. Walker: That was the best intervention that I could have asked for. A long time ago, a line was drawn across Scotland, north of which, it was said, is the Highland region. Of course, you, Mr. Morris, should never come to my constituency, which has some of the highest mountains in Scotland, because, according to whoever drew that lovely line on the map, we are not Highland. Therefore, my constituency does not enjoy the benefits of Ross, Cromarty and Skye—the largesse that comes from Europe. My taxpayers' money—they pay £1·68 into Europe and get £1 back—is laundered to the hon. Gentleman's constituency. That applies to industry and farming.

The hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) can sit there and smile, because vast sums of money will go to his constituency, but the problems that my farmers are facing today will not be offset by the fact that farmers who have sheep north of that marvellous line on the map will get much more from the European agricultural budget. It is not realistic to suggest that it is easier to farm in the hon. Member's constituency than in Rannoch Moor, Glen Shee and Glen Lyon in my constituency, which are equally remote and where the problems are the same.

Mr. Lord: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is dangerous to suggest that we are somehow benefiting from money from Europe? Europe has no money, just as the Government have no money. The money belongs to the people and must be removed from them by taxation. Frequently, it is not returned to them efficiently by our national Government, but usually, when it comes back via Europe, it has been handled much less efficiently.

Mr. Walker: I thank my hon. Friend for his helpful intervention. He said what I want to say. I describe it as laundered money, because it seems nonsense to pretend that taxpayers' money is largesse; it is not.

I am not opposed to assisting those who need it, but I am opposed to the Spanish Prime Minister coming to the capital of Scotland and asking that Scottish taxpayers should pay higher taxes so that Spaniards can subsidise their industry. British Airways competes with the heavily subsidised Spanish airline, Iberia.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): I have listened to the hon. Member fulminating about the fact that people north of the Tayside border can take advantage of European grants that are not available to his constituents. Does he accept that the line about which he is so upset was drawn not by the Spanish Prime Minister but by Ministers in this House? Those incentives could be available to farmers, industrialists and tourist operators in Tayside, as they are in the highlands and other parts of the European Community—and would be available if it had anything to do with the European Commission or European Parliament. They would be available if it were up to the European Commission or the European Parliament—it is the idiots in the Government who have deprived his constituency of the development area status which could be available.

Mr. Walker: That is fascinating, but the idiots in this Government did not draw the line. It was the idiots, if they were idiots—although I should not so describe right hon. and hon. Members—in a Government formed by the Opposition—[Interruption.]—when the line was first drawn. I do my homework carefully—the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye should know that.

I remind the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) that if we were not in the European Community it would be much easier for me, as a Scottish Member of Parliament, to argue my case, because I would be able to use much more leverage than I can now. I shall outline the basis of my case later, but it is important that the House knows about other commercial interests in my constituency. I am not talking about abstract theories but dealing with serious issues affecting my constituents.

One of the major commercial interests in my constituency is the General Accident insurance corporation. Although its headquarters are located in a neighbouring constituency, it will not surprise the House to learn that many of my constituents work there because Scone, which is a suburb of Perth, is in my constituency. Another matter of interest in my constituency is whisky—people often think of that in the city of Perth.

When Britain was a member of the exchange rate mechanism, General Accident was operating in a marketplace in which its costs were in pounds sterling but the bulk of its income was in dollars. One does not have to be a genius to realise that the change when we left the ERM on white Wednesday and got out of the straitjacket worked greatly to the advantage of a massive employer whose costs and expenses were largely in pounds sterling and whose income was substantially in dollars.

Before we joined the European Community, it is true that Scottish farmers were considered to be relatively comfortable—I would not say well off, although some were. In fact, lairds such as the hon. Member for East Lothian were probably very well off. I do not speak only on behalf of lairds, because many of my constituents are tenant farmers. While I do not know as much as the hon. Member for East Lothian about being a laird, because he is one and I am not, at least many of my friends are lairds. Some have phoned me this evening about the problems that they face.

The main problem is what has happened to farmers' incomes since we joined the European Community. Anyone who talks to hill farmers, especially those in north Tayside who do not get the additional benefit of being in the highlands and islands, will find that their income has dropped savagely during our membership. There is no doubt that one of the best things we could do—certainly for the hill farmers—would be to repatriate the common agricultural policy and to return the issue of agricultural support to our Parliament.

Mr. Home Robertson: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has mentioned hill farmers. Does he acknowledge that the European Community has quite generously increased the hill livestock compensatory allowance for the current year but that, once again, it is the Government whom he continues to support who have clawed back all of that increase so that the hill farmers about whose plight he is whingeing do not get the benefits or access to the extra support which the European Community wants to offer? Once again, the Government whom he supports are damaging the interests of his constituents.

Mr. Walker: The hon. Gentleman is again trying to play with figures. He should address the matter objectively. The average British family pays £17 or £18 a week more for food than they would otherwise require to do. That is a cost to Britain. In addition, for every pound that comes back to the United Kingdom——

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman is being tempted by an intervention. I should be grateful if he would address his remarks to the question why the amendments—there are a fair number—should make deletions in the Bill to limit the effects of the treaty. That is the crunch issue from which the hon. Gentleman has strayed just a little.

Mr. Walker: Unless I am a complete idiot, Mr. Morris —I hope that I am not—my understanding is that, if amendment No. 184 were accepted, it would remove the common agricultural policy completely from the jurisdiction of the European Community. Have I got that right, Mr. Morris?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Walker: In that case, my argument is that the CAP's no longer being there would have an effect on the sums available via taxation in this House to be spent on the farmers in my constituency. That is the point I am trying to make.

The hon. Member for East Lothian demonstrated the great Euro-trick of pretending that the world is square. In 1972, we were told that, if we entered the European Community and joined the club called the common agricultural policy, my farmers, the consumers and everyone else would benefit.

My case is that the goods were oversold. Europe did not deliver on the promises made in 1972, as I shall try to show. We lost the right of veto, which we were told was built in. We were told that the Single European Act, which affects industry, commerce and tourism, would be to our advantage. I point out that insurance still does not have a level playing field. If I may stray into a later group of amendments, I also point out that transport does not have a level playing field, although it is part of commerce.

Some hon. Members who voted for the Single European Act did so under a little pressure called a three-line Whip. We are constantly told today, "If you voted for that, you cannot possibly have any views on the Maastricht Bill and treaty." I am in the fortunate position of not having supported the Single European Act; nor did I support entry into the EC under the conditions and terms in 1972.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Before my hon. Friend leaves amendment No. 184, would he tell that silly hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) that, if the amendment were passed, every farmer in Britain with a farm of more than 40 hectares could get £127,000 per year fully indexed? Every farmer with a farm under 40 hectares could get £40,000 fully indexed. That is without any increase in resources. To hear a socialist Member of Parliament arguing for a policy that involves the expenditure of £250 million every week solely for the storage, dumping and destruction of foodstuffs is an insult to all that socialists have stood for over the years.

Mr. Walker: I thank my hon. Friend for that helpful intervention. There is no doubt that if we were able to make decisions in the House first, on the pricing levels that the market in the United Kingdom would accept and, secondly, on how we supported various activities, including agriculture, and if we were completely answerable here for what we were doing, we would be in a different position.

The hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye, who argued for the Liberal Democrats' position, may be interested to know that the Dewars bottling and blending plant, which is part of the United Distillers-Guinness group—it is in my constituency and not in the neighbouring constituency of Perth and Kinross—was advised last week that it is to close.

I believe that, if those lovely lines that have been drawn on maps at different times had been applied—I am talking about support for areas in need—and if the area around Perth had been designated an area of need and were able to receive the grants and aid that are provided in such circumstances, it is probable that the plant would not be closing.

It is well known that the work force at the plant has been loyal and hard working. It has been non-militant. The grants and aid available for massive investment elsewhere in bottling and blending plants by United Distillers in areas such as Kilmarnock, which will enjoy benefits, seem to be a funny way to repay the work force who have been loyal and non-militant. I do not argue about what is happening, as that is for the company to judge.

9.30 pm

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): I join the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) in paying tribute to the Dewars plant at Inveralmond. I represented the workers at that plant for many years and I pay tribute to their long-standing loyalty and their productivity. They have produced a product which has been successful all over the world. However, has anyone at any level in United Distillers ever suggested to the hon. Member for Tayside, North that, if the area had been one of special preference, that would have changed the company's decision last week?

Mr. Walker: The hon. Gentleman is asking me about commercially confidential conversations. One of the reasons why industrialists trust the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) and, I hope, trust me is that when, they talk to us privately and confidentially, they know that we will not blab it in this place.

From my experience of the boardroom, I know that, when one takes decisions on where to place investment, one must necessarily look very carefully at areas that receive aid and those that do not. If one has to decide which plant to close and which plant to invest in, that decision will inevitably be part of a package that will contain the amount of Government assistance or aid that is available. That is the normal way in which boardrooms work. We have always worked that way in the boardrooms of which I have experience.

I am deeply concerned, because my constituency will lose all round. The European club, of which everyone has told me we should be pleased to be a member, has failed to deliver in many different ways. For example, it has failed to deliver in respect of jobs, trade and investment. Those failures cannot be hidden for ever.

The cold, hard facts are that, when we joined the Community in 1972, unemployment in the United Kingdom was just over 800,000. Today, unemployment is 3 million. In 1972, we were told that, if we did not join Europe, we would face massive unemployment. However, Europe has failed to deliver. In the five years before we joined the Community—this is important to the whisky industry and others—the average trade deficit with the Community countries was around £230 million a year. In the past five years, the deficit has averaged £12,000 million a year. Again, Europe has failed to deliver.

Mr. Charles Kennedy: I have a very straightforward question for the hon. Gentleman. If all those problems —the hon. Gentleman mentioned unemployment, for example—can be laid substantially at the European Community's door, why did the hon. Gentleman, along with his hon. Friends, subscribe to an election campaign which said, "Vote Conservative on Thursday and the recovery will continue on Friday"? How come the recovery could be dependent on the domestic political result here if all our economic woes are decided in Brussels?

The Chairman: Order. I hope that the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) will not go down that route.

Mr. Walker: The hon. Gentleman is tempting me, but of course it is nonsense. I am not blaming Europe. The structures and the way that Europe has evolved are the problem. It is right that we should be in Europe. It is right that we should be working within the Community to obtain benefits and advantages. I just think that giving away powers in the way that we did in 1972 and the Single European Act are not what we were told would happen. Europe has failed to deliver. As a former shopkeeper, I know that, if one sells goods that do not live up to expectations, the public become disillusioned.

Mr. Garel-Jones: My hon. Friend has told us about the importance of whisky distilling not only in his constituency but throughout Scotland. Can he tell us of any major whisky distilling or exporting company in Scotland that, as a matter of policy, is opposed to the ratification of the Maastricht treaty?

Mr. Walker: A major United Kingdom whisky company director—the chief executive; without asking him I cannot say his name—at a function in the House which was run by the Scotch Whisky Association, told me that I was right. That is all that I can say. He wished me luck. He said that I was right. [Interruption.] He happens to be the chief executive. As for my views on Maastricht —that is what we are debating. That is the question that was put to me, Mr. Morris. I was responding to the question. I have lived long enough to know that, more often than not, one is rarely right. I live in a house full of women, and one is regularly reminded that one is not right.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Will my hon. Friend tell our right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office that we will never know what the people of Britain think about the Maastricht treaty, and we will never know about the damage to their jobs and their freedom and liberty until the Government have the courage to hold a referendum so that, instead of— [Interruption.]

The Chairman: Order. I appeal to hon. Members to stick to the amendment. The hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) knows that there is an amendment on a referendum to be discussed later in our proceedings. I imagine that the hon. Gentleman will want to catch my eye, not least because he has the lead amendment. I do not believe that it is appropriate that we should bring the referendum amendment into the other amendments.

Sir Teddy Taylor: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I do not cause trouble by making unrealistic points of order. Surely, if the Minister brings in something relating to the views of people, it is fair for someone else to make the same point.

The Chairman: I heard the Minister refer to the whisky industry, which was the point that the hon. Member for Tayside, North had been contributing to. Both were entirely in order.

Mr. Walker: The whisky industry, like the rest of the United Kingdom, has different views on the European Community. The country is divided, just as France was divided when it was given the opportunity to show how it felt.

Mr. John Butcher (Coventry, South-West): On the opinions of industrialists, I wonder whether my right hon. Friend the Minister could tell us of that famous evening when a letter was circulated at a Confederation of British Industry dinner at which, apparently, 60 industrialists were present. About 15 industrialists were prepared to sign that letter and others, for private reasons, did not do so.

[Mr. John Butcher]

Does that mean that more than 50 per cent. of industrialists who were especially invited to back the Government's position could not bring themselves to do so? Surely all such matters are nonsense. It is not entirely fair for my hon. Friend to say, "Find an industrialist to take one position or another," because, for very good reasons, many wish to keep their opinions to themselves.

Mr. Bill Walker: The point has been well made. The country is divided and there are different views at all levels. It is nonsense for either myself or Ministers to suggest that we have a monopoly on the views—we do not, and we do not know the position. Anyone who suggests—as was suggested earlier—that we fought an election and have now given way is incorrect. I fought the election on the basis that I would oppose the treaty. I want there to be no question about that—my integrity is not in doubt. Others may doubt my judgment, but not my integrity.

Between 1981 and 1990, the United Kingdom's overseas investment outside the European Community was 76·4 per cent. of all investment. There was far greater investment outside the European Community, and it produced a surplus of £40,100 million. Within the European Community, 23·6 per cent. of United Kingdom overseas investment created a deficit of £75,400 million. That means that more and more Scots—not just fishermen and farmers—will feel that they are not receiving many of the advantages that they were promised in 1972.

Consequently, when I look forward, I am concerned. I consider my good fortune and the ghastly future in store for so many other members of the human race. I wonder if my good fortune will continue. I live in a country called Scotland, which is free and democratic. I am an elected Member of one of the few Parliaments where membership cannot be bought—in a country where the Government are changed by the ballot box, not the gun.

I also reflect that, for many people, last year was ghastly, and many of them will face famine, drought and other problems. My constituency faces flooding, but no one seriously believes that many of my farmers will die next year as a result of starvation caused by flooding. Many of them will be in terrible financial straits, but they will not die.

I consider how different it is in Scotland and throughout the United Kingdom. Despite the substantial difficulties caused by unemployment—to which I have drawn attention—and the world recession, the young and the old in Scotland will not face famine, pestilence or war. However, Scotland's good fortune was not created by chance, but by our forefathers, who fought for Scotland's and the United Kingdom's democratic rights, and defended our right to be free. They also negotiated a Union, where the leadership, courage and talents of the minority population from Scotland would be employed to the advantage of the new country that had been created: the United Kingdom.

I know that we are changing United Kingdom law, but my view is that, if substantial amendments are accepted and the treaty is changed as a result, so that the treaty has to be renegotiated, the original treaty will be dead. I believe that the time has come for us to look at how the United Kingdom population has benefited and 9 per cent. of that population—the Scots—have always enjoyed much more representation in agricultural, industrial, consumer, commercial, political and trade union matters. They have enjoyed a greater share of the key positions. Scottish power and influence has been greater than its percentage share of the United Kingdom population. Any possible future Labour Cabinet would consist of more than 20 per cent. of Ministers from Scotland, even though Scotland has less than 9 per cent. of the United Kingdom population.

I am worried that all this is liable to change. Hon. Members can ask Ministers questions about all relevant matters, but if we give away these powers to Europe—the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) drew attention to the dubious nature of our authority to do that—the European Court will base its judgments on the political intent as well as on the contents of the treaty, as we know from the preamble to the Bill and from elsewhere.

9.45 pm

Unless the House agrees to these amendments, the Maastricht treaty and its amendments to the Single European Act and the treaty of Rome will give away massive powers that have hitherto belonged to this Parliament. Members representing constituents will no longer be able to ask Ministers questions on behalf of those constituents. The cornerstone of our unwritten constitution, which is part of the cement binding the United Kingdom together, will thus be eroded. That cornerstone consists of a Member's right to ask questions and to have them answered. Already, more often than not, we are told by Ministers that our questions have nothing to do with them: "Hard luck, this matter has to do with Europe."

As Scottish constituents see their Members of Parliament becoming less able to pursue their interests——

The Chairman: Order. I have been very tolerant of the hon. Gentleman, who keeps on using the phrase, "If these amendments are agreed to". That, however, is really not sufficient to keep him in order. He must speak specifically about the amendment—not generically.

Mr. Walker: I wish you had not asked me that, Mr. Morris, because I was coming directly to the amendments. This House is the key to maintaining the Union of the United Kingdom. There are more separatists on the Opposition Benches than wear the nationalist colours. Once they see they no longer have an opportunity to become Ministers after the next election it is just possible that we may find ourselves facing the end of this Parliament as we have known it.

Mr. Devlin: My hon. Friend knows as well as we all do that Scotland has far more representations in the House than it is due given the nature of the population. But Scotland also has Members in the European Parliament. Just as my hon. Friend can scrutinise the actions of Ministers who make up the Council of Ministers, so Members of the European Parliament will be able to scrutinise the work of Commissioners and others——

The Chairman: Order. That has nothing to do with industry.

Mr. Walker: Like you, Mr. Morris, I shall treat that intervention with the contempt it deserves—[Laughter.] Hon. Members may find that amusing, but we Scots grew up on a diet of the constitution and some of us have spent all our adult lives trying to protect it. There is not a Scottish Member of Parliament or politician who does not have a view on the Maastricht treaty as it affects the CAP, unemployment, commerce or industry—or who does not from time to time discuss the issue of representation in Edinburgh in some guise or other.

I am certain that, if we do anything to weaken the powers of the House, we will enter on the slippery road to separation. That may lead to Scotland remaining inside the United Kingdom as we know it, or in Europe as some Scots wish, or outside Europe. Denmark has clearly shown what a small country can do to the European juggernaut, and that has not gone unnoticed in Scotland.

Mr. Roy Hughes (Newport, East): The Minister spoke about Britain being a wealthy country, but that wealth is not being well shared. We seem to be wealthy enough to afford 3 million people on the dole, according to the official statistics. Of course, the real figure is far higher. That in itself is a shocking indictment. We have been in the EC for 20 years and unemployment in the EC is no fewer than 17 million: that is hardly a fact to cheer about.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) spoke about the need for more research and development and education and training. I agree with that, but I have reservations about those functions being under the EC umbrella. This country certainly needs an industrial policy, and market forces will not cure the mass unemployment from which we suffer. Article 130 deals with

"speeding up the adjustment of industry to structural changes".

What does that mean? I look upon it with a good deal of fear and foreboding.

I am a Welsh MP of long standing. In Wales, we know from experience what structural change can mean. Thousands of jobs have been lost in Wales, but the Maastricht treaty does not contain a social chapter—so what are the safeguards for working people? Wales lost many thousands of jobs in the steel industry because of structural change. Ebbw Vale no longer produces steel. The community there has never got over the experience of losing all those jobs in that vital industry. In north Wales, the Shotton works lost thousands of jobs, as did Port Talbot, Llanwern and many other areas.

Steel is allied to the motor car industry, which is next for rationalisation: it is top of the list for the structural changes referred to in the treaty. There is already speculation about the German company, Volkswagen, taking over Rover. I read about that in the press. What will that mean for jobs in this country? What will it mean for the constituents of my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith)? There are ominous signs for Vauxhall in Luton. Could the work there go to the continent to join the rest of the General Motors organisation in Europe? Such developments would be highly damaging to the British economy.

Wales relies heavily on the motor components industry. We have major concerns in Wales: Ford engines in Bridgend, the Bosch plant in the Vale of Glamorgan, Lucas Girling in Cwmbran, and many more besides. If the assembly plants were to be wound up, would the component sectors go as well? It would be a disaster for employment if that were to happen.

The engineering sector of industry in Britain today is largely dependent on the motor industry for work. That industry is the key to the future economic success of the country. Vehicles of first-class quality are being produced here, but if the structural changes take place, the quality of our products would count for nothing. We know that we have an efficient coal industry, but the Government cannot close it down fast enough. I cannot over-stress the importance of the motor industry to our economy. That must be born in mind when we consider the structural changes set out in the Maastricht treaty. The economies of Germany and Japan are heavily reliant on their motor industries. It is not without significance that those two countries also have strong currencies.

We must examine the implications of the proposed structural changes. According to official statistics, our unemployment rate stands at no less than 3 million. That figure involves many factors. For example, it is directly related to our crime rate. It is as true now as it ever was that the devil finds work for idle hands. Unemployment has brought about social and domestic difficulties, with an increasing divorce rate and more marital difficulties. Those out of work are demoralised.

The structural changes could be a further step to the deindustrialisation of Britain. We have been in the European Community for 20 years. The Government must intervene in industry. They must not leave industrial policy to the vagaries of market forces, because unemployment is the most important issue facing us. The sooner we tackle it, the better.

Several Hon. Members rose——

The Chairman: Sir Teddy Taylor.

Sir Teddy Taylor: There are two amendments listed here——

The Chairman: Order. Is this an intervention or a speech?

Mr. Hughes: I have finished my speech.

The Chairman: In that case, I apologise. I thought that the hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) was making an intervention. I call Mr. John Butcher.

Mr. Butcher: I am grateful to you, Mr. Morris, for allowing me to start my speech so close to 10 o'clock and, I hope, to continue for some time afterwards.

I begin by addressing a point raised by three hon. Members in the course of the debates that we have held on the general principles of the treaty. My hon. Friends the Members for Stockton, South (Mr. Devlin) and for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) and the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) have all said that the treaty is no different to those which set out our defensive alliances with NATO or our agreement to UN conventions. I never thought that I would see the day when there was such a fundamental misunderstanding by any parliamentarian of the nature of this treaty as compared with treaties, such as the NATO treaty, signed by sovereign states for mutual defence. It is in the very nature of the NATO treaty that we bind each other one to another to defend the sovereignty of individual nations. Yet the Maastricht treaty is about the passing over of powers away from sovereign nations. I hope that we never hear that canard—that fundamental misunderstanding—mentioned again in the Chamber.

The amendments deal with industry and consumer affairs. We have had no reassurance from the Government

[Mr. Butcher]

Front Bench that the treaty implies that we should re-enter the exchange rate mechanism. We have had no reassurance that that is not within the implications of the treaty. If history——

It being Ten o'clock, THE CHAIRMAN left the Chair to report Progress and ask leave to sit again.

Motion made, and Question put,

That, at this day's sitting, the European Communities (Amendment) Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Robert G. Hughes.]

The Committee divided: Ayes 304, Noes 271.

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Peter Kilfoyle and Mr. Thomas McAvoy.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Question again proposed, That the amendment be made.

Mr. Butcher: A few moments ago, Mr. Morris, I was reflecting——

Mr. Marlow: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. Have you had any information from, or discussions with, the Government? They obviously intend to get this business through on the basis of Liberal party support. Do they intend to get the rest of their programme through in the same way?

The Chairman: I have no idea of any honourable Member's intention.

10.15 pm

Mr. Butcher: Earlier, I was reflecting on the rather unhappy spectacle of two hon. Members equating the treaty on NATO, or our United Nations obligations, with the Maastricht treaty. I was trying—[Interruption.]

The Chairman: Order. I ask hon. Members either to listen or to depart quietly.

Mr. Butcher: I was trying to point out that it is surely unforgivable for a parliamentarian to misunderstand the nature of the Maastricht treaty to such an extent—to see it as just another treaty between sovereign nations which does not hand over sovereignty, as this one does. The other two treaties were between countries which were sovereign, and they were designed to protect the sovereignty and independence of nations. To assume that the Maastricht treaty does the same is to perpetrate a misunderstanding that no parliamentarian should ever repeat.

Mr. Devlin: I think that my hon. Friend is fundamentally mistaken. Comparisons were made earlier between the ceding, or rather pooling, of sovereignty——

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. The hon. Gentleman seems to be comparing the NATO treaty with the Maastricht treaty. The two have nothing to do with each other.

Mr. Butcher: The comparison was made earlier, Mr. Lofthouse. I hope that you will forgive me for wandering into such a generality.

I want to examine precisely how the Maastricht treaty would affect the performance of industry.

Mr. Devlin: On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. Before the Division, my hon. Friend made a comment about myself, my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) and the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler). When I intervened, I was merely seeking to answer his point. If I am not permitted to do so, how am I to answer arguments that were put earlier in the debate?

The First Deputy Chairman: That is not a point of order for me.

Mr. Butcher: As to the effect of the treaty on Britain's industrial and commercial future, I shall refer to those parts of it which in my view will impoverish Europe, make the continent uncompetitive and cause us eventually to hide behind a protective barrier—a barrier behind which all the people of Europe can grow poorer together. That is the inevitable conclusion of a number of trends presaged in the treaty.

I begin with the exchange rate mechanism, for we have not yet had a satisfactory answer as to whether there are provisions in the treaty which imply that by our adherence to stages 1 and 2 we must eventually rejoin the exchange rate mechanism. We must have an answer to that fundamental question. This is the Committee stage of the Bill. It is an iterative process. Our function today is to do that with which we have been charged: to examine the treaty. If we do not obtain an answer to that fundamental question, we shall strengthen the argument for a referendum because the famed sovereignty of Parliament —the function of Parliament to examine legislation—will not have been properly discharged.

In a later debate, we shall have to decide whether to vote for a referendum. On that occasion, I hope that every hon. Member will remember these amendments and the extent to which we received answers to the questions posed by them.

I am very worried about the Confederation of British industry. Bang on cue, the CBI signed the appropriate letter for public distribution. Bang on cue, it has organised a letter-writing campaign to Members of Parliament. In my view, it has done so on a number of non sequiturs. For instance, it says that if the treaty is not ratified we shall endanger Britain's commercial position at the heart of Europe, that we shall risk isolation and that we shall risk being part of the outer tier of a two-state Europe. Someone has to ask the CBI whether, if it believes in the concepts behind this treaty, the treaty of Rome and the Single European Act, it is prepared to say that other members of the Community can break treaty obligations in the treaty of Rome and the Single European Act in order to release us from the confines of the common tariff barrier and deny us access to the internal market.

The treaty of Rome, as amended by the Single European Act, binds each member unto each other by keeping us all within the common tariff barrier and by allowing all of us access to that internal market. The European Community would have to break its own laws in order to achieve that which the CBI fears. The CBI says that this organisation is so unprincipled that solemn treaty obligations, signed by the Twelve, can be broken by one, or three, or five members of the Twelve in order to push us out of the inner tier. If that is so, what kind of organisation is it that we are being solemnly asked in this debate to sign up to by means of a third party?

Mrs. Currie: I do not think that the point is that anybody would want to break legal obligations. The point being made by the CBI and by many industrialists is that international business, including British-owned business, which could go anywhere in the European Community and which promotes its activities throughout the European Community, might in future—were we not at the heart of the Community—choose to go elsewhere.

Mr. Butcher: Despite my limited experience of multinational corporations, I know that it is very much their wish to make their European base in the United Kingdom because they see competitive advantages here that they do not see elsewhere. Five or six years ago, I had a conversation with the chief executive of an American multinational company with which I did not have a direct connection. He said, "If the British want to maximise inward investment they should persuade all the others to sign up to Vredeling and then not sign themselves." That would do more for inward investment than almost any other measure.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South that, when my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Minister of State negotiated our exemption from the social chapter, it was the best they could do in the limited rules of engagement that they faced at Maastricht. Those limited rules of engagement and the confines within which the debate took place will eventually impoverish Europe. I welcome that tactical win.

Why, therefore, do I say that our friends the Japanese will continue to invest in this country? It is because they know that we shall stay within the tariff wall, that we shall continue to have access to the internal market and that we shall always have a 20 per cent. competitive edge—provided we do not sign up to the social chapter. Hon. Members should beware, however, as there are signs in the treaty that other ways of introducing chapter costs will be found. None the less, the Japanese are here because they like our competitive position and our labour relations and, above all, because they feel closer culturally to the United Kingdom than to the continental Europeans.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): Is my hon. Friend aware that the Japanese choose to base their industries here rather than other parts of Europe because most of their material is translated into English for the American market and because almost all their senior managers in Japan are fluent English speakers and therefore find it easier to deal with a British work force? Furthermore, they are violently opposed to the ERM, a single currency and a central bank. That is another reason why they were pleased when we fell out of the ERM.

Mr. Butcher: The English language is a national asset. An Irish Commissioner—I may be wrong, and I hope that I do not malign him—was credited with the malapropism that English is now the lingua franca of Europe. It is the trading language of the world—which brings me to our trading position, British jobs, the future of British industry and customers.

Sir Teddy Taylor: I do not want to undermine my hon. Friend's opposition to the Bill, but will he be very cautious about making too much of the social chapter? The Commission has made it abundantly clear that, whether we have a social chapter or not, it will shove this through under the Single European Act. The phoney debate between Labour and Conservative about whether the social chapter is good or bad is a load of rubbish, and people should wake up to that fact. The Commission will shove it all through anyway, and all of them know it, particularly the Ministers sitting on the Front Bench.

Mr. Butcher: The social chapter is an industrial and commercial question. My hon. Friend has made his point eloquently and briefly but I must add that certain elements of the on costs which the French and Germans would like to wish on us will come to us willy-nilly round the flank, through social measures, not least those involving health and safety.

It is still not widely enough accepted that, if one amalgamates the foreign earnings of Britain's top 20 manufacturing companies—I emphasise the term "manufacturing"—half still come from the north American market. Why is that relevant to today's debate? If in future we are to negotiate on a pan-European basis, will a majority of the companies negotiating have a vested interest in making sure that we continue to have open access to that market at the lowest possible tariffs?

10.30 pm

We have already been warned. I have seen what I thought were ghosts returning during the debate on the general agreement on tariffs and trade. There is in Europe—more so than in the United Kingdom—an element of opinion which is protectionist and anti-American. Some of it came into play during the GATT negotiations, and we suffered as a consequence. I shall not go into detail about the negotiations, even as they pertain to agriculture, which is covered in one of the amendments, but just before Christmas we were in great danger of jeopardising hundreds of thousands of British jobs in the manufacturing sector for the sake of 2·5 per cent. of Europe's population. The French farmers represent 2·5 per cent. of the continental population of Europe, but through their contacts with their Ministers and their people in Brussels and by obscurantist methods, they were able to jeopardise the negotiations which were so vital for British jobs.

I mention that in speaking to the amendment because, unless we are clear about who will be negotiating what on our behalf for the foreseeable future, and unless we vote fully informed, we may run the risk of things happening to our manufacturing industry which we have hitherto seen happen only to our fishermen and farmers. I beg my hon. Friends and members of the Opposition parties not to vote away our powers and thus affect in key ways our vital commercial and industrial interests.

I am still puzzled about the Confederation of British Industry. When we were debating whether to join the ERM, the CBI—the people whom I suppose Chairman Mao would have called the "running dogs of the Administration"—decided that they would press very hard for our membership. They did so with other prominent members of the chattering classes and on the basis—I believe that I summarise their arguments correctly—that they did not want to tolerate the costs of fluctuating currencies: they wanted the convenience and surety of fixed exchange rates moving eventually to a fused currency to give a tremendous advantage, as they saw it, to their companies.

The fact is—I say this with as much accuracy as I can—that the transaction costs in currency terms of doing a deal in the export market are 0·5 per cent. of the value of the contract. It is for the 0·5 per cent. that we sought fused currencies. Chasing that particular god or objective, we placed our manufacturing companies at a price disadvantage of 12·5 per cent. to 15 per cent. for two years. Anyone who wishes to argue that that exchange rate had nothing to do with the deterioration in our economic performance over the past couple of years need not accept my word for it, but simply ask any economist of any school——

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. I note that the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) is dealing with correspondence. Facilities are made available in the Palace for dealing with correspondence, and the Chamber is not the place. I should be grateful if the hon. Lady would refrain from dealing with correspondence here.

Mrs. Currie: On a point of order Mr. Lofthouse. I beg your pardon—[Interruption.] I wish that hon. Members would shut up. I have been here for 10 years. This is the first time that I have heard that rule. I know that we are not allowed to read a newspaper in the Chamber. I am answering queries about Europe.

The First Deputy Chairman: It is fairly obvious that, if the hon. Lady has not realised the rule before, it is because she has not been taking notice.

Mr. Butcher: I was inviting the House to consult whichever economist it wished about the effects of our overvalued and fixed exchange rate on our industrial and commercial performance.

When we had an economic stance as a result of which we invoked deflation, when we had prolonged recession and, for the first time in our economic history, when those other factors were brought into play, we ran a deficit on our trading account in goods and manufactures. That is a sure sign that a currency is overvalued.

I am not an advocate of continuing competitive devaluations as a panacea for our troubles. That is another totem which is set up and then demolished. I advocate an independent British bank on the lines of the Bundesbank or the Federal Reserve——

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman is straying by moving on to banks. I hope that he will stick to the amendment.

Mr. Butcher: I hope that I can demonstrate to your satisfaction, Mr. Lofthouse, that our industrial and commercial performance depends vitally on having a stable economic framework against which we can plan. The argument here is whether that should be imposed as an external force, à la ERM or Maastricht, or whether we can do it for ourselves. We have signally failed to do it for ourselves in the past because we have not had the advantage of a policy, which has given Germany 40 brilliant years, of taking day-to-day economic management out of the hands of the Treasury and giving interest rate policy to an independent bank. That is how the Germans ironed out the peaks and troughs of boom and slump, and that is how we should do it.

It is an industrial question. No industrialist can plan anything against wild fluctuations. I agree with those who support Maastricht that we need to have a more stable economic framework. However, I fundamentally disagree with having that framework imposed by continental European considerations of their position in the trade cycle as opposed to ours.

Mr. Cash rose——

Dr. Robert Spink (Castle Point) rose——

Mr. Butcher: I challenge my hon. Friends the Members for Stafford (Mr. Cash) and for Castle Point (Dr. Spink) to intervene in two minutes' time when I have explained why we must have a domestic smoother of economic policy as opposed to one driven from, for example, Frankfurt.

The reason is as follows. If one examines the trade cycle as it has affected this country since 1945, one finds that our economy is a so-called "early cycle" economy. We tend to move on the demand phase of the economic cycle whereas, in the main, Germany and continential Europe move on the second, investment phase of the economic cycle. Because we are a year ahead of Europe, when we are at risk of inflation as our recovery is going too fast, the rest of Europe is still in the stagnant phase. When we want interest rates to be stable or to go up a bit, Europeans on the continent want them to come down because of the phasing difference. The reverse applies when we are going into recession, and the rest of Europe enters recession a year to 18 months after us.

If we set interest rates from a central bank based on the conditions which pertain in continental Europe, we shall invariably be out of phase. There will also be an addition to the inflationary and recessionary pressures in this country. That is how the trade cycle has operated since 1945. If we want to smooth it out, to integrate with Europe and—dare I say it—converge with Europe and all enter the same phase, that will cost a further 500,000 British jobs.

Mrs. Currie: We have been following my hon. Friend's interesting analysis of the cusp, the moon in Jupiter, and all the rest of it with great care. However, a moment ago my hon. Friend was praising Germany's 40 years of growth and he seemed to imply that that occurred because the Germans have an independent central bank. Does my hon. Friend now support that for this country?

Mr. Butcher: One of the things that has typified this debate has been selective deafness. The intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) was the most vivid example of that that I have heard so far.

Mr. Devlin: The point about the European market is its fundamental interdependence: what happens in one country affects what happens in other countries. We have a choice at this point and crossroads in our history of having a deutschmark-dominated continent where all European economies are at the whim of the deutschmark, or a truly independent currency with a truly independent central bank operating in the interests of all the European economies. That is the fundamental choice.

If my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South-West (Mr. Butcher) wants to opt for the slow lane or the second rank, we shall lose not only the inward investment to this country but a say in what happens in the central banking system which develops in Europe.

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. The debate now appears to be about the economy and not industry. Before anyone says that the two cannot be divorced, I remind the Committee that the economy can be discussed thoroughly in the group of amendments headed by amendment No. 79. I hope that we can return to industry.

Mr. Butcher: Our industrialists do not operate in a vacuum. They need a stable economic framework in which to operate. The majority of our industrialists now believe that we need an independent British bank to give them that stable framework. For the reasons that I have adduced, that is far preferable to stability set by an external force and conditions which may not pertain in our country due to the structural differences between this economy and the mainland continental economy.

Even when the CBI's economists may be cynical about ERM membership, why has the CBI pushed so hard for that kind of deal?

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East): I have been listening very carefully to what the hon. Gentleman has been saying about membership of the ERM and I noticed that he drew our attention to the situation of this country with regard to Germany. Has he considered the present situation in the Irish Republic, where interest rates have gone through the roof, where there must be considerable hardship with debts being deferred and increased by the application of interest rates, and where——

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. We are going down that same track again. I have just said that we are discussing industry and not the economy. There will be an opportunity to discuss the economy on a later group of amendments. I hope that we can stick to industry and that the Committee can make progress.

Mr. Butcher: I should like briefly to consider convergence funds and what they will mean for us and for our constituents. We are one of the two key contributors to the budget. We shall be asked for much more money in the coming years. The bills will be presented long after this debate is concluded one way or the other. I am tempted to make remarks from two standpoints: first, the experience which I enjoyed but occasionally suffered from as a junior Industry Minister in a national Government and, secondly, my experience of Industry Council meetings over about five years in Brussels, Research Council meetings and, once, an Environment Council meeting. My experience wearing those two hats and as a British negotiator has tempered what I am about to say.

If colleagues are going to vote for the treaty assuming that, once it is passed, we can gradually work it out together rationally, building consensuses and making our points and standing up for our interests, gradually making it work to the dream—for it is a dream—with the noble aim of producing the full employment that we want, the inflation-free society, that industrial Valhalla that Commissioner Bangemann would like us to achieve, they should realise that it does not happen that way. Once the treaty is passed, that will be the end of House of Commons input into the policy-making process which will subsequently take place.

I shall now say a little about what actually happens in Industry Council meetings. The Minister is delivered to the airport at Brussels. He shoots straight through with one of those effective civil servants to take him through the side doors to bypass customs. In he goes and he meets UKREP, who is a very interesting person—the gentleman who, in previous weeks, has been doing deals with the ambassadors of the other countries about the Industry Council budget. Some hon. Members have been through that process. UKREP's job is to deliver his Minister and his position. Much will have been fixed within the machinery, and much of it will have been fixed through horse trading inside the Commission, but it is a matter of pride for UKREP that, when his Industry Minister arrives, there should not be too many differentiations between the position as advised by UKREP and what the Minister actually does.

I found—perhaps I was slow on the uptake—that the only way in which I could have an effect on that cosy bringing together of industrial policy was not to read my brief. My brief, of course, had been put together as a consensus piece. It had probably been trailed around other Ministers from other nations—they had done their trading and come back.

I found that I had to adopt a tactic which I called the ear jiggler. Everyone at those meetings wears an earpiece. I found that if I went off the script and introduced something new which had not gone through the machinery, they started to jiggle their translation earpieces. Their ambassadors would lean across to their Ministers and say, "He is not supposed to be saying this; it is terribly wrong." Of course, their ambassadors were subsequently discredited, or rather made to feel uncomfortable.

I found that I could actually have a negotiation because I caused a weakness in my opponents' hand; I had taken somebody by surprise, and I could try to win a few points. Deals were done, sometimes with Commissioners in the lead. I met a Commissioner called Davignon. I had never met a civil servant like him. Admittedly, he was a vicomte——

Mr. Skinner: A what?

Mr. Butcher: A viscount—in the vernacular of the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), a Euro-toff. He was the most powerful civil servant I had ever come across. He not only proposed, he disposed. He admonished us; he chastised us. When that did not work, we used to break and go to lunch. Lunches were working lunches and, as my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Technology can confirm, they were very good. The reason that they were so good was that they had to last at least two and a half hours as that was the time during which most of the advisers were chucked out and we began horse trading. We sat around the table, with the Commissioner at the head, horse trading took place and deals were done. One scored 10 points for Machiavellian negotiating skills and one point for the merits of the argument, so we were lumbered with all sorts of technological lunacies which should not have occurred. Hon. Members should not pretend that the House will have a significant effect on policy formation once the Bill has been passed. They should not fool themselves about that.

Mr. Michael Stephen (Shoreham): Does my hon. Friend accept that the conditions that he has been describing are ones which exist in almost all forums of international negotiation and are not peculiar to the European Community? Indeed, they apply within our own country.

Mr. Butcher: I readily concede that such things have been known to happen in our country, but I believe that I am making a significant point. Many of those who advocate the adoption of the treaty have said in the debate, "Don't worry about the words; we can sort bits of it out as we go along; do not take the words at face value." If we take many of the words at face value, they give many people powers of initiation, instigation, influence and persuasion—powers which cannot be formalised and which will change policies and the way things happen in this country, in the House, and in British companies, farms and workshops. Let us at least vote for such provisions with our eyes open.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): Is not the lesson of the negotiations at Maastricht that Ministers did prepare themselves before they went to Brussels and Maastricht and knew the issues involved, their civil servants had been fully briefed and Britain was at the centre of the negotiations and, as a result, obtained a treaty that is very much in its interest? That is quite unlike the standard preparation that my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South-West (Mr. Butcher) said that he was unable to command when he was a Minister. It is only by negotiating in Europe that Britain will obtain achievements in the European market in favour of its industry and commerce and the country as a whole.

Mr. Butcher: I think that I said at the beginning of my speech that I would compliment my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on an away win—3:1 within the rules of the engagement. He did better in his negotiations than any other Head of Government at Maastricht. We are fortunate to be blessed with both a Foreign Secretary and a Prime Minister who can knock the spots off their competitors in such negotiations.

I also said that I questioned the basis of the Bill. Is it not curious that, skilled as all the negotiators may have been, some of those returned to their capitals and said that the treaty would cause the integration of Europe, but one has returned to his capital and said, "Don't worry—it will not really cause the integration of Europe." Therefore, we have a brilliantly negotiated, elegant treaty, containing some wonderful objectives, which is already subject to great disparities of interpretation. One of the reasons for the hyper-ventilation in Committee is that we had thought —whether Europhobes, Euro-realists or Euro-sceptics— that we would try to solve some of those mysteries in Committee.

What exactly does the treaty mean? For instance, we discovered by a fluke—the information was not volunteered—that the pillars, which are outside the treaty and may not be justiciable by the European Court, are legally binding. That is a pretty weird distinction. My hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) shakes his head. I appeal to him to join me in getting to the bottom of this matter, or we shall be selling the British people a pup. We must either call for an advance interpretation by the court or ask for one from our own Law Officers, whom we have not yet seen on the Front Bench. Will the pillars be legally binding?

Mr. Wells: Yes.

Mr. Butcher: In that case, a number of the propositions to which we have been treated over the past six months have been erroneous.

Mrs. Currie: On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. Do I not recall your saying earlier that this part of the debate should be on industry, agriculture or fishing?

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means: That is certainly right, and I have had to draw that to the attention of the hon. Gentleman on two or three occasions. I hope that he will now stick to the amendment.

Mr. Butcher: With your guidance, Mr. Lofthouse, I move on——

Mr. James Pawsey (Rugby and Kenilworth): May I bring my hon. Friend back to more concrete matters—specifically to the concrete and cement industry? He will be aware that Rugby Cement, a well-known company, operates in his constituency and in mine. He may not be aware of the fact that, owing to the way in which the Community operates, certain environmental conditions are being imposed which are being adopted eight years earlier in the United Kingdom than in other member countries. That implies great additional costs for our home-based industry, and it will mean that we are greatly disadvantaged. Would my hon. Friend care to offer his advice to hard-pressed companies such as Rugby Cement on what action they should take?

Mr. Butcher: I defer to my hon. Friend's expertise. He does not need me to tell him, however, that in the first instance he should hold another meeting with the company and discuss with it his powers to do anything now—and then perhaps discuss what powers he will have in, say, a year's time, after ratification has taken place.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Is not the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) raising a salient point? As the European Court is wholly involved in reaching judgments on the present treaties, it will have a direct effect on industrial matters—that is one of its functions. It judges whether countries are complying with the law. Unless the Community takes action against countries and companies, certain companies will be able to escape the industrial and economic effects of the treaty—precisely the sort of inequality to which the hon. Gentleman referred. That will have an impact lasting in some cases for years, and will have a direct effect on competition. If the Government believe all this rubbish about fair competition, is it not time they did something about it?

Mr. Butcher: The hon. Lady makes her point well. It is refreshing to see cross-party unity breaking out. It is also refreshing to see that some Members, at least, are searching for truth.

Under convergence policy, grants will be pushed around on a Euro-basis. The debate on the effectiveness of industrial grants has been going on in this country for at least three years. There is also debate on what kind of industrial policies should be adopted to put right some of our problems. To some extent that debate is a dialogue of the deaf. To equate an industrial policy with turning the Board of Trade into a grant factory is a curious phenomenon, which has long been discredited, but on a pan-European basis. The problems of efficiency and effectiveness and the effect on the motivation of what went on among the decision makers were serious and would be compounded on a European basis because there will be even less knowledge about what was happening on the periphery.

If we opt for convergence and try to bring all our economies up to the same standard, producing almost mirror image economies in the nation states, money will be transferred by Europe's industrial grant mechanisms, mainly from north to south. That will ensure that Greece can have industries like ours and Spain and Portugal can mirror the industrial composition of Germany and, say, central France. That flies in the face of everything that we have learnt from economic and industrial history since it first became a matter for policy discussion, perhaps beginning with Adam Smith.

I thought that the whole point of free markets was that they allowed specialisms to develop and countries and companies to seek their own salvation by becoming better and competing with other countries. I wonder about the philosophy behind this. Anyone who doubts that we are creating a nation state should look at what this thing which may not be a nation state will be doing. Surely only nation states pursue industrial policy, legislate and supervise consumer affairs. Surely only such states have commerce Ministers and Ministers to supervise pan-European competition.

Before my hon. Friends who are pro-Maastricht accuse me of being entirely negative or dogmatic, I should say that if I were pushed into a corner and asked to state the boiled-down kernel of my policy on Europe, I would say that it would be to strengthen the competition Commissioner's brief—the brief of Sir Leon Brittan. He should be given powers to construct a level playing field. If it is suggested that we should not have tariff barriers against the outside world, that Commissioner's role becomes even broader and more relevant to the wealth-creating parts of our economy.

I doubt that Britain, as one of the two net contributors, will be able to afford the money to persuade others to provide even more competition for our companies. That is nonsense, and it is difficult to understand why that has not been recognised.

I am a free trader and an internationalist in the broadest sense of the word. I am frightened that elements of the treaty's industrial and commercial policy have more to do with the mercantilism of Colbert and Mazarin and Richelieu than with the inheritors of the economic policies first enunciated by Adam Smith. There is a sort of déjà vu, an out-of-date feel about all this. I do not know why we are buying it, because Conservatives spent the last four elections trying to turn back such policies. It is weird.

I am worried because I want us to continue to trade with the rest of the world as well as with Europe for the jobs reasons that I gave earlier, and I feel that if the economic, social and industrial policies and some of the treaty's other policies affecting industry are adopted, we shall institutionalise the declining competitiveness of Europe.

It may be controversial to say that today, because who can deny that Germany, for example, has had 40 brilliant years? I wish that we had had 40 years like the Germans have had since about 1948, when the Wirtschaftswunder was first built by Erhardt and somebody who, for my money, was the best and most underrated economist of the post-war period; a chap called Euchen. We did not do it —they did. Those 40 brilliant years are being sold away. The Germans and the French have loaded into their economies a number of on costs and anti-competitive trends that will make them weak in competing in global markets—and all markets are now global.

One of the reasons why the treaty has been pressed so hard on us is that German and French industrialists want to see British industry lumbered with some of the same conditions that have already been introduced by their national legislation. While Germany has had four successful decades and France two, what they have done recently will undo all that. Furthermore, they are trying to wish it on us. The House should be on its guard about looking to continental Europe for leads in economic policy making.

If we are to institutionalise the gradual uncompetitiveness of Europe, the only way to safeguard Europe's position is either to fail to reduce the tariff barrier further under GATT, or to increase it again. We are already seeing reactions to the continental Europe system in other parts of the world. America is building a North American Free Trade Area, which includes Mexico, Canada and the United States. Those who talk to American politicians know that there is a great deal of "me-tooism" about the decision to build that continental trading system. They looked at Europe and wanted to have something similar, but bigger, with even more people.

Elements within the treaty make a fortress Europe more likely. That is particularly so, given my next point—an economic point arising from politics. We should not assume that the dominance within Europe of the centre and centre-left parties in the Parliament and of tthe centre parties of policy-making in the Council of Ministers will continue for ever. We do not know what will happen in our next general election or in the French and German general elections. Those elements that are slightly more concerned about a nationalist Europe—that is, a continental Europe —having clout and power and producing reactions elsewhere, may be reinforced at the expense of an element of opinion that we have always espoused: internationalism, outward-looking, free-trading, "win on competitive grounds if one can". That philosophical point is still in doubt. The jury is still out.

I cannot support the industrial and commercial measures in the treaty. When it all boils down, I am in the House to provide jobs for my constituents. Jobs and more jobs are the best welfare programme of all. With fuller employment, we would not argue about welfare programmes. My fear is that in deepening rather than widening Europe, in bureaucratising rather than in freeing it up, in loading Europe with uncompetitive situations, we may be making it less likely that, in coming years, we shall be able to face our constituents with a clear conscience and say, "I voted for Maastricht to preserve and build jobs."

Mr. Shore: The hon. Member for Coventry, South-West (Mr. Butcher) was right to emphasise the enormous competitive power of Germany after 40 years of successful industrial and economic development. That is my starting point to reinforce his argument that it is essential that the United Kingdom, faced with that formidable manufacturing and industrial power, insists upon the retention of control over its own interest rates and exchange rate so that it is not bottled in and circumscribed by the exchange rate mechanism.

I do not agree with the hon. Member for Coventry, South-West that exchange rate policy alone will be sufficient to deal with the problems that now face British industry. We are far behind our competitors, and we need an effective industrial policy. In so far as my hon. Friends have advocated that in supporting amendment No. 1, they are right.

There are several difficulties. One of them—this was confirmed by the Minister of State in answer to a direct question—is that there is nothing in article 129 that will assist in developing an effective industrial policy over and above what is already in the Rome treaty and the Single European Act.

Mr. Garel-Jones indicated assent.

Mr. Shore: I am glad that the Minister of State nods. I hope that my hon. Friends on the Opposition Front Bench will take this in. There is nothing in the article except that which the Minister of State went out of his way to emphasise, which is contained in the final sentence. It reads:

"This Title shall not provide a basis for the introduction by the Community of any measure which could lead to a distortion of competition."

[Mr. Shore]

Even the generalities—they add nothing to powers that already exist—are subjective. They do not infringe on or distort competition. In other words, the principle has been established that industrial policy, to which my right hon. and hon. Friends attach such importance, is wholly subject to competition policy. There can be no effective industrial policy for as long as competition policy is allowed to reign supreme.

I do not understand why my right hon. and hon. Friends have chosen to make No. 1 their lead amendment. It has, of course, opened up a major and interesting subject for debate, but if anyone thought that he should identify article 129 as the sunny face of the treaty from the point of view of those who wish to have an effective industrial policy, he would be wrong and disappointed. It is not there. We would wish it to be there, but it is not.

Even if the Community developed an industrial policy —it would not get very far—at a later stage and it helped European industry, would it necessarily help British industry? What are the principles of distribution among member states and the different industries of the European Community? I put that unanswered question to the Committee. Anyone who believes that Britain would benefit automatically from a European industrial policy has much explaining to do. He would have to search for any evidence that that would follow.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) drew attention to another important feature of the so-called industrial policy. He talked about accelerating structural change in the context of article 129.

Mr. Rowlands: It is article 130.

Mr. Shore: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that correction. I have been referring to article 130 throughout. I do not know why I identified it as article 129.

It is right that the article emphasises an acceleration of structural change. Those are pleasing words which disguise what we know is the reality—mergers and the elimination of firms as they go to the wall. Those are not pleasing prospects. The motor car industry is an example which we must all have in mind. When we look across the Atlantic, see where the American single market has left its motor car industry and consider how many separate units remain, it is surely not fanciful to talk about takeovers and mergers between the eight or more major motor car companies that are in Europe. Those problems will arise.

To anyone who looks a little further ahead, I say that that is not a pleasing prospect. There could be a takeover bid for one of the remaining British car companies, such as Rolls-Royce. If the scale were big enough—for example, if ICI were the subject of a takeover bid by I.G. Farben—it would be no use arguing that that would not be in Britain's national interest.

Under the Single European Act, we have already abandoned the power to decide whether a merger or takeover should take place; we have given that power to the European Commissioner. That is no longer Sir Leon Brittan—although, quite frankly, I would not have any greater confidence if it were, as he is a great believer in competition policy. In appropriate conditions, he is in favour of mergers, amalgamations and takeovers where they do not disturb the objective of competition.

That is the reality of competition policy. There is nothing in the treaty that helps, safeguards or strengthens British industry. Instead, it is possible that there will be an open season on British firms. There is nothing to protect them other than their own strengths and competitiveness. Whatever their temporary difficulties may be, they could easily be brought down.

My hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) rightly pointed out that we have the considerable difficulty that our capital market is so open. Our firms are vulnerable to takeover bids because there is no protective institution in the United Kingdom. They may run into short-term difficulties and their stock market values may tumble. Then, regardless of their long-term potential, they become very vulnerable. That is not true of Germany. As my hon. Friend explained, many German shares are held by German banks for a long period. They will not give them up, so there are not the same pressures.

Those are real dangers for British industry. If nothing else, we have drawn attention to that by putting article 130 under the spotlight.

Mr. Wells: Is it not true that, as the right hon. Gentleman said at the beginning of his remarks, article 130 is the product of the treaty of Rome as amended by the Single European Act, and that the Maastricht treaty makes no change? Although we respect the right hon. Gentleman's objections to the whole concept of Europe and a European industrial policy, in fact the Maastricht treaty, and therefore the Bill, do not affect what is already in existence and will remain so even if we reject the Bill.

Mr. Shore: I agree that the Bill repeats and reaffirms what is already in the Single European Act. Perhaps those of us who fought that Act tooth and nail may be accorded some understanding of why we opposed it when it was pushed through this Parliament on a three-line Whip.

Mr. Marlow: The right hon. Gentleman said that European mergers and takeovers will be all one way because of institutional problems in other European countries. Is it not worse than that? If any of our television companies wanted to take over a European television company it would be unable to do so, whereas potentially in a few months' time European television companies will be able to take over our television companies.

If our steel industry, which is the most efficient in Europe, wanted to take over some of the rotten remnants of European steel, it would be unable to do so, because other European Governments would get in the way. In every area of endeavour, by and large, the dice are loaded against us.

Mr. Shore: Yes, and with some European countries more than others. The French and Germans in particular protect their industries—not completely, but they provide their industries with defences against predatory raiders and takeover bidders.

Mr. Rowlands: Since the Minister stated that article 130 does not change the treaty of Rome or the Single European Act, I researched the matter as best I could in the Library. I can find nothing as explicit as the reference in article 130 to

"speeding up the adjustment of industry to structural changes".

Perhaps my right hon. Friend will press the Minister to say, when he winds up, whether that phrase comes from the treaty of Rome or the Single European Act, or whether it is a new provision—and therefore potentially rather more dangerous.

Mr. Shore: I thank my hon. Friend for that valuable intervention. I ask the Minister to address himself to precisely that part of article 130 that refers to

"speeding up the adjustment of industry to structural changes".

Is that a new form of words, and does it carry the general implication that I have placed upon it?

Mr. Calum Macdonald (Western Isles): I agree with my right hon. Friend that this issue is important, but is it not one that already confronts us in the United Kingdom? I refer, for example, to the threatened takeover of Pilkington plc, with the potential loss of regional and centralised jobs. More tellingly, did not that issue arise when Distillers was taken over by Guinness? It is nothing new—it is just that we have to face it on a European rather than a British stage. Presumably my right hon. Friend's solution to the Guinness-Distillers case is not to argue for independence for Scotland, to be able to defend its own industries. We must work out an investment strategy on a British stage, then on a European stage.

Mr. Shore: My hon. Friend misses the whole point. Of course some United Kingdom takeover bids were very unwelcome. If Hanson had pursued its quest for ICI, an issue of major importance would have been raised—with most right hon. and hon. Members, I believe, wanting ICI to remain independent. Until the Single European Act, the arbiter of whether such a takeover bid should, in the national interest, proceed was the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry—a British citizen whose primary concern was the welfare of his own country, not of some generalised European future nation state.

Mr. Macdonald rose——

Mr. Shore: No, I will not give way again to my hon. Friend on that point.

Mr. Spearing: I am not sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) understands the purport of that important phrase,

"speeding up the adjustment of industry to structural changes".

My right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) referred to structural change in the financial sense of markets, takeovers, the ownership of firms, and so on. He cited the chemical industry as an important example. However, as we know only too well, structural change in this context means not just takeovers but market changes. Does not article 130 attempt to enjoin nation states, in so far as they have any powers left, and the Community to speed up the process of change irrespective of the social effects?

Mr. Shore: There is no suggestion in the section on industrial change that any regard or consideration will be given to such matters as employment.

Mr. Macdonald: Surely the aim is to secure an industrial policy in Europe of which we, as socialists, would approve. The controversy over the Secretary of State who decided the question of the Guinness takeover bid, the Hanson attempt on ICI or the Pilkington issue concerned not whether it was a British Secretary of State, but whether it was a socialist Labour Secretary of State or a market-oriented Conservative Secretary of State. The solution to the Guinness takover was to involve not a Scottish but a socialist, Labour, Secretary of State.

Mr. Shore: Clearly, there are differences between Conservative and Labour Governments and Presidents of the Board of Trade. There is, however, a fundamental interest that unites us all; I am amazed—indeed, shocked—that my hon. Friend does not seem to share it. I refer to the British interest. Britain as a whole is a nation and a people: we have our own interests, and those interests—while not necessarily hostile to those of our European neighbours—cannot be assumed to be identical to them. To transfer these powers from our people, our Parliament and our Government to our European neighbours is, in my view, a great mistake.

Article 130 deals with research and technological development. Its proposals are quite ambitious. What does the Minister understand by, for instance, the following passage in article 130h:

"The Community and the Member States shall co-ordinate their research and technological development activities so as to ensure that national policies and Community policy are mutually consistent"?

What is the "mutual consistency" of such research and development programmes likely to entail?

According to article 130i,

"A multiannual framework programme, setting out all the activities of the Community, shall be adopted by the Council, acting in accordance with the procedure referred to in article 189b."

The purpose of all that is as follows:

"The framework programme shall . . . establish the scientific and technological objectives to be achieved . . . indicate the broad lines of such activities . . . fix the maximum overall amount and the detailed rules for Community financial participation".

Do we really envisage the taking over of research and development, on a massive European scale, by the European Commission? Are those policies backed up by any budgeting arrangements, and any allocation of funds? I think that we should know the real meaning of title XV.

People may wonder about this at times, but agriculture is an industry—an important industry, with separate and special characteristics. One of the great puzzles of the Maastricht treaty is the fact that, although so much was examined—the treaty of Rome and the Single European Act were rephrased, added to and, sometimes, subtracted from—the agricultural matters in articles 38 and 47 of the treaty of Rome were not subjected to a single amendment. The only reference to agriculture is dealt with in amendment No. 184: it comes into the list of common policies, and is dealt with in just two lines. Not a single amendment was proposed. That is extraordinary.

The CAP is one of the least efficient, highly protected and most expensive policies for consumers, farmers and the nation that have ever been devised. It was a constant worry during the simultaneous GATT negotiations and nearly brought that round to a dead stop. Another extraordinary feature of the CAP is the great cost that it still imposes upon the whole Community and upon Britain as part of the Community. We heard earlier about the substantial reduction in farmers' incomes over the last few years. That reduction in farm incomes and the continued rise in food prices has to be set against the continuing increase in agricultural expenditure. The guarantee and guidance sections of the CAP accounted during the past year for 60 per cent. of the total budget of the European Community.

11.30 pm

I notice in today's press that one of our colleagues in the European Parliament has stated that up to £5 billion a year is defrauded from the European Community's agricultural budget by means of simple administrative procedures. I refer to Mr. John Tomlinson, who was formerly a Member of this House. He said that the Community's export refund regime is the biggest incentive to crime in Europe today and that it is extremely wasteful and costly.

Why is the CAP so costly? It provides guaranteed prices for almost unlimited quantities of production, although it tries to claw them back and to limit them where there are obvious excesses. It operates a system of levies that leads to any third-country producer, however efficient he may be, being cut off. His produce may be pounds per tonne cheaper than the European Community guaranteed price, but he will never be able to sell his produce within the European common market. However big the difference is, the levies will impose themselves and make up that difference.

One of the most extraordinary features of any protective system that I have ever heard of is the system of export restitutions—selling the surpluses produced, at dumped prices, in third world markets, thus affecting both developing countries and developed countries such as our old temperate food suppliers: New Zealand, Australia, Canada—and Argentina, for that matter. The CAP structure consists of export restitutions, guaranteed prices and import levies.

Despite the fact that the GATT negotiations were taking place at the same time, not a single amendment was tabled to change the CAP. I find that extraordinary. I am sure that the Committee does so, too. There is a strong common-sense case for dismantling a large part of the CAP. If we are serious about subsidiarity, surely we ought to be repatriating many of the powers that were handed over when the CAP was devised 20 years ago.

Can the Minister of State tell the Committee whether that question was even raised with the Commission or the Council of Ministers during the protracted discussions before Edinburgh, and ending in Edinburgh, about subsidiarity? Is it on the agenda, and if not, why not? It is the costliest and most foolish policy that the Community has devised. If we are serious about subsidiarity and repatriating powers that we should never have let go, it must be the prime target for examination and change.

I do not intend to pursue that issue further, because I am looking forward to hearing the Minister's reply. However, if we are to be competitive in Europe we must, first, keep our exchange rate policies under control and, secondly, find ways not of trying to invent European industrial policies but of assisting our own industry, which is so grievously out-classed by Germany's.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I am able to oblige the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) by seeking to intervene at this stage and deal with at least some of the points that have been made.

I shall start with what the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) said about the common fisheries policy. A number of his points were dealt with by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, who was present at the time.

The hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) expressed delight at being instructed for the first time in a matter concerning the treaty of Rome. I must disappoint the hon. Gentleman: the hon. Member for Great Grimsby has not opened a new window. The first important fisheries decision, equal access to stocks, was adopted by the Six just before we joined the Community in 1972. As the hon. Member for Great Grimsby will recall, Lord Wilson did not challenge that——

Mr. Lord: On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. I have sat throughout the debate hoping to speak on behalf of my farming constituents. I am not anxious to conclude the debate, but experience has shown that, when the Minister speaks at this point of the evening, he is making his wind-up speech and a closure motion will follow shortly. Are we to assume that that is so this evening?

The First Deputy Chairman: I do not think that we can assume anything. We shall have to wait and see.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The hon. Member for Great Grimsby will be aware that that position was not challenged by the Labour Government in 1974, when we sought what was euphemistically called renegotiation. The European Community has always used article 43 as the treaty base for fisheries. As far as I am aware, that has not been challenged before the European Court of Justice, so it is clear that no one shares the hon. Gentleman's rather idiosyncratic view.

Another point was made about fishing by my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash), who is not in his place at the moment. I do not say that in a critical sense; he has spent a considerable amount of time with us in the Committee. He mentioned United Kingdom quotas in one fishing area. Traditionally, as I am sure the hon. Member for Great Grimsby will confirm, we have never been big takers of monkfish from the area to which my hon. Friend referred. Our interests are in the North sea off Scotland, where our share of the take is high. For example, we take about 80 per cent. of the haddock caught in those waters.

The right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney is, of course, correct to say that there are no reforms per se in the treaty of the articles which refer to the common agricultural policy. However, there is probably unanimity in the House that the CAP should be the subject of continuing pressure for reform. The right hon. Gentleman will know that the CAP has been reformed this year, as a result of which price support has been reduced for cereals by almost 50 per cent.—or will be reduced by 50 per cent. in time.

The amount of resources which the Community devotes to the CAP is already down—not least thanks to pressure from the Government—to 60 per cent. of the budget, having been almost 80 per cent. at one time.

Mrs. Dunwoody rose——

Mr. Garel-Jones: I shall finish this point and then I shall of course give way to the hon. Lady.

The Edinburgh future financial deal reinforced discipline in that respect and maintained the guidelines restricting budget growth. We expect that the CAP share of the EC budget will be less than 50 per cent. by the end of this financial perspective, by 1999.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Is it not clear from the pattern of past years that the CAP budget is agreed at an early stage but, because of the number of supplementary budgets agreed throughout the year, it is only well into the financial year that the true total, as opposed to the budgetary total, becomes clear? Inevitably, it is obvious that the budget rises well above 60 per cent. and has in many instances reached 80 per cent.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The hon. Lady is not correct. One of the things that gave us a fair amount of leverage in arguing the financial perspective for the next seven years was that there had been a considerable underspend by the Community, not least in agriculture.

The right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney and other hon. Members referred to article 130.

Mr. Marlow rose——

Mr. Garel-Jones: I should like to make my point, and then I shall give way.

Hon. Members have been broadly correct to say that there have been no what I would call "changes of substance" in article 130 as opposed to the text under the treaty of Rome as amended by the Single European Act. As I said earlier, the key change for which Britain pressed was the sentence that I quoted on the need to preserve "open and competitive markets". Hon. Members have expressed concern about how the British interests will be defended by the Government. The quick and not so simple answer—the quick and easy answer—is that unanimity will be required, which seems to give the Government every opportunity to defend Britain's interests.

Mr. Marlow: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Garel-Jones: In a moment. I want to respond to as many of the right hon. Gentleman's points as possible.

He also mentioned the Community's research and development programme. It is well known that the United Kingdom has been very successful in gaining funds under the Community's research programmes. For example, it has more participants than any other member state and we certainly receive substantially more than we contribute to the EC's research budget. A recent report by the university of Manchester showed that the impact of the European research programmes is far greater than the research funding itself.

It has become a vehicle for links with Europe and for obtaining the two-way flow between researchers which is so important in the area. I am sure that the House and hon. Members who have universities and seats of learning in their constituencies will be aware that researchers from industry and in academia are extremely enthusiastic about their participation in the EC programmes.

We in the United Kingdom are very anxious to press the point—there is a danger here from other pressures within the Community—that EC research should be focused on generic issues and underpinning technology rather than seeking a back-door subsidy for particular industries within the Community

Mr. Marlow: My right hon. Friend has said that article 130 under title XIII with the heading "Industry" in the Maastricht treaty is substantially in the treaty of Rome. Is it under one heading in the treaty of Rome or is it spread about within it? If it is spread about within that treaty, in what parts of the treaty can one find it?

Article 130 contains the words:

"speeding up the adjustment of industry to structural changes".

Does that mean picking winners? If it means picking winners, where did the policy first appear in European legislation?

Mr. Garel-Jones: The best answer I can give my hon. Friend at this stage—if I am inaccurate in what I am saying, I shall write to him—is that under the treaty of Rome as amended by the Single European Act there was an industrial policy. The Government have sought—this is the only substantial change in the text—to preserve unanimity so that we have a veto over any moves made in the area and, above all, to insert wording—I accept the point made by an Opposition Member that these are only words—in the chapter that ensures that nothing shall be done to undermine competitiveness within the Community.

Sir Russell Johnston: The Minister may remember that I intervened to commend to him the virtues of majority voting, which produced from him a paean of praise on the virtues of majority voting and how important it had been in the completion of the single market. Now he is telling us how important unanimity and the capacity to introduce a veto are. He does not seem to be very consistent.

Mr. Garel-Jones: What member states must do, and what the United Kingdom seeks to do, as my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) said in an intervention, is make judgments about what is in the interests of the United Kingdom. My right hon. Friend Baroness Thatcher when she was Prime Minister judged rightly—this is the example I gave—that, if we were to achieve the single market, the only way in which we would achieve it would be qualified majority voting, because of the vested interests involved.

We have judged that there is a danger that research and development resources could be used to underpin uncompetitive industries in Europe. We want to be certain that the decisions taken about research and development should be taken by unanimity, so that we can ensure the pure, generic research of general application, which we think is the right way in which the Community should spend money. That is why we judged, in this instance, that it was right to preserve unanimity. We should not seek to elevate qualified majority voting or unanimity into a religious principle. One should seek to make judgments in each instance about what is in the best interests of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Fatchett: Will the Minister define in greater detail what he means by competitiveness in this context? There is an argument about whether competitiveness should be justified in the European context, or whether it should be defined as Europe versus Japan or the United States. Do the British Government differentiate in terms of competitiveness, or do they accept that there is an argument for European competitiveness in certain industries against Japanese and American interests? Or are the Government taking a view of competitiveness that relates to the European Community?

Mr. Garel-Jones: I reassure the hon. Gentleman that we are doing both. On the one hand, we want to ensure that anti-competitive practices shall not flourish within the Community, and that Community funds should not be used to support and sustain uncompetitive industries, particularly in matters of research and development. In doing that, we seek to make this country and the Community as a whole competitive in world markets.

Mr. Cash: My right hon. Friend the Minister of State has referred to the pre-existence of industrial policy under the treaty of Rome. To begin with, I presume that my right hon. Friend meant to refer to the treaty of Rome as amended by the Single European Act. Does my right hon. Friend agree that article 130 of the Single European Act, which deals with the European investment bank, and title 5, which relates to economic and social cohesion and research and technological development, do not deal with industrial policy in the terms in which he put it?

Furthermore, my right hon. Friend the Minister of State referred to Baroness Thatcher and her policies. The concept of economic policy under the critical title 2 was based exclusively, directly and deliberately on the notion of co-operation and not in terms of the proposals included in the Maastricht treaty that are intended to lead, and do lead, to a single currency and fixed exchange rates and have nothing to do with co-operation.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I do not know whether my hon. Friend was in the Chamber yesterday when my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury dealt with these points——

Mr. Cash: Rubbish.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I was about to deal with the points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, North-West (Mr. Butcher). It is all very well for my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) to make derogatory remarks from a sedentary position about the speech of my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary. I would limit myself to saying that my hon. Friend the Member for Lindsey, East (Sir P. Tapsell), who is no great lover of the treaty, described the intervention of my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary as brilliant, and his mental approach as first class.

Mr. Lord: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Garel-Jones: I will give way when I have finished this point.

My hon. Friend the Member for Lindsey, East said that my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary had a first-class mind. I thought that my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary, to the satisfaction of the Committee, made it perfectly clear that there was absolutely nothing in the treaty that obliges the United Kingdom to join the exchange rate mechanism at any particular date and absolutely nothing—and rather the contrary——

Mr. Cash: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Garel-Jones: I am not going to give way again to my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford on this point. My hon. Friend the Financial Secretary made it absolutely clear that nothing in the treaty forces Britain or the House to take a decision, if the circumstances arose when that might be possible, to move to stage 3.

Mr. Lord: May I remind my right hon. Friend of a point made by the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) about the funding of research and development and how the whole thing fits together? If we are talking about nation states or multinational companies and the kind of competition between Europe and America, is not the great contradiction and conundrum the fact that we are being asked, almost in the same breath, to support both co-operation and competition? Somehow, that does not seem to hang together.

Mr. Garel-Jones: My hon. Friend is making a perfectly intelligent point—I do not say that in a patronising way. That is why, in the discussions about research and development, we sought to ensure that the Community's money was put into generic research. Of course my hon. Friend is right: a number of vested interests in the Community will seek to divert the research and development funds into the support of uncompetitive or failing industries. That is not something that we would wish to seek.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Garel-Jones: I should like to make a little more progress, if I may. A number of my hon. Friends are still rising, and they might wish to catch your eye, Mr. Lofthouse.

Mr. Marlow: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Garel-Jones: I promised to give way.

Mr. Marlow: I am sorry to be so tiresome about this matter. I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his great courtesy. Under the Maastricht treaty, there is a distinct title—"Industry"; article 130. My right hon. Friend has said that there is a minimal amendment since the treaty of Rome, as amended by other treaties. He is surrounded by Industry Ministers, and there are three people in the Box. I wonder whether my right hon. Friend would tell the Committee precisely where in the treaty of Rome, as amended by previous treaties, there is that industry policy which is virtually the same as article 130, except for the amendment with regard to competition. The Committee would be very pleased to know that. I do not doubt that it is there, but these matters are very complex and it would be very helpful for the Committee to know where it appears in the treaty of Rome.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I cannot answer my hon. Friend at this moment, but I will certainly ensure that he receives an answer to his question. I think that the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) made the point that there is very little difference between the industry provisions as contained in the treaty of the Union and those which pertained during the Single European Act. I cannot quote the exact article to him, but the main changes made during the negotiations were the strengthening of competitiveness.

On the cohesion fund, which a number——

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney) rose——

Mr. Garel-Jones: May I make my point on the cohesion fund? On the cohesion fund, to which a number of hon. Members have referred, I have already made the point that, by 1999, the increase in the British Government's contribution to the budget will be about £200 million—0·1 per cent. of our total gross domestic product. In the case of the cohesion fund, by 1999 it will be 3 per cent. of the total Community budget.

The key point so far as the abatement is concerned is that we, the United Kingdom, will contribute only 5 per cent. towards that cohesion fund; 30 per cent. will be contributed by Germany and 20 per cent. will be contributed by France. Despite pressure from other member states, in Edinburgh we succeeded in ensuring that the abatement should apply to the new cohesion fund as well.

As I said to one of my hon. Friends, for the reasons that I gave, the cohesion fund represents a very good bargain for Britain, and a very good bargain for our constituents.

Mr. Rowlands rose——

Mr. Timothy Wood (Lords Commissioner to the Treasury) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): I beg to move amendment No. 2 in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert '(except Article 129b on page 34 of Cm 1934)'.

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Morris): With this, it will be convenient to consider the following amendments: No. 130, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert

'(excluding Article G D(16) on page 15 of Cm 1934).'.

No. 185, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 3(f) on page 9 of Cm 1934'.

No. 191, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 3(n)'.

No. 195, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 3(t)'.

No. 371, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 75 as referred to in Article G on page 15 of Command Paper number 1934'.

No. 383, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 129d as referred to in Article G on page 35 of Command Paper number 1934'.

No. 218, in page 1, line 10, after '1992', insert 'but not Article 129c of Title II thereof'.

Mr. Wilson: The unexpected arrival on the Government Front Bench of the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) is final confirmation that the lunatics are in charge of the asylum. Fortunately, his efforts have been overruled and he will doubtless retreat to decent obscurity. [Interruption.] I was at the game between Queen's Park Rangers and Manchester United earlier tonight and the crowd noise was probably lower there than it is here. I shall battle on regardless. [Interruption.]

The Chairman: Order. I am sure that hon. Members will wish to listen to the hon. Gentleman so that they may fully understand the amendment. May we have a little quiet?

Mr. Wilson: I am sure that those who arrive expecting a vote on the amendment would like to have a remote idea of what it is about. However, this is a probing amendment and we shall not press it to a vote. We totally favour trans-European networks and better communications as set out in article 129b of the treaty. There are some extremely interesting concepts to explore in the article and I welcome the opportunity to debate the needs of Europe's islands and peripheral regions.

I hope that the debate will affirm that the European Community has much to offer such regions and will help us better to devise how the treaty can be used to strengthen that purpose. Many people in the islands and peripheral regions of Scotland see Europe as a better friend to them, and an agency more responsive to their needs, than British Governments and the Scottish Office have been. They hope that, if there is to be an improvement in the communications systems, the European Community will play a large part in the process. Encompassing that proposition into article 129b would offer a great deal and provide plenty of material for debate.

12.15 am

Mr. Spearing: Will not the improvement of networks of any sort to further competition—that is the aim, as the Minister told us in the last debate—not only allow access out, whether it be from the highlands and islands of Scotland, the mountains of Wales or the moorlands of the south-west, but access in from outside? If the advantage to those going in is greater than the advantage to those going out, is not improved communication a disadvantage to the peripheral areas, instead of being the advantage that my hon. Friend and many others think that it will be?

Mr. Wilson: It may sound paradoxical, but in my experience, islanders rarely suffer from insularity. For example, many of the residents of the islands on the periphery of Scotland have been two or three times round the world as merchant seamen. It is a myth that they are concerned about people moving in or out of their area. What they want—this underlines my hon. Friend's point—is the opportunity to live and work within their area. They do not want a magnetic force drawing them out of that area.

I hope that no hon. Member would propose that we should impose poor communications lest people should be able to remove themselves from any part of the country or the community. That would doubly penalise them. The communications envisaged under the title would lead to a greater flow of people, but there would also be a greater flow of economic activity. That could only be to the advantage of these communities.

Mr. Macdonald: I want to reinforce that point. In the island communities of Scotland, the traditional economic disadvantage has not been lack of material resources or of skills, talent and enterprise on the part of the people, but simply distance from the main centres of population and markets. Anything that develops communications and transport networks and helps to overcome that distance is hugely to the benefit of those people.

Mr. Wilson: I entirely agree. As my hon. Friend knows as well as I do, one of the great growth industries in the islands and peripheries of Scotland is the seafood industry—both its cultivation and the catching of a high quality produce. In the old days, people who caught fish or shellfish in those places sent the catch off to market in London. Whether the catches arrived dead or alive was at the mercy of those who transported them, and they took what price they could get. Now, there is an immensely sophisticated system that transports live shellfish and fish from the furtherest parts of the United Kingdom to the extremities of the European Community.

It can only be in the interests of the primary producers and those who are involved in transportation that every barrier is broken down to ensure that consignments are moved more quickly, efficiently and healthily so that each catch has a higher value. The idea that there is any advantage in diminishing progress towards optimum communications is farcical. The idea that we protect peripheries by refusing to implement optimum communications is patronising and no part of my philosophy.

Mr. Devlin: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the problem goes much wider? We are talking not of the peripheral regions of Britain but of those of the Community, which encompass the north of England, the whole of Scotland and, some might argue, Britain itself. We know that Britain is away from the centre of the European market and that it will need a great deal of assistance. I am pleased to say that assistance is developing in the north of England—I know that it is being developed in Scotland—in terms of communications, including direct links so that it is not necessary always to go through the south-east of England, which in the north has been the bane of our life.

Mr. Wilson: Up to a point, I agree with the hon. Gentleman. I say in the nicest possible way, in putting down a marker, that I shall not allow the word "peripherality" to be hijacked on behalf of the whole of Britain. We have seen that happen already with "subsidiarity", which has been falsely translated to mean the level of national government. To me, peripherality does not mean the whole of Britain. It means places that are genuinely peripheral to Europe, which means in turn the fringes of the coast, areas that are disadvantaged within a country, or a region which is also disadvantaged by relative remoteness. "Peripherality" is a specific word that means the edges, the places on the edges. From a Scottish perspective, those are places that are far from national markets, never mind any others.

Mr. Charles Kennedy: I am happy to work within the confines of the definition that the hon. Gentleman has outlined. To take up the remarks of the hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald), does the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) agree with the fair point, as I see it, that the Commission often takes a sensitive approach to the problems of peripheral areas within Europe, not least the highlands and islands of Scotland? That approach is brought into sharp and vivid relief when we consider the sky-high tolls that are about to be levied by the Scottish Office on the Skye bridge, which is in the early stages of construction. That policy will affect the Skye community and it will have a knock-on effect.

That is an argument which we do not need to advance in detail now, but the knock-on effect on Caledonian MacBrayne could well disadvantage the farther communities on the Western Isles which depend on the existing ferry link, which will be adversely affected economically by the provision of a bridge. Is the hon. Gentleman aware that many of us will be looking to the Commission to take a direct and active interest in the project and the financial scheme? The Scottish Office has lamentably failed peripheral communities.

Mr. Wilson: As the hon. Gentleman well knows, I agree with every word that he has spoken. I do not, however, want to be taken away entirely from the structure of my speech by diverting interventions, attractive though they may be. I shall come to the Skye bridge and ferry services later. I agree that we could have a long debate about ferry services in a real periphery. Of course, it is not only about the periphery; it is about the interconnection and interoperability of national networks, as well as access to such networks.

As the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Devlin) rightly said, that means the maximising of communications. Surely we all want it to be possible to get on some form of transport at any point in the United Kingdom and, with the least possible trouble and the best possible connections, arrive somewhere within the European Community in the shortest possible time. That is a tremendous aim, on which all hon. Members should agree.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): Did not the immensely sophisticated communications system for the transportation of shellfish and other goods come into being before and without the Maastrich treaty, and cannot it be extended without that treaty? Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the Council of Europe, which goes wider than European union and the European Community, is considering the introduction of fast communications throughout Europe? Why do we need a Maastricht treaty to bring about what the hon. Gentleman wants?

Mr. Wilson: That is a catch-all question. I was expressing the general view and perception of people on the periphery that communications should be speeded up. A journalist friend recently travelled with a consignment of shellfish from the Isle of Skye to Barcelona. His purpose was to observe the product from the moment of the catch to the moment it was sold, covering the various intermediaries. It was anything but an obstruction-free journey. It was not a single market; it was not a seamless movement through an internal market. Apart from other obstructions, at various points along the route it was necessary to pay Customs officers in kind. On entering France, that meant handing over eight crabs.

I do not know whether the aim of a seamless journey from Skye to Barcelona is feasible under the previous arrangements, but I want it to be feasible under the new ones.

Mr. Jessel: Why should that be through the Maastricht treaty?

Mr. Wilson: That is a question which the hon. Gentleman must ask himself. I want to move from discussion of the periphery to the question of rail links currently being developed in Europe.

To my knowledge, several hon. Members in the Chamber have visited France to look at the development of French railways. I know that several hon. Members have travelled on the TGV. Several have looked at the infrastructure projects in the Pas de Calais area. I ask hon. Members, irrespective of party allegiance, to ask themselves whether what is being done on this side of the channel to facilitate the concept that underlies title XII is being undertaken with an iota of the enthusiasm being shown on the other side of the channel.

Sir Teddy Taylor: As the hon. Gentleman is so enthusiastic—as, indeed, are some of his colleagues from the Scottish islands—could he tell me whether he has received an assurance that the United Kingdom will get more money out of the new slush fund for transport than it has to put in because of Maastricht? There will be no benefit if we had to put in a great deal of money only to get out very little. Has the hon. Gentleman received an assurance from the Government, the Commission or anyone else that we will get more out than we put in?

Mr. Wilson: The hon. Gentleman, from the remote region of Southend, is trying to return to the peripheral question. I am trying to move on. Past experience suggests that the peripheral regions get more out of the Community than they put in. I know of the hon. Gentleman's long-standing objections.

Sir Teddy Taylor: I just asked a simple question.

Mr. Wilson: The hon. Gentleman always asks a question three times. I will try to answer it once.—[Interruption.] That makes it five. If the hon. Gentleman will pause, I will try to answer.

Sir Teddy Taylor rose——

12.30 am

Mr. Wilson: The hon. Gentleman is incapable of resisting the temptation to ask his question a sixth time. I will try to think of a profundity, given the build-up that the hon. Gentleman has given me. If he is asking whether the periphery of Scotland and of Britain get more or less out of the Community than they put in——

Sir Teddy Taylor: That was not my question.

Mr. Wilson: That was the hon. Gentleman's question.

Sir Teddy Taylor: We want to make progress, and to save time I emphasise that I was simply asking whether the hon. Gentleman has received an assurance from anyone —the Government, the Commission, or anyone else—that Britain, which includes the peripheries, will get more out of the new transport slush fund than the extra it will pay towards it. We are not asking whether Skye will receive more from Southend, but whether there will be a net gain or a net loss from the introduction of the new transport subsidies. If the hon. Gentleman can say that he has received an assurance on that point, it would save a great deal of time and we could progress with our business more quickly. Is the answer yes or no?

Mr. Wilson: I do not want to be as pedantic and semantic as the hon. Gentleman. I have not received any assurances as to how much Britain will get out of any fund. I do not have an assurance that I will be here tomorrow. The hon. Gentleman asked a rather silly question. He began by asking whether the peripheral regions would get more out of Europe.

Sir Teddy Taylor indicated dissent.

Mr. Wilson: Yes, he did. I am hypnotised by the shaking of the hon. Gentleman's head, but that is the question that he asked. It is a matter of historical record that the peripheral areas of Scotland have done rather well out of the Community. A lot of money has come from the Community, albeit it came from the British taxpayer in the first place—but if it had been left to Government Departments to make decisions on such ventures as the integrated development programmes in the Western Isles, they would never have seen the light of day.

I am by no means an uncritical admirer of the institutions in question, but had it been left to the British Government, many of those schemes would not have happened. Even then, it had been difficult getting the Government to chip in their share in the form of additionality. Whatever may be the balance sheet between Britain and the Community, from my own extensive observation of the periphery I have not the slightest doubt that the periphery has done rather well out of the Community and has nothing to fear from the transport fund or any other.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does the hon. Gentleman consider that the railway line between Perth and Drumochter is peripheral?

Mr. Wilson: Since part of that line serves the hon. Gentleman's constituency, it follows logically that it is at the heart of the universe. I do regard it as reasonbly peripheral, but it depends where one starts. If one starts at Pitlochry, it is not peripheral. I have seen a proposal to site the European investment bank at Dunoon, but I have not yet come across a proposal to site the European Commission at Pitlochry.

I shall try to return to the other point, about——

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): Shellfish.

Mr. Wilson: I am trying to get off that subject; shellfish can have deleterious effects after midnight. I shall try to return to the point about the railways.

I well understand why the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) was not present earlier, and I am sure that he was as pleased as I was about the tabling of a private notice question about storm damage in Perthshire. No doubt he is well aware of the damage that has been done to railway infrastructure in his constituency, and elsewhere north of Stirling.

We accept that British Rail, in recognition of the social obligation to maintain peripheral railway lines, will put the necessary investment into restoring that infrastructure. Is the hon. Gentleman as confident, however, that under a privatised railway system someone would be prepared to put several million pounds into the repairing of bridges, and all the other work that will have to be done to put loss-making railway services back in place?

The Chairman: Order. The merits or demerits of privatisation are not appropriate subjects for debate on amendment No. 2.

Mr. Wilson: I respect your ruling, Mr. Morris. Surely, however, an interrelationship exists between privatisation —particularly privatisation of a railway network—and the probability of maintaining the transport services referred to in article 129b.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Article 129b(2) states:

"Within the framework of a system of open and competitive markets, action by the Community shall aim at promoting the interconnection and inter-operability of national networks".

That could imply that, at some stage in the future, privately operated transport networks would be expected to exist in every member state. It is implied that privatisation is within the framework of article 129b.

The Chairman: Order. That does not include the pros and cons of privatisation.

Mr. Wilson: One form of transport competes against others. No one but a clown would believe that there will be a competitive system on the railways, in any meaningful sense: trains cannot overtake each other.

Mr. Home Robertson: May I take my hon. Friend back to Drumochter? He will be aware that virtually all the cement in Scotland is produced at Dunbar, in my constituency. As a consequence of decisions made in the run-up to privatisation, the price of transferring rail freight to Inverness, via Drumochter, has been increased to such an extent that railway freight transport no longer competes with road freight transport. Instead of one train carrying cement up to Inverness every week, there will be 40 lorryloads.

That is the kind of dotty system that is operating in the United Kingdom. If we had a proper integrated policy providing for bulk transport around the country, we should not experience such problems.

Mr. Wilson: I could not agree more. The issue exercises me greatly as well. Obviously, I wish to remain within your guidelines, Mr. Morris; however, I want to highlight the contradiction involved in adopting article 129b, which pays lip service to the extension and development of communications to reduce the disadvantage to the periphery, while pursuing a policy that, on rational grounds, we can only expect to endanger railway services in precisely the areas that article 129b is supposed to benefit. I am not sure how we can avoid that.

I cannot imagine why anybody should not want what is envisaged. Article 129b does not set out a firm programme for achieving those objectives, but the aspiration—that Community funds should be used to support projects and that the Community should promote these objectives—is unexceptionable. I expect this country to be in a position to benefit from the cohesion fund that is to be established no later than December 1993 for the financing of specific transport infrastructure projects in member states.

The important word in article 129c is the word "may." The article states that the Community

"may support the financial efforts made by the Member States for projects of common interest".

The question is whether projects will be put forward by this member state in order to qualify for the support that is clearly envisaged in article 129c.

The United Kingdom Government are not bringing forward infrastructure schemes on the same scale as other member states. They lack vision. One only has to look at the envisaged railways map of Europe to recognise that fact. If one looks at a small map covering the north of France and the south of England, one sees a network of high-speed rail links, although speeds are lower on this side of the Channel than on the other. There is, however, some vestige of comparability between the north of Europe and the south of England.

If, however, we look at a map that encompasses France, Italy and Spain as well as the whole of the United Kingdom, we see that any pretence of high-speed links before the end of the decade ends in London, whereas the work going on in Europe is aimed at extending those links so that people arriving at Lille or at any other great centre of the railways industry will be able to travel in high-speed trains to every other member state.

Mr. Harris: The hon. Gentleman is talking rubbish. My complaint is that the sleeper arriving from mainland Europe will end at Plymouth instead of going all the way to Penzance. It will not end at London. The network is fanning out, although not far enough. I make common cause with the hon. Gentleman on that point. He is wrong, however, when he says that everything will end at London.

Mr. Wilson: The hon. Gentleman seems to have established to his own satisfaction, and everybody else's, that the sleeper will end at Plymouth rather than Penzance, but beyond that I am mystified by the point that he is trying to make. There will be a nightly sleeper to Glasgow and Edinburgh, or from Glasgow and Edinburgh to London. It would be smashing to get on a night train in Glasgow and to get off it in Paris the next morning, but it is not a high-speed train link. The point that I was making, which the hon. Gentleman conspicuously failed to contradict, is that links are being established throughout the rest of Europe, but we are not at the races. We have not designated a route—unless the Minister knows something that I do not—between the tunnel and London, far less the rest of the country.

The Minister for Public Transport (Mr. Roger Freeman): The House will recall that the Government have said repeatedly that they will move to announcement of a new high-speed rail link route shortly and that public consultation will start on that. The only way to finance such a major project is not from an enormous European fund but from the private sector. The private sector will provide the majority of the finance and will carry the project forward. We shall have a high-speed rail link between Folkestone and London much earlier than if we had relied on European funding.

Mr. Wilson: I do not want to prolong my speech, but the Minister has opened a new seam to the debate. The proof of the pudding is in the eating. Progress is being made in the Pas de Calais area, but we are still messing about finding a route between the tunnel and London.

Sir David Mitchell (Hampshire, North-West): If a rail link is already faster than travelling by air and has already won the market, what is the purpose of expending a vast sum of money simply to make it faster?

Mr. Wilson: I did not quite catch the point, but if the hon. Gentleman is drawing a comparison between rail and air, I think that fewer people will want to travel between London and Paris by air if they can use a high-speed, efficient link.

Sir David Mitchell: A high-speed link in the United Kingdom is not necessary if the total journey is already quicker than by air.

Mr. Wilson: That is a fantastic argument: that because the French have speeded up their link we need not bother. That is a remarkably defeatist argument. It may find a market in the south of England between the tunnel and London, where there is resistance to a high-speed link, but it is no excuse for the Government's failure to develop high-speed links north of London, where the advantage to which the former Minister, the hon. Member for Hampshire, North-West (Sir D. Mitchell), refers will not exist. It will not be quicker to travel by train from Paris to another major city in the United Kingdom if high-speed links are not put in place. At best that seems a parochial view, and at worst a defeatist one.

Labour Members and, I am sure, many Conservative Members recognise the need for good communications in Europe and want barriers broken down. My ambition for my children and their generation is that they will get on a train, plane or bus from Glasgow to Paris, Seville or any of the great European cities and will think of it not as an outlandish journey but as part of their common heritage. Good communications and a fair structure that accommodates all people are necessary to achieve that.

Mr. Bill Walker: As the hon. Gentleman is talking about the business of people being able to go by bus or by air, how does he feel about United Kingdom taxpayers paying money into a European fund which is then used to subsidise European state-owned companies in competition with our privately owned companies which are doing a better job?

Mr. Wilson: I have too much regard for the hon. Gentleman's probity in these matters to think that he is referring to Stagecoach——

Mr. Walker: I was talking about British Airways and British Midland.

Mr. Wilson: —which is at the moment reduced to acting as a booking agent for one coach on overnight trains from Glagow to Aberdeen, which is not quite the proud new Valhalla which the Minister went north to inaugurate some months ago. I should have thought that the mention of British Airways as a model of private success was a bit dubious in the present climate.

I certainly want taxpayers' money to be used to make transport cheaper and more efficient—I can think of no more sensible way of using taxpayers' money. Having a good transport system is in our environmental and social interests and counters the remoteness of some places. There is no better way to use taxpayers' money than to promote such an infrastructure.

We could debate all night. I shall continue only for a few more minutes, but I want to talk about the genuine periphery and about ferries and bridges in particular. I want my part of the country—the west of Scotland—and the north of Scotland to be served by an ever improving network of ferries. I do not want people who live on islands to be penalised. It is wrong and immoral that people who suffer many hardships and difficulties in order to live in island communities should have to pay high ferry fares for doing so.

I want subsidy—to the Tories it may be a dirty word, but to me it is a socialist word—because it equalises and is a safeguard against disadvantage for people who live in peripheral communities. I am glad that Caledonian MacBrayne, for instance, has been able to weigh in heavily to take advantage of European funds to build new ferries.

Mr. Bill Walker rose——

Mr. Wilson: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman —no, I shall not, because I have been very generous. I am not filibustering—if we are to have this debate, we might as well ensure that some reasonable points are made. I wish to express my strong philosophical support for subsidies, for grants and for European support for transport systems in peripheral areas. The hon. Gentleman is extremely agitated so I shall accept one final intervention.

Mr. Walker: The hon. Gentleman went off the point —I was not talking about buses. Will he consider holidaymakers, for example, who travel from south-east and London airports to Spain? Does he think it right that the Iberia airlines should be subsidised, unlike United Kingdom airlines which work in a similar market? That was my question.

Mr. Wilson: If the hon. Gentleman had asked it properly, it might not have been veiled in such mystery. I defend the right of countries to have their own airlines, but how they manage those airlines' fiscal policies is quite another question—to get into that would require a whole new debate.

I return to what Government policies do to peripheral communities and the example cited by the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy). There are currently proposals—unique, for the moment—to construct a road toll bridge which will at the start, in 1996, result in the imposition of tolls of about £6 per car on an island community. The toll will be at least eight times higher than that for any other road bridge in Britain. That is what the Tories are doing to island communities.

If there is any fund in Europe to which the community can apply to get the funding that will remove that imposition on the island in question, I would rather place my faith in that European fund than I would in the political motivation of Ministers who have wished the toll on a community which patently does not want it.

Mr. Macdonald: When my hon. Friend pushes the point, he may care to contrast the current position, with the absence of any European funding going into the peripheral areas, such as funding for the Skye bridge, with the previous position whereby structural funds were available which went into financing a range of new ferries to serve the outer islands of Scotland. There were roll-on/roll-off facilities and the Kylesku bridge. All those were built with European money. Without European money, the Government are simply turning round and leaving the local community to finance the infrastructural projects themselves.

Mr. Wilson: That is a neat point for the end of my speech. My hon. Friend is entirely right. He has explained the perceptions of people who live in the peripheral communities. As long as there were European funds, people living in Skye could say to a European source, "This is a cruel and vicious thing, which is being done for political motivation. Is there any way in which to get round this?" Such people would expect to find—I believe that they would find—in European sources some sympathy for the plight into which they have been plunged by the determination of the Scottish Office to have a pilot project based on tolls.

What would the reaction of hon. Members be if a community in their constituency had imposed on it a toll bridge regime of £6 per car? If they cannot answer that question, why are they prepared to see it happen in the name of the Government somewhere else in the country?

Hon. Members should realise that there would be sympathy in Europe, whereas there is no sympathy in the Government. The islanders say, rightly, that, if there are funds to be drawn on and devices to be used that ameliorate the impact of Government policies, they want them. Islanders are not insular. They have no reason to trust the Government.

If there are Conservative diehards who cannot understand why people are prepared to support the EC even in communities that, 15 years ago, would not have been prepared to support it, they should look at themselves in the mirror and at the actions of their own Government. People are looking for defence mechanisms and for alternatives. They are looking for ways of avoiding the impact not of EC policies, but of the policies of the British Tory Government.

Mr. Cash: The provisions to which the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) has just referred were directed to transport—to rail and to roads. We heard not a word that I can recall relating to telecommunications or to energy. For that reason, his speech skimmed over the surface of the matter. I have no doubt that we shall remedy that.

[Mr. Cash]

The provision that we are discussing deals not only with transport, but with telecommunications and energy. In effect, a perfect example of a governmental—in this case, supragovernmental—system which is being devised in Brussels. It is intervention in the market, although it pretends to respect the market.

There is a fundamental contradiction in the way in which the provisions have been cast which is characteristic of the contradictions in the Maastricht treaty, which I have described as a hall of mirrors. It looks both ways at the same time. Unfortunately, many of the perfectly reasonable objectives which could be achieved by European co-operation by private companies and private operators working within the Community are being subsumed, as the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North made clear, by a dirigiste, supranational, state-controlled, socialist-engineered system. No doubt the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North believes in that, but will it actually work? Is it the right way to proceed?

I have a slight historical interest in the matter in that my great-great-grandfather founded the London and Brighton railway in 1830. I believe that that was the second railway in Britain, if not in the world, although my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) knows far more about these matters than I. My great-great-grandfather also went to St. Peterburg in 1855. In other words, we were dealing with trans-European networks in the railway system, and also in respect of south and north America, more than a century ago.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): I know that my hon. Friend lives in the past, so perhaps he was not aware that the motor car, which had a passing effect on the finances of the railways, had not been invented in those days.

Mr. Cash: I always defer to the superior knowledge of my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch in respect of such matters. He, too, lives in the past. Indeed, he writes about it. However, we have a trans-European network which has been devised and based on a system set up more than a century ago.

The policy that has been pursued claims to want an open and competitive market, but, it then wobbles. It states that we will take into account the potential economic viability of the projects. It sets out a grand panoramic vision and, as with so much of the European dimension, it promises much, but it attenuates and begs the question whether it will deliver the kind of operations to which the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North referred.

Will it be able to provide a system that will benefit the people in the islands to whom the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North referred? Obviously, he made much of that point for parochial reasons. I doubt whether the north of Scotland will get the kind of system that the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North hopes that it will get, simply because of the costs involved. The potential economic viability of a project will frequently be the reason why objectives are not achieved.

Mr. Spearing: I support the aspirations of my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson), but does he agree that some colleagues inside and outside the House have underestimated the bureaucracy involved? My hon. Friend will be aware that the first report of the Select Committee on European Legislation reported on trans-European networks. In relation to transport, it stated:

"The Commission proposes to allocate the Declaration for transport projects following consultation with the existing Transport Infrastructure Committee."

The report then gives several criteria.

Does the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) agree that, while the promise may be great, the delivery via layers of bureaucracy and the Commission, with the Commission deciding in the end on a pork-barrel basis in relation to other matters, may not satisfy the aspirations that I share with my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North?

Mr. Cash: I tend to agree with the hon. Gentleman. No one would remotely object to the idea of an efficient intercontinental rail system. However, for the reasons that the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) has given, and because of the qualifications about the economic viability of the project, it seems highly improbable that the proposal will turn out to be more than an aspiration. That begs the large question of whether the system will work.

We must also consider subsidies. There is no question but that in France, Germany, Spain, and so on, massive subsidies are paid to the railway systems. British Rail is only partially subsidised. There is an important issue. Maastricht permits subsidies to selected networks. Will subsidised Greek road transport, for example, compete fairly with non-subsidised British hauliers both operating, for example, in Germany? Does Maastricht mean that rail transport will be subsidised throughout Europe? If so, at what level, and will it be at the same level throughout?

At present, as I have said, British Rail is partially subsidised, whereas the French and other railway systems are heavily subsidised. I do not intend to complain at this moment about the Government's rail privatisation programme, but the fact that it is bound to reduce or even to remove subsidy will surely have an adverse impact on the relative competitiveness of our system vis-a-vis those of continental railway systems which are more heavily subsidised.

Mr. Freeman: My hon. Friend is not right in asserting that our proposals for privatisation of the railways will automatically lead to a reduction and an elimination of subsidy.

Mr. Cash: I am delighted to hear that. The extent of the subsidy is relatively less than in those other countries. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will strive, in his departmental responsibilities, to ensure that the other nation states in Europe, within that framework, eliminate or at any rate level off the amount of subsidy they pay, so as to ensure a level playing field in respect of transport networks.

Mr. Adley: I understood my hon. Friend to agree with the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) that he was opposed to bureaucracy. Which European railway has or intends to have an organisation called Railtrack, a franchising authority and a regulator, to name but three out of about eight new bureaucratic quangos proposed to be set up? If my hon. Friend would tell me that, I might be more interested in what he says.

Mr. Cash: I am not the slightest bit interested in setting up a bureaucratic system. The proposed system is likely to be extremely bureaucratic because it will have centralised control based on decisions taken within the European Commission to far too great an extent. That is one of the main problems. On the one hand, we shall have railway systems elsewhere in Europe which, on the face of it, are more heavily subsidised than ours without the prospect of ours having greater subsidy—to which I would object in principle, in any case. On the other hand, we shall also have more bureaucracy, because the system will be based on centralised control.

Mr. Dykes: I have been listening to my hon. Friend with great interest as he referred to the importance of the incidence and weight of subsidy. He is obviously something of an expert on the subject. As you know, Mr. Morris, he himself used subsidised mail recently when he sent out a letter advertising on Tuesday 8 December an anti-European meeting, when a French anti-federal leader —a foreigner—was going to come and speak with him——

The Chairman: Order. I ruled on this matter the other evening, so I do not think that we need to develop that point any further.

Mr. Dykes: I understand that, Mr. Morris, but may I continue? There is a further reply from the Department of the Serjeant at Arms, and that is what I was referring to. It is germane to the argument of subsidisation that my hon. Friend has been deploying. That is why I should like to continue this intervention—with your very kind permission, Mr. Morris, if I may, but I will sit down if you deem me to be out of order when I make my next few contiguous remarks.

On 14 January, the Assistant Serjeant at Arms kindly wrote to me again, referring to the letter that I wrote to Madam Speaker—that is why I am asking my hon. Friend about the important matter of subsidisation—saying that my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) had conceded that he had wrongly used the subsidised mail system of the House of Commons, both the notepaper of the House of Commons and the official franked envelopes, and had repaid the entire amount.

Of course, I am interested in the extent and weight of the subsidisation in this connection, which is rather similar to railway subsidisation if one considers it in profound terms, Mr. Morris, because the Department of the Serjeant at Arms makes a policy point of never revealing to anybody how much public money was actually used in that illicit purpose of advertising a meeting to other hon. Members' constituents. Will my hon. Friend say how much of the subsidy he has now repaid to the public fund?

Mr. Cash: Every time we are in this position the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) raises the same issue. The matter has been dealt with through——

The Chairman: Order. We are not in this position—the hon. Gentleman is in it.

Mr. Cash: The matter has been disposed of through the Serjeant at Arms, the money has been repaid and that is the end of it.

Mr. Harris: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. With great respect to my hon. Friend, the matter has not been disposed of. The matters were raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) and myself some nights ago, and we gave the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) opportunities to clear them up. We have returned to the matters tonight and the hon. Gentleman has again not cleared them up——

Mr. Adley: Cashgate.

Mr. Harris: Cashgate has been mentioned. The hon. Member for Stafford has not cleared up the matter. It has been put to him quite fairly, and he obviously wants to clear his name and dispel any uncertainty. In fairness to the hon. Gentleman it is only right and proper that we should give him the opportunity to dispose of the matter once and for all. All he needs to do is say by how much he has reimbursed the House authorities for the expenditure.

We all remember that last week the hon. Gentleman said that there was to be a demonstration in Trafalgar square this Sunday. He used the House to advertise the demonstration and he said that——

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman is straying wide of the amendment, and the issues are ones for the House authorities, not for the Chair. If the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) wishes to say something about them, I am sure that he will do so. If he does not, I would be grateful if he would return to the amendment.

Mr. Adley: Further to that point of order, Mr. Morris. May I seek your guidance? Are we not discussing telecommunications under this group of amendments? Do not the issues raised by my hon. Friends fall perfectly properly under the amendments, which deal with subsidies on telecommunications?

The Chairman: I have just ruled and given guidance to the hon. Member for Stafford, who is to take one of two options relating to transportation.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. Is it in order to ask for the sum to be spelt out in ecu?

The Chairman: I am not sure that that point of order is helpful.

Mr. Cash: The matter has been disposed of. I think that the figure was about £210. I am afraid that I do not have the correspondence on me, although my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) carries it around with him all the time. Every time I rise to speak, he raises the issue. The matter has been disposed of, and it would be best if I continued with the issue of road transport.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my hon. Friend receive the regular communication that I and all other hon. Members receive weekly, which is paid for by the public purse and informs us how grand the Community is? No one seems to be raising points of order about that.

Mr. Cash: My hon. Friend makes a good point.

The Chairman: Order. Before the hon. Member takes up the issue raised by the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker), I should tell him that it does not fall within the remit of the amendments. I am having difficulty hearing the hon. Member for Stafford, and would be grateful if he would speak up.

Mr. Cash: As my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) says, there are matters relating to subsidies all over the place. With regard to public subsidies, it would be as well if we could return to the provisions, as I initially wanted to do.

There is already a road transport market throughout Europe, in which British transport contractors are already well placed. The onset of the single market a few weeks ago has greatly speeded up road transport by removing some of the border red tape. Now, unfortunately, the extra regulations implicit in the Maastricht process will have a tendency to slow it down. How does the Minister see the provisions of the Maastricht treaty improving the market for British road hauliers in practice?

Mr. Wilson: Although the hon. Gentleman is out on a limb on this issue in his party, he is very much in the main stream on others. He believes that subsidies to British Rail should be heavily reduced, and should not be brought into line with the subsidies in other European countries. How representative of the rail industry does he think that view is?

1.15 am

Mr. Cash: The subsidy for British Rail must be weighed against the money being spent on roads and motorways in the United Kingdom. There is a proposal to widen the M6, part of which runs through my constituency. Much of that widening is quite unnecessary. The proposal, which would involve huge sums of public money, includes the creation of another spaghetti junction at junction 15—an idea strongly opposed by my constituents. No one has come up with any justification for the project as yet. The real problem is the bottleneck at the junction between the M5 and M6. If there is to be an equitable distribution of money for the improvement of our road and rail networks —I am not against investing public money in that—such distribution must be done in the right place and in the right way.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Will my hon. Friend tell the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) that the same will happen here as has happened with every other Euro-fund? Britain will pay in more than it gets out, so we shall have less money to spend in Britain. Will my hon. Friend tell the socialists who, strangely, sit on the Conservative Benches that the result will be fewer jobs and transport facilities for the British people, and that all we are doing is implementing another socialist policy over which we shall have no control? We shall be handing over more money to Europe, which is madness, and it will cause more unemployment, even in socialist-held Harrow.

Mr. Cash: I could not agree more. I was most surprised that my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) avoided any reference to the impact of the fisheries policy on area 7. He knows perfectly well that his fishing constituents are being wiped out, but he has not spoken up because he is a Euro-fantasist——

The Chairman: Order. Not by this amendment, they are not.

Mr. Cash: In the context of the trans-European network there is considerable interest in the amount of money that goes into the fisheries policy——

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman must understand the rules of debate. If I say that a certain line of argument is out of order, it is no good the hon. Gentleman's returning to it. I should be grateful if he stuck to these amendments.

Mr. Cash: Does article 129c mean that the Community will pay for the fast passenger rail link from Folkestone to Waterloo?

Mr. Adley: My hon. Friend is being frightfully unkind to the Department of Transport. Speaking of roads, is he aware that there is a secret plan to widen the M25 to 14 lanes? Although the Department of Transport has not announced it yet, it is to be a new London airport.

Mr. Cash: My hon. Friend is another Euro-fantasist. No doubt he will be able to live with that nightmare as well.

I would be grateful if the Minister would tell us whether the Community will help to contribute to the fast rail link. It is a project as defined under the treaty, and it needs to connect with the rest of Europe. The point deserves consideration and a reply. If not, why will the Community not pay for it?

Mr. Freeman: I am glad to respond briefly to my hon. Friend. I assume that my hon. Friend is speaking about the new rail link from Folkestone to King's Cross rather than the one from Folkestone to Waterloo, which will open in a year's time. I have said that it will be financed largely by the private sector, by this country, and that any European fund contribution will be relatively modest.

Mr. Cash: Why should the west coast line to Scotland not receive similar funds? That would lead to interconnection and interoperability. Perhaps the Minister will answer that question.

I shall move on and deal with energy policy. British Gas has done extremely well not only in the United Kingdom but throughout the world. It has entered the world market for the discovery, recovery, distribution and marketing of gas. Under the Maastricht treaty, who will place the contracts for interstate pipelines? Will it be done through Brussels, and who will enter into the contracts? The issue is not merely to assert what we want but to look at the characteristics and provisions of the treaty, relate them to practical examples, and ask where the money will go. Will it go to the other European countries or will we get our fair share? If there is increased distribution of public subsidies, we must get a reasonable slice of the cake.

Massive problems will arise if the entire system is translated to a centralised, Brussels-orientated slush fund. If that happens, national interests will intervene and we shall be outmanoeuvred and outgunned. The Minister said that the Folkestone to King's Cross link will be paid for by private enterprise, and I do not cavil at that, but will there be equitable distribution of the slush funds to which our taxpayers contribute? We must try to understand such matters, because the treaty is not just a few words or paragraphs: it translates into law the prospects for parts of the Community to tap cohesion and slush funds. We need direct answers to our questions.

Article 129c states:

"The Community may decide to co-operate with third countries"— that is, countries outside the 12 member states. What happens if the Community decides not to do that? How and to what extent will contracts for British Gas pipelines throughout central and eastern Europe be provided? Siemens has worked its way into Czechoslovakia and is securing a substantial degree of control over the energy grid in that part of central and middle Europe. Under the third-country provision, will Siemens be able to obtain European funds which will enable it to compete for projects with United Kingdom companies?

Mr. Garel-Jones: I can set my hon. Friend's mind at rest on that: no funding flows directly from these articles.

Mr. Cash: We have already touched on the pit closure programme and the fact that under the European Community coal and steel regulations the former Competition Commissioner, Sir Leon Brittan, recently approved a DM3·3 billion deal between the power generators in Germany and Germany's highly subsidised coal industry. We are given to understand that this exemption was to last for as much as 100 years.

Against that background, the President of the Board of Trade recently went to Brussels, apparently to get clearance for the arrangments that he would like to make to fit in with the White Paper on the pit closure programme that the Government are about to produce. The Government are in a fix over that programme, which includes a pit at Trentham in a constituency neighbouring mine. The trouble is that the RWE—the biggest energy producer in Germany—intends through its subsidiary to sell steam coal to our power generators, in direct competition with British mines which are to be closed by the Government. That cannot make any kind of sense for the future of British energy. It appears—why else would the President of the Board of Trade be going to Brussels to get clearance?—that all that is tied up with European energy policy.

Mr. Denzil Davies: The hon. Gentleman is on to a good point. Another important point is that the Commission will also heavily subsidise the metallurgical coal industry in Germany.

Mr. Cash: That is one of the problems that we are up against. As I put it to the President of the Board of Trade when I had a meeting with him, had the arrangements for dealing with expensive and heavily subsidised coals in Germany been dealt with as part of the Maastricht negotiations, our energy users would not have been put at a competitive disadvantage by the DM3·3 billion deal approved by Sir Leon Brittan under the European energy policy. I heard the Minister say that there is no question of a subsidy under the energy and coal policy, but unfortunately—I imagine that he will be able to address the point—subsidies are made to the German coal industry, if not under Maastricht, certainly under the European Coal and Steel Community regime.

Those matters should have been ironed out in the negotiations. As with the CAP, so with this. One of the points about the treaty to which I object is the fact that there was a lack of proper negotiation, because both the CAP fund and the energy policy should have been sorted out as a quid pro quo for other things. British industry is being penalised, leading to RWE and others making bids for our coal mines. The 31,000 British miners whose jobs are at risk are being thrown out of work while German miners are being subsidised through both German and European subsidies. [Interruption.]

It is all very well for the hon. Member for Harrow, East to titter occasionally in a rather irrelevant and trivial way, but those matters are of great concern to many people and many hon. Members, as was shown by the debate on the pit closure programme only a few weeks ago, which is shortly to be repeated. It is important for us to understand why the matters were not solved in the run-up to Maastricht so that we are still saddled with them.

Mr. Calum Macdonald (Western Isles): The hon. Gentleman's argument is paradoxical. For the past 10 years, we have been hearing from the Conservative party that subsidies are profoundly destructive of economic efficiency and competitiveness. Accordingly, the hon. Gentleman should be delighted that the Germans are subsidising their coal industry. It is his argument that that will undermine the German economy. The hon. Gentleman should be asking the Germans to load on subsidies. Has he finally rumbled that public investment promotes economic efficiency and development in Germany and other countries?

1.30 am

Mr. Cash: I take my hat off to the hon. Gentleman for his ingenuity.

It is my argument that the scale of the subsidies and their historical input to the German coal industry is doing enormous damage to our energy users, including those in the consitituency of the hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald). Irrespective of the superficial nature of the hon. Gentleman's remarks, it should be borne in mind that unfair competition is costing British industry a great deal and is tending to put people in his constituency, and in others, out of work. He should bear that in mind.

We buy electricity at off-peak times from France via underwater cables. I understand that, under the Maastricht treaty, Brussels will be able to intervene. Under the treaty, those who are opposed to nuclear-generated power, such as the French electricity suppliers, will be able to stop the sale of that power to Britain. Scotland has a surplus of electricity, which it sells to England. Under the Maastricht treaty, Brussels will be able to intervene on that as well. Our arrangements are already set up, and I believe that as much as 10 per cent. of our electricity supplies come from the French nuclear industry.

Under my constituency, there are about 300 million tonnes of coal running from the Trentham pit, yet it is one of the 10 that are to be closed. I and many others would claim that it is viable. We are, however, entering into a system with more dirigisme, interventionism and subsidies, which will do immense damage to our indigenous energy supplies and to those who work in the coal industry, not to mention all the ancillary industries such as the manufacture of coal-mining equipment. To my mind, things will be made worse by the interventionist, dirigiste, slush-fund politics that is contained in the Maastricht treaty.

British Telecom, like British Gas, is a privatised industry. It competes effectively within Europe and worldwide. Telecommunication companies co-operate—it is in their mutual interests to do so—within Europe and in the world as a whole. What benefit would there be to cable and satellite communications if the provisions of the Maastricht treaty were to be implemented? I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister of State will respond to my question.

[Mr. Cash]

Can my right hon. Friend give us an assurance or undertaking that, under article 129, air travel throughout Europe will be truly competitive?

Sir Teddy Taylor: Never.

Mr. Cash: Precisely.

The present protectionist policies will no doubt persist. It is cheaper to fly from London to New York than to many of the European capitals. In other words, we are presented with a range of potential advantages, so it is claimed—aspirations to greater degrees of competitiveness—but how realistic is it all?

Mr. Garel-Jones: I wish to be helpful, and to remind my hon. Friend again that no funding flows directly from these articles.

Mr. Cash: I hope that my right hon. Friend is not trying to dodge the issue of cohesion and structural funds. I remember meeting him before the Maastricht treaty was signed, when he said in as many words that there would not be any cohesion fund, or that it was highly improbable that there would be one. He said that there would be a fight against it. It was that sort of language. We now have the cohesion fund—under which, at Edinburgh, a little noticed provision gave a substantial amount of additional funding for eastern Germany. I think that it was about 18 billion ecu.

The Chairman: Order. Was that money for transport, telecommunications or energy?

Mr. Cash: With respect, Mr. Morris, the relationship of the cohesion fund to trans-European networks——

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman appears to have some difficulty communicating. It either was or it was not. I suspect that it was not, so I should be grateful if he would return to the amendments.

Mr. Cash: The cohesion fund is not specifically——

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman does not have to tell me what the cohesion fund is; I am well aware of that. I also note that that subject comes further down the Order Paper. For the moment, I should like the hon. Gentleman to stay with the subjects of transport, telecommunications and energy.

Mr. Cash rose——

Sir Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Is my hon. Friend aware that article 129c states specifically:

"the Community may also contribute, through the Cohesion Fund to be set up no later than 31 January 1993 . . . to the financing of specific projects"?

Quite apart from transport money, the article is specific, clear and concise in its reference to cohesion fund money. Therefore, any suggestion that a great deal of cash is not involved not only misleads the House—[Interruption.] Hon. Members may laugh, but I ask them to think about the poor people of Britain who are already paying too much and who will now pay more——

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) was referring to eastern Germany and the cohesion fund. I asked a simple question—was that related to transport, telecommunications or energy? If it was, his remarks might have been in order; if it was not, they would not have been. We then moved to a debate about the cohesion fund and the poor people of Britain.

Mr. Cash: It is not a question of whether it may or may not be, or whether you, Mr. Morris, may or may not suspect that it is relevant—I am telling you, with respect, that article 129c states:

"the Community may also contribute, through the Cohesion Fund to be set up no later than 31 December 1993 pursuant to Article 130d, to the financing of specific projects in Member States in the area of transport infrastructure."

Mr. Garel-Jones: Perhaps I could help the House. My hon. Friends the Members for Stafford (Mr. Cash) and for Southend, East (Sir Teddy Taylor) are right about article 129c——

Sir Teddy Taylor: My right hon. Friend said that there was no money.

Mr. Garel-Jones: If my hon. Friend will try to calm down for one moment, I can tell him that under title XII —trans-European networks—no money flows directly from articles 129b, 129c. Those articles lay down the guidelines within which a project might take place and which might then, if approved—this is where my hon. Friend is right—be financed through the cohesion fund. I think that there has been some misunderstanding on that point.

Mr. Cash: Between ourselves and you, Mr. Morris, we have established that my remarks are relevant. Of course I understand that you want us to stay within the framework of the debate. I am doing so, and I have no reason not to pursue my points.

Mr. Gyles Brandreth (City of Chester): People in my constituency are excited about article 129c. They are looking forward to the possibility of the cohesion fund making an impact on the electrification of the railway from Crewe to Holyhead, because of the important connection between Ireland and the remainder of the continent of Europe. That is an example of where we hope that, in time, funds may flow directly from article 129c to help people in my constituency, which is why they are so enthusiastic about it.

Mr. Cash: I am delighted to hear that, but I am not sure that right hon. and hon. Members ought to be enthusiastic at the thought that this country will qualify for cohesion funds. The principle to which my hon. Friend referred is based on the assumption that our gross domestic product has sunk to the level of countries such as Portugal and Greece.

Mr. Brandreth: And perhaps Ireland.

Mr. Cash: My hon. Friend's constituency is so near Ireland that he has no doubt reached the conclusion that, with these provisions, they are almost indivisible.

Mr. Salmond: Looking at the course of the United Kingdom's enconomy, is it not reasonable to assume that the United Kingdom will qualify on the criteria in question?

Mr. Cash: No one can say for sure, because we have not reached the point in 1996 when, if the treaty is enacted, the convergence conditions are likely to be applied. At this moment in time, it is not a happy state of affairs to find that we are heading towards qualifying for cohesion funds. That is not something that we should greet with much enthusiasm, because it shows the dire economic straits in which our country finds itself. The reason is that we got ourselves locked in to an exchange rate mechanism that led to untold trouble.

However, I will not be tempted down that route, because I am sure that you, Mr. Morris, would be the first to point out that we shall have ample opportunity to discuss that aspect later. Despite your suspicions now and again, I have every intention of staying within the rules of order.

Sir Teddy Taylor: So that the constituents of my hon. Friend the Member for the City of Chester (Mr. Brandreth) are not disappointed, will my hon. Friend make it abundantly clear that, sadly, Britain will pay a lot of money into the cohesion fund but is unlikely to get anything out of it? Regrettably, therefore, there will be even less money available to help the constituents of my hon. Friend the Member for the City of Chester. Should they not be warned of that sad situation?

Mr. Cash: I am sure that they will take on board my hon. Friend's remarks. It is a sad situation, and it is directly related to Britain being locked into the exchange rate mechanism. It was a disaster, but, thank God, we managed to get out of it—although I noted with great concern that that may not necessarily be for more than one year. I found that very worrying.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Perhaps I may try to be helpful again. My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) is right. When my hon. Friend meant to talk about the structural fund—I have done this myself—he referred to the cohesion fund. The cohesion fund is for poorer countries, but my hon. Friend will be relieved to learn, as I was, that, once any framework decision is taken under the articles in question, any decision to spend under the cohesion fund would be by unanimity, whereas spending under the structural fund would be by qualified majority voting.

Mr. Cash: As my right hon. Friend knows, the structural fund has substantially increased over the past few years. That is yet another example of the social engineering that is under way in Europe. One difficulty is that there is neither the will, the capacity, not the ability to pay over many of the funds.

Promises were made—of the kind that will no doubt arise in relation to transport policy, and of the kind found in article 109c—in relation to Ireland. They might well be found wanting. Ireland was promised 6 billion ecu, if not more, in a deal—if not as a bribe—to go along with the Maastricht arrangements. There must be significant doubts in the minds of many people in Eire today about whether it will get that money.

At the same time, in relation to transport and trans-European networks, a question arises in respect of cohesion fund moneys being pumped into the eastern part of Germany under the Edinburgh agreement. In my view, Chancellor Kohl emerged victorious from the Edinburgh summit, on all counts.

Germany is now investing massively in eastern Europe. About 85 per cent. of all foreign investment in such countries as Czechoslovakia and Hungary is derived from moneys made payable for transport, energy grids and so forth. However, it has not invested in eastern Germany on the scale required to deal with its problems. There is a clear imbalance. Owing to the complete failure of the one-for-one policy pursued by Chancellor Kohl—against the advice of Karl Otto Pöhl, the president of the Bundesbank at the time of reunification—our taxpayers are now paying the price of the increased investment, along with the additional cohesion funds for eastern Germany.

Meanwhile, German bankers and industrialists investing in transport, energy and all the trans-European networks are feeding into the new economic hegemony —which is well known to Ministers in such countries as Czechoslovakia, even if it is not known to Ministers in this country. Under the ERM and the introduction of high interest rates in Germany, our taxpayers and mortgage holders are effectively subsidising arrangements in eastern Europe, whose profits will go back to German companies.

Let me now turn to the markets in road, rail, air, telephones, gas, electricity and so forth.

Mr. Macdonald: It may not be a one-way transfer. Contrary to what the Minister blandly said, the cohesion funds are not simply for the poorer members of the Community. According to the protocol on economic and social cohesion,

"financial contributions to projects in the fields of ... trans-European networks in Member States will be paid to those States with a per capita GNP of less than 90 per cent. of the Community average".

On present economic trends, and with the devaluation of the pound, we might well qualify in the mid-1990s.

Mr. Cash: The other day the hon. Gentlemen put up a strong defence of the Maastricht treaty, to which he is plainly dedicated. None the less, a number of questions, which present a number of difficulties, remain unanswered. It is all very well to draft provisions that look good on paper; the question is whether the practical will, the ability and the capacity exist to deliver those provisions.

One of the dangers is that some of the poorer countries' expectations are being raised. They are being shown a vision of magnificent road and telecommunications systems; they are being led to believe that they will be uplifted and turned into modern economies like the northern industrial countries. The truth is that they will not; furthermore, the dashing of their expectations may well lead to greater instability within Europe than many people have predicted. There is nothing worse than giving —through promises and assurances on a piece of paper —an impression that will not be delivered in practice, particularly if the nations involved are already at a low threshold.

Sir Teddy Taylor: In fairness to the people of Skye, the Hebrides and the island of Arran, would it not be very unwise—perhaps even misleading—to give the impression that all their problems involving ferries and bridges will be solved by this wonderful new slush fund, when it is clear that—sadly—nothing will come out of it unless by some remote chance the economy goes down to such a degree that we might qualify for the cohesion funds? Would it not be better for the Government to warn the people of Benbecula, the Hebrides and the island of Arran that cohesion fund money will mean less, not more, money for Scotland and the rest of the United Kingdom? Would that not be more careful, honest and appropriate?

Mr. Cash: I very much agree. There are people in the Hebrides who have been promised money for infrastructure projects, a promise that may turn out to be unjustified. The provisions give the impression, subject to the point that I made about project viability, that money will be given for these projects. The hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) made a lot of play of the people in the north of Scotland, but I hope that he will have the honesty to admit that it by no means follows that they will be able to get the money for infrastructure projects that is implied in the language that is used. It may not be followed through in policies.

Mr. Wilson: It is becoming a caricature of what went before to suggest that anyone made any such promises. What I suggested was that there are no grounds for assumptions, but nor are there grounds for the paranoia that the hon. Gentleman so ably epitomises. People know that the policies of the United Kingdom Government have left them with the unwanted high-toll Skye bridge, and that European structural funds have provided them with financial support for improved communications and ferry services. People are well able to evaluate the relative trust that should be placed in the Government, compared with the European Community's interest in peripheral areas.

Mr. Cash: There is a problem with setting out on a piece of paper what could or might be done. The question is whether it is practicable, whether it will be delivered, who will pay for it and who will benefit? Who will be the gainers and losers? A practical analysis, an audit of the manner in which it will be done, would have been preferable, before these pieces of paper were prepared, with the draftsman sitting down and writing it out.

Mr. Cash: I see that I am exciting some interest on the Opposition Benches, so I shall give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing).

Mr. Spearing: Politically that is not so, Mr. Morris. Does the hon. Gentleman not agree that the real position is that, although Scotland and the Highlands and Islands have been dealt with disgracefully by the Government——

Mr. Harris: Disgracefully?

Mr. Spearing: Yes, disgracefully. They may have been dealt with, for the time being, with some liberality by the Council of Ministers, but if the British people feel at the end of this Parliament that the Conservative Government should be turned out and the EC's liberality ceases, the people of the Highlands and Islands and the rest of Britain will have no power to do anything about the people in Brussels, will they?

Mr. Cash: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. The setting up of a new competence in this area means that the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) is advocating personal responsibility for the decisions that he takes in the House with respect to the competences that are to be handed over to the European Community. There will be anger in his part of the world if there is no delivery. How on earth will he be able to deliver those policies within the centralised arrangements that are to be set up?

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my hon. Friend realise that we are now moving into an area where Opposition Members will blame this Parliament and this Government for failures that were never intended but which can be used to discredit this Parliament and the Conservative Government and cause a political reaction in Scotland that is in their interests and not in the United Kingdom's?

Mr. Cash: My hon. Friend makes an extremely good point. At the heart of these provisions is pessimism, economic defeatism and an abdication of responsibility, whereby powers are handed to people who are so remote that there will be no compensation from any member of the European Parliament. Maastricht is not merely raising people's expectations with an utterly misleading prospectus but, even worse, it is an abdication of responsibility. Ministers know perfectly well that they will not be able effectively to influence many policies.

Some hon. Members tell us that we shall be better able to influence on the inside than on the outside, but I should be interested to see their reaction when they are out-voted and do not get what they were expecting or had promised their constituents.

Mr. Salmond: On the question where anger will be directed, does the hon. Gentleman believe that the 25,000 people who rallied in Edinburgh on 12 December showed the extent of the concern about the lack of Democracy in Scotland? Will he contrast that with the 1,000 people who rallied in Trafalgar square at the weekend? Does he accept that, on a rough calculation, the people of Scotland are 250 times more concerned about the lack of democracy in Scotland than the people who rallied in Trafalgar square about the Maastricht Bill?

Mr. Cash: I was in Scotland at that time, and was thoroughly impressed by the 25,000 people who turned out. That was an arrangement that the hon. Gentleman and his friends had been working towards for many years, whereas the issue whether there should be a vote on a referendum in the House arose only a few days ago. I believe that recent opinion polls showing that 75 per cent. of the public want a referendum will be translated into action.

There are markets for road, rail, air, telephones, gas, electricity and so on, but some countries have open and competitive markets, whereas others do not. In some countries, the market is distorted by Governments with protectionist regulations, subsidies and unfair competition. Far from removing that distortion and creating a level playing field, Maastricht promotes further unfair regulation and subsidy.

The European Community's proposal for a pan-European telecommunications market, presented in the Green Paper on the development of the common market in telecommunications services and equipment, is aimed at reducing the influence of national, public, postal and telecommunications bureaucracies on certification; but it is not working. I should be delighted if the Minister could tell me that the vastly inflated, subsidised, bloated nationalised telecommunications industries in Germany and elsewhere are operating under those putative arrangements. The plain fact is that they are not, and the Government know it, but we are being taken in on a promise of what might be regarded as a dream or an aspiration that things will change.

That brings me to the issue of public procurement and publicly subsidised industries. Will there be a change in the 2 per cent. subsidy for trans-boundary contracts in the public sector? Will the countries that apparently will provide us with this wonderful new market recognise reality? Will these great aspirations work? The evidence is extremely thin and, at the moment, I know of nothing to suggest that the telecommunications industry will be opened up as promised. This part of the Maastricht treaty is based on a figment of the imagination, but it is on paper, and I shall be interested to know whether many of the proposals will come to fruition.

There is nothing inherently good about networks being interconnected and interoperable, whether at the European or any other level. There may be circumstances in which, for reasons of security of supply, efficiency or cost, such interconnection should exist, but it does not follow as an axiomatic principle. There may be practical reasons for it in some cases, but there is a world of difference between that and prescribing it as a rule of law in all circumstances. It is that socialist engineering, that dirigisme, to which I profoundly object.

2 am

Mr. Wilson: I am fascinated by that concept. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the only people who do not think that it is a good idea to have interconnections between systems are those who do not wish to be connected to the systems? If he regards it as a term of abuse to say that socialists wish to be connected to other people by all means at our disposal, it is an affront with which we are easily able to live.

Mr. Cash: I should be much more impressed by the hon. Gentleman's argument if we were not having to pay for that great panoramic view, the three-dimensional transport infrastructure policy of which he is so fond.

Mr. Quentin Davies: I have been having great difficulty —not for the first time—in following my hon. Friend's logic. He says that he is against public subsidy to industry and against public protectionism in procurement for nationalised industries. We are all against such things, but they have existed for a long time, long before the single market and Maastricht. They have long been a distortion of trade and an obstacle to our sales abroad.

Now, for the first time, things are changing: there has been a public procurement directive, and Sir Leon Brittan has been successful in reducing public subsidies—he has got back billions of pounds from Renault. My hon. Friend is incorrect about telecommunications monopolies. The Bundespost has been broken up and Deutsche Telekom has been set up—they are real improvements. Is it not more than a little perverse to spend a long time complaining about a range of evils but then to reject, without comment, all the tremendous attempts that have been made in the treaty and as part of the single market to do something about them for the first time?

Mr. Cash: The problem with what my hon. Friend is saying—he was not in the Chamber at the time, so I shall not hold it against him—is that the ex-Commissioner for competition, Sir Leon Brittan, has just agreed a DM3·3 million deal between the power generators and the German coal industry. There is a tremendous problem with subsidies and public procurement, which is not working as well as my hon. Friend suggests. We are still at a very low threshold.

Sir Teddy Taylor: In case my hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding (Mr. Davies) gets too excited, will my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) remind us that the Prime Ministers of countries such as Spain, the Republic of Ireland and many others returned from Edinburgh saying that they had billions of pounds more in subsidies? If he considers the EC's current expenditure, agreed before the Edinburgh agreement, he will find that increases in spending are planned, most of which will go on subsidies of more than one third between now and 1999. Does he agree that any Conservative Member of Parliament who thinks that Maastricht will mean less subsidy is kidding himself. He should look at the figures and at what all the leaders said when they went back from Edinburgh.

Mr. Cash: It is slightly depressing to find my hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding (Mr. Davies) advocating the policy of subsidisation on such a scale, which is effectively what he is saying. He is giving comfort to those who will milk the British taxpayer. We are the second greatest contributor to the EC.

There are circumstance, on a selective basis, in which some of the arrangements may be justified. However, the scale envisaged by the arrangements is vast and the extent of fraud that goes with it is dramatic. The figure is estimated to be £6 billion a year by the Court of Auditors. I recommend my hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding to read the reports by the Court of Auditors, because I doubt whether he has. The amount being thrown away is staggering——

Mr. Quentin Davies rose——

Mr. Cash: Much of the money—[Interruption.] I notice that the Minister is threatening my hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding in his typical way. I think that he has forgotten that he is about to be no longer Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, by his own wish. He is certainly no longer the Deputy Chief Whip. It is slightly depressing to find that my hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding is such a strong advocate of policies that I should have expected more to come from the Opposition.

Mr. Stephen Milligan (Eastleigh): My hon. Friend the member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) talks about the importance of the Court of Auditors and of proper financial controls. Would he take this occasion to welcome the arrangements elsewhere in the treaty which strengthen the Court of Auditors, strengthen parliamentary control, and make it more likely that British taxpayers' money will be well spent by the Community?

Mr. Cash: I should certainly be far more enthusiastic about the idea of the Court of Auditors having greater supervision if I did not know that the chairman of the Court of Auditors, Mr. Carey—as the hon. Member for Newham, South knows—has very grave reservations about the direction in which all this is going. He has expressed himself in a letter, and I believe that the hon. Member for Newham, South has a copy, because it has been circulated to me as well.

One must not be too starry-eyed about the way in which the Court of Auditors has gone or is going. The fraud is on a massive scale. The £6 billion hole to which I referred is a significant underestimate, as we were told by members of the Court of Auditors when we went to see them. That money is British taxpayers' money which is going down the drain.

Mr. Salmond: I have been listening to the hon. Gentleman for more than an hour, and very entertaining it has been. I am getting rather worried, because there is no doubt that he is cracking up—that is, his voice is cracking up, because of a cold, perhaps. Might not it be a good idea at this stage for the hon. Gentleman to save his strength for some of the big debates to come? Perhaps he could pass on the torch to some of his hon. Friends. If he is not able to do that, perhaps he could give me an ETA on his speech.

Mr. Cash: I should be glad to do so. I am looking in the direction of my hon. Friend the Member for Worcestershire, South (Mr. Spicer) in the hope that he will be able to take over in a minute.

There is no need for Community involvement in the pan-European transport projects, however big. The three prime examples would be the airbus programme, the European fighter aircraft programme and, in many respects, the channel tunnel. All are intergovernmental and intercompany ventures in which Community involvement is marginal. If trans-European networks are desirable, it does not follow that the Community should necessarily have any role in their development. These provisions are just socialist aspirations flowing out of the paperwork without regard to the realities and necessities of the EC as it has been for many years.

The main brake on the development of intra-European transport networks is national protection and subsidy. Hon. Members should look at Air France and at Iberia International. Contributing to the development of transport infrastructures, whatever that means, would involve further subsidy and interference, with an associated distortion of competition.

With our privatisation programmes, our insistence on value for money, practical considerations and choices that are relevant to the marketplace, the Conservative party is supposed to have eschewed all those ideas. We are going through the Maastricht treaty backwards. We are adopting a range of proposals that I thought that we had eschewed and given up. I did not think that we were going in that direction. Effectively, we are being taken down a route that I thought had been discarded in the mid-1970s.

Mr. Bill Walker: With regard to subsidies and competition in respect of airlines, my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) and the Committee will be interested to learn that, at a recent Brussels conference on open skies, the new Commissioner was unwilling to answer any questions and the representative from the Commission would not answer direct questions on subsidies to Iberia and competition with British airlines. It was noticeable that the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North had some difficulty dealing with that point.

Mr. Cash: National flag carriers are notoriously nationalistic. There are serious problems, and I hope that our Ministers will be able to break them down in negotiations. However, I doubt whether they will be able to do that because there are massive vested interests involved. The proposals and the new competencies will simply make the problems worse. Worse than that, they will encapsulate them into a legal framework that will not work. It is improper and wrong to expect judges to take decisions in relation to such matters.

The telecommunications operators and equipment suppliers are well managed, capitalised and profitable. Why, for heaven's sake, should the British taxpayer be involved in subsidising France Telecom, Deutsche Telecom, Telefonica, GEC, Seimens and Co. as they have moved into the new arena prescribed under the new trans-European telecommunications proposals?

Mr. Quentin Davies: My hon. Friend has not done his homework tonight as well has he often does it. He has just recounted a list which is a complete mix-up of telecommunications utilities and manufacturers of telecommunications equipment. Telefonica is a subsidiary, while Siemens is a manufacturer of equipment. There is no question of supplying any kind of support, even in the form of feasibility studies and so forth, for manufacturers of equipment.

I want to raise an essential point that my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) has missed. The treaty provides for a small increase—0.1 per cent.—in the own resources of the Community. However, a much greater reduction in national subsidies to industry has been brought about by the single market programme and other initiatives in connection with Maastricht. On a net basis, there are far fewer subsidies and distortions to trade as a result of subsidies than was the case. This initiative is the first time that we have been able to make real inroads into Europe and the protectionist procurement policies which my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford is right to say have caused us great economic damage in the past. I hope that my hon. Friend recognises the hopeful way forward.

Mr. Cash: Following on from the point made by my hon. Friend, I would be more than happy to check what he has just said about those companies. However, most merchant banks would be more than happy to underwrite rights issues of those organisations. It has yet to be shown that those issues have been less than satisfactory in respect of the proposals in the treaty.

At the end of the day, we want highly profitable, well organised, privately owned companies to provide the best possible arrangements for the consumer. Drawing them into highly directed, centralised telecommunications competence of the kind that is contained in the treaty bodes very ill for the future of telecommunications. The matter is based on the concept of Euro-champions—that somehow or other we will effectively improve the quality of R and D, or whatever, by aggregating on a Euro-champion basis the facilities that are made available on a European continental basis. It is not ncessarily such a good idea in theory, and I am quite sure that it is not going to work in practice.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Surely my hon. Friend will say something about the astonishing statement by our hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding (Mr. Davies) that the Bill adds only 0·1 per cent. to the expenditure of the EC. What on earth were the Government of the Republic of Ireland, for example, doing during the referendum, telling the people that the money from Europe was going to double because of Maastricht? What was the Prime Minister of Spain doing when he came back from Edinburgh, saying that there would be an increase of billions of pounds? Sadly, time and again, people say something about the EC, and, when it actually happens, it turns out to be horrible, nasty, costly and expensive. Has not that happened time and again, as my hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding should know?

Mr. Cash: Vicariously, my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Sir Teddy Taylor) has dealt extremely well with the point that was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding. I sincerely hope that the Maastricht treaty, or at any rate its aspirations, will be nasty, brutish and short.

On energy, we must remember that there is no national grid in the United States. There is nothing necessarily good or inherently desirable about having one in Europe. It is all to do with creating one country. Some months ago, I went to the Berlaymont and saw placards saying, "Europe, my country". That is the trans-European network that they are seeking to establish.

There are those who hope and believe—it might be honestly, and it might not be honestly, because there has been much misleading over the provisions—that we are not heading towards a unitary state. Hon. Members can go elsewhere in the Community and be under no misapprehension. There they talk a totally different language from the language that we have to endure sometimes in this country and in the pamphlets that are put out—all that talk that, somehow or other, they are going to prevent the federal tendencies or the unitary tendencies from getting a grip on this country.

In all fairness, there are hon. Members, who are honest people, who genuinely want to see a federal Europe, and who genuinely would be very happy to have one country. The transfer of powers—transport, energy, telecommunications—is part of the network that is thought to be desirable to deliver the infrastructure of that federal arrangement of that one country. I am not going to hold it against people who honestly and genuinely believe that that is a good way to go: I am just going to beg to differ. It will lead to collapse. The ERM has collapsed and interest rates rocketed up, causing immense damage to the British economy, which is leading even now to further recession and bankruptcy.

If we have emasculated the powers of the House of Commons in relation to those competences—in relation to those powers—which we cannot reclaim, if we have raised people's expectations which cannot be fulfilled, and if people in other countries have been bribed into believing that they are going to get all those glorious projects paid for and they are unfulfilled, it will simply add to the sense of anger and anguish when the collapse comes. If and when it comes, and we have committed political voluntary euthanasia, we will get rid of the framework of consent and the framework of democracy, as Jeremy Leaman pointed out in The Guardian today. It is well worth reading that article. When The Guardian contains articles stating that the proposals for monetary union and other aims are fundamentally undemocratic, Opposition Members may want to have a good look at them.

The bottom line is that an impossible dream is being created. The projects will not be fulfilled, except in the minds of Utopians. The history of Utopia is that it does not work. When it collapses, the rule of law will collapse with it. There will be no democracy to put in its place. When that happens, the political and business instability will be so great that there will be massive disorder throughout Europe. There is already evidence of that in Italy, not to mention Yugoslavia. The creation of that network and intercommunications is based on theory, not practice. The provisions should not be allowed to proceed.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): I am tempted to spend the next hour and 22 minutes giving a point-by-point rebuttal of what the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) has just said, but I shall resist that temptation. The apocalyptic—I can still say that word at 2.20 am—conclusion that he drew will not ring true in many ears in the Committee. Many of us do not identify with the sort of democratic structures of the House that the hon. Member was extolling. Some of us find this place profoundly undemocratic in the means by which its Members are elected. At least one nation of the United Kingdom is very undemocratically treated. Therefore, we do not admire the set-up that the hon. Member has spent so much time this evening and on previous occasions trying to defend.

One of the most extraordinary phrases in the hon. Gentleman's address was that he did not believe in networks. He really meant that he does not believe in networks that link us to anything the other side of the English channel. I cannot believe that the hon. Member would not wish the produce from the good people of Stafford, their manufacturing industry and the coal mined at the threatened mine in his constituency to be stuck in Stafford. No doubt the hon. Gentleman welcomes the fact that Stafford is so close to hundreds of miles of motorways and main rail lines that can take goods from Stafford to many parts of the United Kingdom. I am sure that his constituents will be only too pleased that, with the single market, they will have the advantage of being able to export their goods to other parts of the European Community.

When the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) opened the debate, he said that the articles under discussion give those of us representing districts that are not in the heart of the networks in the United Kingdom the opportunity to be linked up to receive some of the advantages that will flow from the creation of the single European market.

Unfortunately, the hon. Member for Stafford dismissed those opportunities early in his speech. If hon. Members have long enough memories, they will recall that he said that the proposals would not be viable. The hon. Gentleman wants to preserve not just a United Kingdom, but his vision of a narrow little England. I received the impression that, whether it be Cornwall in the south or the highlands and islands in the north, such regions were not of great concern to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Spearing: I have some sympathy with what the hon. Gentleman says. Does he agree that the importance of networks at any level relates to how they are created, who creates and controls them and their purpose? While I agree that many of the networks in this country, including motorways and the grid—particularly in the least populated districts—serve a purpose of mutual support, the purpose of the networks that we are discussing is eternal and destructive competition.

Mr. Wallace: I agree with some of the hon. Gentleman's generalities, but I disagree with what he says about purpose. If, as many of us want, the peoples of Europe are to come together more closely and to work together, the networks of transport and telecommunications are of fundamental importance to facilitating the working of a single market.

Mr. Macdonald: I agree with much of what the hon. Gentleman is saying. Is it not odd that Conservative Members should be arguing against greater European integration, for the sake of preserving what they see as something unique about Britain, when Britain itself is a multinational state and a creation of a political union between four different countries?

Mr. Wallace: Absolutely right. It has been a successful Union in many ways, and although we identify some of its deficiencies and want to correct them, some things cannot be measured in terms of gross domestic product. For instance, intermarriage between people from the four countries happens without anyone thinking anything of it—a real achievement. Various networks have been built up to facilitate this Union.

Article 129b states:

"Within the framework of a system of open and competitive markets, action by the Community shall aim at promoting the interconnection and inter-operability of national networks as well as access to such networks. It shall take account in particular of the need to link island, landlocked and peripheral regions with the central regions of the Community."

Those of us who represent peripheral areas of the United Kingdom and of the Community would like to home in on that.

As for the cohesion funds, I hope that the Minister of State will confirm that, under article 129c, it is not just a question of the Community contributing to funds for specific projects. That part also states that the Community "may support the financial efforts made by the Member States for projects of common interest financed by Member States, which are identified in the framework of the guidelines referred to in the first indent, particularly through feasibility studies, loan guarantees or interest rate subsidies".

In other words, there are categories of project in member states that will not be covered by cohesion funds but in respect of which guidelines can be drawn up with, one hopes, the objective of linking islands, landlocked and peripheral regions with the mainstream of Community life.

Twice a year, figures are published showing the cost of living in various parts of Scotland. Lerwick almost invariably has the highest cost of living. It is followed by Kirkwall and Stornoway—not surprisingly, these are small island areas. Whatever the issue in constituencies such as mine or that of the hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald), it always seems to come down to a matter of transport costs and transport facilities. The cost of bringing in goods has a profound impact on the cost of living; and the costs of exporting to the rest of Scotland, Great Britain and the Community are also very high. Every effort should therefore be made to reduce these costs.

I acknowledge that there are subsidies—in the case of my constituency, particularly to P and O and one or two other shipping lines that operate services to and from Orkney and Shetland, but in the past two or three years P and O in particular has faced a problem when it came to renewing its vessels—that is, with capital projects. When the Government renounced their commitment to an equivalent tariff in 1984, the then Secretary of State for Scotland, now Lord Younger of Prestwick, said that one of the reasons was that they had identified some capital projects in the pipeline. At that time, the Government were reluctant to support projects for a major refit or the purchase of a new vessel. Many people felt badly let down by that.

2.30 am

Caledonian MacBrayne is in the public sector and has been able to obtain some European assistance for vessel replacement. Because shipping services to Orkney and Shetland are in the private sector, it has not been possible to attract such European assistance. That link is like the M74, the A9 or the M6. It is the main thoroughfare linking the islands to the Scottish mainland, and it is used for the import and export of our goods. Therefore, it is not unreasonable to expect it to receive some public assistance. I hope that provisions such as the article will make it possible to formulate guidelines that will allow access to European funding for some necessary and important investments.

Last month, the Minister for Public Transport met a deputation from the four island areas which are members of the islands commission of the Committee of Peripheral and Maritime Regions in the Community. They are Orkney, Shetland, the Western Isles and the Isle of Wight. The Minister gave us a good hearing and felt that we could probably extract more if we argued on a national basis and distributed to the islands rather than proceeding to allow the islands to argue their own case. Perhaps we can debate that.

As the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North said, there is a feeling in the isles and other parts of the north of Scotland, possibly because by its nature the Community has more island and peripheral areas than the United Kingdom, that the Community is often better able to identify some of the needs. Examples of that are the integrated development programme for the Western Isles and the agricultural development programme for the other Scottish islands, which is about to end. The Community took the lead and the Government fell in behind it. A more controversial issue is decommissioning, which is important to the fishing industry in many of Scotland's peripheral areas. The Community identified the need for decommissioning and the Government took a long time to catch up. We often feel that the Community has a better idea of what is needed and articles such as the one we are debating are encouraging.

Amendment No. 130, tabled by the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow), relates to article 75. In that article, the Council, after consultations, lays down a number of measures about transport, including measures to improve transport safety. Transport safety is of particular interest in view of the events in my constituency in the past fortnight arising from the grounding of the tanker Braer in Shetland. I understand that the paper on the future development of a common transport policy says that the Community should, within and in support of the International Maritime Organisation, ensure that ships trading in Community waters respect common standards for the effective guarantee of safe operation. That is a worthy objective, and many of us would like to see much emphasis and urgency being placed on fulfilling it.

The United Kingdom Government take a number of measures unilaterally, such as the installation of radar at strategic points around the coast, while others need to be taken on an international basis. The Community should have the clout, particularly in matters affecting its own waters, to drive through some measures. Many of us who have been talking about shipping safety for some time are worried about the snail's pace at which the International Maritime Organisation moves at times.

For example, transponders could be fitted to vessels, allowing them to be tracked by satellite, as happens with international aircraft. Two years ago, when I took the matter up with the Department of Transport, I was told that this had been under discussion for some time in the IMO. Such measures should be given a push. The Community could act within the IMO to give some of them greater impetus.

Mr. Spearing: I share many of the hon. Gentleman's aspirations, but it is a matter of practicality. Does he agree that the problem with the IMO is that it is dominated by the owners and by the countries in which ships are notionally registered, whose standards we know all about? Would it not be possible for the United Kingdom Government, inside or free of the European Community, to make a multinational agreement on standards of ships that they allow into their ports, and get the north American states of Canada and the United States, and perhaps Japan as well, to agree to help to prevent problems? That would short-circuit the problem caused by the IMO, and would not confine the solution to the Community.

Mr. Wallace: I share many of the hon. Gentleman's reservations about the IMO. Its pace appears to be slowed by those who have an interest in not going forward as fast as that body should in promoting standards on the structure of vessels, the routing of vessels, navigational aids, and crewing arrangements. Those matters are best and most effectively sorted out internationally.

The European Community can carry clout that Britain acting alone would not necessarily have, not least because of the decline of our merchant fleet. If the IMO is taking too long, the Community should be prepared to introduce measures on Community waters. That would be far more effective than dealing with solely British waters. In the aftermath of Exxon Valdez, the American Government were able to introduce measures for ships on US waters, including a stringent safety regime. The Community can do that on its own if it cannot get the wider international application.

The Community also has a role within the IMO and other international organisations to push the case for safety. I am pleased that article 75 gives a specific remit to promote measures to improve transport safety. I hope that, when the treaty is passed, as I am confident that it will be, the Government will be willing to activate other measures.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) for telling the Committee that the amendment is a probing amendment tabled to allow the Committee a chance to debate important matters.

The networks articles 129b and 129c are new articles. Action could have taken under the transport articles of the treaty of Rome, as amended by the Single European Act. The new text circumscribes the actions in question—for example, to ensure interoperability. No funding flows—that was the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) rightly drew to our attention—directly from the articles, and no specific decision-making procedures are provided in them. If projects are to be funded by the cohesion fund, as they can be, such projects would be by unanimity.

That raised the question—it was taken up by the hon. Members for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) and for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace)—of the exclusion or otherwise of the outer regions and islands of the United Kingdom from the cohesion fund. My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East was right to remind the Committee that the new cohesion fund is limited to the four cohesion countries. That limitation does not apply to structural funds, and the Government have been able to protect Northern Ireland as an objective 1 region for structural funds. We actively support the claim that is being advanced by the highlands and islands for objective 1 status.

The future financing deal provides for increases in central funds both to objective 1 regions and elsewhere as well as the new cohesion fund spending. The United Kingdom regions will benefit, but under an overall settlement that we believe to be affordable. The United Kingdom received over £1 billion in 1992 from structural funds, the funds for which the constituents of the hon. Member for Western Isles would go.

Mr. Macdonald: How close is the United Kingdom now to qualifying for cohesion funds? How close are we to becoming 90 per cent. of the Community per capita average? Will the Minister of State confirm that, if we qualify according to official EC statistics in future, the Government will apply for the funds for which the United Kingdom has qualified?

Mr. Garel-Jones: I hate to disappoint the hon. Gentleman. For some hon. Members it would be a matter of some joy to be able to proclaim that Britain had sunk beneath the per capita average. On purchasing power parity, which is the basis on which these matters are decided, we remain quite a long way away from the level to which the hon. Gentleman referred. I hope that Britain does not qualify for the funds, and that, in the course of the seven-year financial perspective that we are moving into, several countries that currently qualify for cohesion funds, will cease to be cohesion countries.

Mr. Salmond: When was the most recent calculation made of purchasing-power parities on which the Minister of State is basing his remarks?

Mr. Garel-Jones: I cannot give the hon. Gentleman that precise information. It was certainly some time in the past six or seven weeks. I have seen figures that lead me to believe—the hon. Gentleman may regret this—that we are a long way from being a cohesion country.

[Mr. Garel-Jones]

The Community already has the power under the treaty of Rome to fund infrastructure projects through the provisions in the transport chapter and by use of structural funds. I was surprised that my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) said that he could see no place for the Community in transport matters. He will recall that the fourth title of the treaty of Rome, as amended by the Single European Act, contains no fewer than six or seven articles that relate to this very subject.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Will my right hon. Friend explain the differences that will be experienced because of article 129 in the operation of the principle of additionality? We in the United Kingdom understood that the principle gave decisions on priorities to our Government and not to Brussels, the Council of Ministers or the Commission. It is confusing when almost every Opposition Member gives the impression that Brussels will make decisions now on the construction of roads and bridges. Are we to abandon the principle of additionality because of article 129? It would be helpful to the Committee to know whether decision-making is being transferred from the United Kingdom Government to Brussels.

Mr. Garel Jones: Article 129b and c allows the Council of Minsters to decide the framework within which any action would be taken. Then, if that action is agreed, applications might be made through the cohesion fund for cohesion countries and through the structural fund for other countries.

Mr. Cash: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

2.45 am

Mr. Garel-Jones: No, I will not. My hon. Friend took one hour and 20 minutes of the time of the House. I want to be brief to allow other hon. Members to speak.

It is useful to clarify the purpose of such projects and the means by which they might be adopted in a clear treaty chapter, as agreed at Maastricht. That explicitly states, for example, that guidelines and projects of common interest that relate to the territory of a member state shall require the approval of the member state concerned. That is a useful safeguard, which the House will welcome. Of course, Community action must take place within the framework of an open, competitive market and must take account of the potential economic viability of any project. It is helpful that, where there is already European co-operation, the matter has been clarified and codified in that way. I am glad that most hon. Members who have spoken, with the exception of my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford have welcomed that provision.

Mr. Spearing: I have a good deal of sympathy with my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson). I am sorry that he is about to leave the Chamber. I wanted to refer to him—[Interruption.] I am glad to catch his ear before he leaves. He and his compatriot, the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace), have an intense and proper regard for local communities. We all do, but the local communities in Scotland are even more distinct than those in some parts of England. As an Englishman and a Londoner, I want firmly to register that fact. However, for reasons that I am about to give, I do not think that the benefits that my hon. Friend, the hon. Gentleman and their constituents want and deserve will, in the end, come from the source that they believe they will.

Of course, during the past 10 years there has been a marked disparity between the resources and the approach of two political centres. That caused the demonstration by 25,000 people in Edinburgh at the time of the summit. I well understand that. I have to say to Conservative Members, some of whom I agree with on the question of the constitution, that the Government have dealt disgracefully with some of our friends in Scotland—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) appears to disagree. He should get up and say so because this House is about debate. The Government have transgressed one of the major features that we prize—paying due regard to the minority.

As I understand it, Scotland is a country of high corporate sensitivities. It is a country with its own distinctive history, tradition and political and civic pride. Those have been trampled underfoot by forces which need not have done what they did. That has caused a great deal of bad feeling, as some of my friends in the TUC may have noticed.

Networks is, I suppose, an abstract word. It is more an adjective than a noun, in the context of this group of amendments. Networks permit exchanges of all sorts—a transfer in one direction or another. That can be a transfer of money, goods or persons, energy, or intelligence.

Mr. Phil Gallie (Ayr): The hon. Gentleman suggested that I, as a Scot, have been trampled on in recent times. I submit that Scotland's network systems are second to none. We have very good systems. The hon. Gentleman referred to energy. We have over-provision, with excellent networks which are ready to transfer south. Our road systems are reasonably good, as are our interchanges between cities. I do not feel trampled on. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will expand on that observation.

Mr. Spearing: I was not speaking of network but, as the hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members in all parts of the Committee who represent Scottish constituencies make plain from time to time, of the poll tax, for example —on which, in Scotland, the views of the people were clearly made known.

The networks in Scotland of which the hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Gallie) speaks probably serve many of the people well. I stand to be corrected by hon. Members who represent Scottish constituencies and who know Scotland better than I do.

I intervened on the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland to make the point that an electricity network—whether it covers the Scottish highlands, and whether it is based on hydropower, generated power in the lowlands, or is part of a national grid for the United Kingdom—is of general benefit to all.

The electricity network was pioneered by the House 50 or 60 years ago. The idea was that those who benefited from being part of a tightly-knit population would contribute to those living in the peripheral areas. Is that not one of the characteristics of many networks created by the House, which may be permitted—though, I suggest, for another purpose—by the other political body that the treaty sustains and enhances?

Although we are not debating agriculture, I will mention the milk network in passing. The economics of transporting and distributing milk were poor, and the milk network has worked to the benefit of both the peripheral farmer and the peripheral consumer.

The postal services also are a form of transport—the transport of intelligence, by way of letters, and of parcels. We know how important are the economic activities of certain peripheral areas—I refer in particular to the production of delicacies and high-value goods—and of the reliance that they place on postal services. I am happy that there should be a transfer of resources, which the Post Office often advertises in a romantic way, between those of us who live in the cities, where letters and parcels can be conveyed within a tightly integrated network, and peripheral areas all over the place. I include the south-west peninsula—and I see the hon. Member for St. Ives nodding his head.

Such benign networks are under the control of the community as a whole. They are created for the benefit of the community, and generally they work well. I understand the feelings of the people of the Scottish highlands and islands. In the past hour or so we have heard only one Welsh and one English speaker. All the others were Scottish. I understand why they are so concerned about bridges, ferries, roads, and tolls. In transport terms, geographical distance often coincides with economic distance; but it does not always do so. Economic distance in terms of actual movement, leaving aside the time factor —although that is sometimes an important commodity, within limits—is not necessarily geographical distance.

If market forces are introduced into the equation, geographical distance—say, between London and Paris, or between London and Brussels—will often be reduced in terms of economic time, because of the volume of traffic. The peripheral areas will tend to be at a disadvantage if we allow market forces free rein. It would be possible to run train services from Glasgow, Edinburgh and Aberdeen, but no doubt some areas in the rural regions west of Aberdeen would regard themselves as peripheral. That is true of areas other than Scotland.

I am trying to prove the point that I put to the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland. It is not a question of networks themselves or even, necessarily, how they are funded; I am talking about the purpose for which they are designed. All the examples that I have given recently are of benign networks, although one has been the subject of some humour in Scotland. There is a very old joke, or rather a paraphrase of a psalm: "The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof, but the Highlands and Islands are MacBrayne's." The network run by that firm and its modern counterpart, Caledonian MacBrayne, which has been mentioned today, could be run at a loss. It could be run with some subsidy, as are some British Rail branch lines. What is the difference, in absolute economic terms, between that and a closed railway or a railway which is given some form of subsidy for its infrastructure, or for viaducts or tunnels—on a national network, that is? I am glad to see that the Minister for Public Transport, the right hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman), is here. In economic or network terms, in terms of service to the community—the British community, rather than the European Community—clear principles link all these matters. In terms of infrastructure and the expensive replacement of capital resources, the Caledonian MacBrayne network, for instance, is surely similar to that of a railway.

The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland cited the Government's parsimony in replacing some capital ships owned by P and O to service Orkney and Shetland. I was thinking of such instances when the hon. Member for Ayr intervened a few moments ago. I will give an extreme example. One of the dependencies still left to this country is St. Helena. Not long ago, a Select Committee of the House had a lengthy discussion about a replacement ship for St. Helena. That is an example of this country's providing a dependency with a capital sum for a super-peripheral area. If a map of the world were drawn, showing how difficult it was to travel to certain places by public means, St. Helena would probably feature prominently: I believe that it takes about a fortnight to get there if the boat connects, and about two months if the connection is missed. I am glad to see that the Foreign Secretary, too, is present. The purpose of the networks, including that for St. Helena, and the shipping which might be subsidised, but probably is not by this Government, is to serve people and communities. Not too much concern is expressed about how to assist the peripheries. We may, however, want to assist them.

3 am

The articles of this treaty and those of the treaty of Rome make it clear that competition, the free movement of capital and people, and maximum protection can be achieved by free market forces. Therefore, the assistance that the networks can give will increase competition and allow the strong to become stronger. The disadvantaged will therefore become weaker. They are often at the peripheries. Those hon. Members who represent peripheral areas are being misled into thinking that the networks will be their salvation.

Article 129c states that the Community

"may support the financial efforts made by the Member States for projects of common interest".

What is the common interest? I hope that the Minister will tell the Committee what that phrase means. Does it mean the common interest of the Community and not the common interest of the member state? If so, it qualifies the purposes for which European Community money can be used.

If no state money is provided for any network project, I understand that the project is ruled out by the European Community. I take it that the phrase "financed by Member States" means some form of public assistance from the Government of the member state concerned.

That brings me to last week's topic: the railways and the Government's proposed link from the United Kingdom to the rest of the Community. In an intervention on the fast channel link, the Minister said that the bulk of the investment for the link will come from private funds. There will be some Government money, no doubt. Without it, there would be no Community contribution. I suppose that there could be some justification for such a contribution, though I do not imagine that the fact that £X million was to be spent improving yet another railway link from Dover to London would be welcomed in the highlands and islands.

Mr. Gallie: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the direct link from the highlands and islands via the south coast to the channel tunnel is just as important to Scotland as it is to other areas of the United Kingdom?

Mr. Spearing: I rather hope that it is. I have taken a great interest in this matter and was in the House when we were discussing it 20 years ago. Is the hon. Member aware that, at least for the time being, day trains will not run north of Waterloo? Apparently, because of market forces, which he supports, the cost of the trains is so high, with all the safety measures necessary for the tunnel, that they will have to be used intensively between Paris and London or Brussels and London. They are much too expensive to go up to Manchester, let alone Scotland. If I have got that wrong, I am sure that I shall be corrected. I think that there may be plans to deal with that later.

Mr. Freeman: My hon. Friend the Member for Ayr (Mr. Gallie) is right. The construction of a new rail link between Folkestone and London will benefit the whole of the country, and trains will run during the day and night north of London on the existing link. The Government expect those trains to be in service in 1995.

Mr. Spearing: I am grateful to the Minister; I wanted to be absolutely accurate. I take it that trains will run from Paris, Brussels or other capitals perhaps to Manchester and, we hope, as far as Glasgow or Edinburgh.

The only advantage of a link for continental freight —I suggested this 20 years ago, but nobody took much notice—would be if it were cheaper or more convenient than road transport. Let us suppose that a toll is charged to travel through the tunnel. If we instituted a standard charge, as we do for parcels, for every tonne of traffic going to a depot in Cardiff, Swansea, York, Manchester, or perhaps Aberdeen, Inverness or Fort William, that would benefit the whole country without overheating the south-east and would provide a lower cost the further north freight travelled. I do not think that anybody has suggested that, but if he had I do not think that the Government would adopt it. It is perhaps looking too far ahead, but that would surely be a benign use of a rail network.

We have been told nothing about a possible tapering of tariffs. The Union Railways line will presumably stop in London and another railway will continue northwards. I remind hon. Members that the tariff for traffic coming in will surely be the same as that for traffic going out. Britain's retail marketing efficiency has been sharply honed by Messrs Tesco, Sainsbury et al, and our retail market would be a much easier way of distributing consumer durables and a wide range of materials than anything going the other way. That is another example of what I described to my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North: if one builds a technical link for transport, it allows competition to come in as easily as it goes out unless there is a different tariff for traffic in each direction.

I shall take a little further the question of Union Railways and the link with the continent. I am glad that the Minister for Public Transport is here because he has always dealt objectively with matters as far as he can. I want to express the disappointment of, I am sure, everyone in the country that that particular network railway link which the Government are contemplating will be not a decent but an indecent railway.

I cannot contemplate how anyone looking to the future —as the Government should do, and as they often claim to do—can plan a two-line railway from London to Shorne cliff, which is to be suitable for freight and passengers, international and commuting. The Government plan to reduce the cost by making it a two-line railway with freight loops—the same technique which Victorian railway constructors used and which we thought we had got rid of.

As I understand it—the Minister will correct me if I am wrong—the Government are not even reserving sufficient land in the cuttings and tunnels for acquisition or for later construction and eventual enlargement into a four-track railway. That sometimes happens on roads where one side is dualled at a time or on bypasses where one side is developed before the other.

I am sure that the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley)—the Chairman of the Select Committee on Transport—or any rail operator would assure the House that to run an intensive, 24-hour service properly one needs a four-track main line in order to deal reasonably with breakdowns and maintenance. There is ample proof of that on the railways on Saturday nights and Sundays. A two-line main track means less flexibility. Although I concede that it may be economical for the Government to initially lay down a two-line track in this instance, it is bad planning not to provide for later expenditure on enlargement when required.

The Government have not acted efficiently and certainly not speedily. Since Lady Thatcher signed the document in Canterbury in 1985 or 1986—certainly some time ago—there have been so many changes of plan and so much delay that we have already lost any advantages that we might have gained. I say that as one who, as hon. Members will know from the case that I have been advancing, believes that such links will not necessarily be the great boon or blessing that many people believe them to be. They may be a blessing for surface traffic as opposed to air traffic. I hope that some people, including the Ministers, are looking forward to going to Brussels by surface transport instead of experiencing the difficulties of going by air. That is probably a great convenience for people, but whether it will be a great advantage in terms of trade remains to be seen.

I now turn to the whole process of obtaining moneys from the EC not only for the rail network, but for anything to do with the networks generally. I referred earlier to a report by the Select Committee on European Legislation on obtaining money. I shall quote from it more extensively because it sets out the fact that the matter is not so straightforward as people suppose. The projects in Scotland which hon. Members mentioned earlier—I have no doubt that the placards on the projects said, "Contributed to by the EC fund"—do not drop suddenly from heaven, as Ministers and some hon. Members will know. There is quite a lot to be done first.

3.15 am

Paragraph 42 of the bumper report published on 17 June 1992 summarises "Trans-European Networks". The Committee studied a Commission communication with three draft regulations

"introducing declarations of European Interest to facilitate the establishment of trans-European networks."

I referred a few moments ago to the requirement of European interest rather than of local interest. The report says that the Government

"comments that the Commission envisages granting a Declaration only to well-defined initiatives: a project must have passed the design stage and have reached a sufficient level of maturity for a relatively detailed assessment of its impact to be made, but the implementation stage proper must not yet have started."

If that is the Commission's proposal, there will be many problems.

There must be an assessment of the project's impact, and of whether it is good value for money. We can argue a great deal about the impact of a new bridge, a new ferry, a new bypass or a new ship. It will be difficult to assess projects. The next criterion is that the project must "have reached a sufficient level of maturity"

for a judgment to be made. I am not sure what that means. Does it mean a level of paper planning, or does it mean initial works? I should have thought that it was a question of paper planning rather than of initial works.

The next criterion is that

"the implementation stage proper must not yet have started."

We then have the proposal, the animal to which I have referred:

"The Commission proposes to allocate the declaration for transport projects following consultation with the existing Transport Infrastructure Committee."

The Minister will have much to reply to, but we should know whether the committee is a committee of Ministers, of officials or of the Commission. I suspect that it may be a combination of all three. No doubt the committee will have its consultants as well.

I quote again from this very important report, which consolidates three or four other documents. It says:

"At this stage, the Government sees the main question as being the roles of the Commission and Member States in awarding Declarations."

If the declaration is being gained, does the money come with it, or is the declaration only a qualifying stage before the funds available are shared out?

What lies behind the articles is a whole group of bureaucratic—perhaps that is a pejorative word—a whole group of processes which will certainly not take place in public. They should not necessarily take place in public, but it should be known that they exist.

I want now to consider the treaty. One of the amendments in the group that we are discussing would delete new article 75, which replaces an existing article in the treaty of Rome. That process involves tracing through the terms of the treaties and I want to do that now for reasons that I will make clear towards the end of my remarks.

Article 75 states:

"For the purpose of implementing Article 74, and taking into account the distinctive features of transport, the Council shall,".

The article 74 referred to is not article 74 of the treaty of European union. It is article 74 of the treaty of Rome, which the union treaty amends. Article 74 of the treaty of Rome, which is not going to change, states:

"The objectives of this Treaty shall, with regard to the subject covered by this Title, be pursued by the Member States within the framework of a common transport policy."

New article 75, and all that follows from it, refers to implementation of a common transport policy. That implies that the networks are to be part of a single policy. One of the lesser known facts of the treaty of Rome is that article 3(e) states:

"The objectives of the treaty shall include the adoption of a common policy in the sphere of transport."

I am suggesting that, contrary to what some people suppose, there is almost unlimited competence in the role of transport.

If new article 75 is to implement a single policy for transport, under the existing treaty of Rome, into what detail and to what specifications can the Commission go? Subject to correction from the Minister, I would guess that most, if not all, the policies will apply by a qualified majority vote. There cannot be anything other than qualified majority vote—there is no unanimity—in respect of transport.

Hon. Members may be surprised to know that not too long ago a series of regulations came before the House about a common transport policy in respect of safety. Safety was referred to earlier and it was felt to be a good thing to have in the treaty. That might be so with regard to a concern for safety, but the safety measures must be harmonised to ensure that there are no rigidities and that one country is not penalised in relation to another.

Hon. Members may also have forgotten that a regulation came before the Select Committee on European Legislation not very long ago about the harmonisation of speed limits based on the single transport policy and on the need for safety without prejudicing the single market. Matters went further than that. There was also a draft regulation, which I believe has now been dropped, for the adoption of common blood alcohol limits. A third rather different regulation, which formed the final part of that tripartite arrangement, dealt with the harmonisation of regulations about the depths of tyre treads. It is very sensible to have regulations about the depth of tyre treads for obvious safety reasons. They were to be harmonised throughout the EC.

The Select Committee on European Legislation felt that there was something to the tyre tread proposal. At that time, we could not understand why speed limits and blood alcohol limits could not be dealt with under subsidiarity. We had some gentlemen along from the Commission to question in public. They stuck to the principle that because, as I have just read, a common transport policy was in article 3e of the treaty of Rome, so anything to do with transport was fair game. The draft recommendation on alcohol and speed limits has almost certainly been dropped. Clearly, as we have pointed out, social matters, social acceptability, the design of roads, changes in the acceptability of limits and enforcement vary from country to country. Even if the directives were introduced, they probably would not work.

If the Commission could introduce matters of relative detail of that nature under the existing treaty of Rome, of course the same could happen under this treaty. I wish to advert to one of the nine networks that I mentioned—the common postal service in which we have an equalisation of costs over parcels. Let us not forget that there is now a proposal for the harmonisation of postal services. The harmonisation of postal rates is very much on tap. No doubt that, too, would come under competition, the single market criteria, or transport.

In matters relating to networks, the purpose of transport networks is not the benign purpose of which I have given some examples, but something which might result in disadvantage to those who are already diadvantaged.

I wanted to concentrate on transport but I shall make a few quick remarks on some other networks because they might not be mentioned by other hon. Members. A common energy policy is in the treaty, is it not? I tabled a question on how that energy network would affect the national grid. The Official Report states:

"Mr. Spearing: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what are the changes necessary to the national grid for electricity consequent on the current text of the treaty on European union, articles 129 b, c and d.

Mr. Eggar: None."—[Official Report, 8 July 1992; Vol. 211, c. 207.]

I am not sure whether that is so. If we are to have a common energy policy, if we are to have a European electricity grid, as distinct from a national grid—I am not sure whether that has yet been put forward—if there is to be a common price for energy, and if we could have perfect competition which one assumes might be on the way, how likely is it that there will be a European grid network such as that which we pioneered in this country?

We have already heard about the French link across the channel. What about television? Telecommunication is the communication not only of intelligence but of pictures, noise or codes. Yesterday, the hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) referred to an article in Saturday's issue of The Independent magazine which drew attention to aspects of freedom of television and television networks and the consequences of certain regulations which were passed in the late 1980s. When I read that article, I thought, "The lady who wrote this article has not realised that anything to do with the single market commercial is by qualified majority." She was blaming Ministers for letting something through at Brussels. I suspect that they would have been outvoted. We have a common network of television programmes and material.

The treaty is extraordinarily complex, and is only an amending treaty. The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, who is present, has declined on two or three occasions to print the consolidated treaty as it would be were the treaty on European union to be ratified.

3.30 am

None of the volumes that we study constitutes the working constitution of the European Community as it will be if the treaty is ratified. I think that a commercial version may have been produced, but we are using HMSO's version. We would have to try out the treaty for some months and years before we understood how it worked. There are also odd bits of the European single market treaty hanging around. There is a constellation —a library—of treaties that will form the written constitution of the Community if the treaty is ratified.

We have a network not only of various communications, but of articles of fearsome complexity. I understand that people can make out all sorts of cases for money, powers or reference to European Court. The treaties contain something for everyone. They contain hopes, promises, possibilities of grants here, something there, and something else for every region, interest group, development and research. If we search in every nook and cranny, we can find something in the treaty to benefit our own interests, regions or towns, through the use of public funds.

I fear that the motivation for the treaty is not international co-operation and understanding, as many hon. Members would wish, but the creation of a large pork barrel or honey pot into which various interest groups and Governments think that they can dip. When they do so, they come up with a plum and a prize which is well publicised, particularly in peripheral regions. The money for the transport and communications networks and for research is being silently withdrawn from our national economies without the knowledge of the taxpayers who produce it.

Mr. Knapman: The hon. Gentleman mentioned the money that is necessary to implement all the provisions. Who will be paying? Will it be Britain and Germany yet again?

Mr. Spearing: Britain and Germany will probably continue to be net contributors in some measure. The financing of the Community is an extraordinarily complex business. The accounts are not made up until the end of the year—due, in particular, to the British rebate. Even with the British rebate, we receive only about two thirds of what we contribute. If the Fontainebleau arrangement did not exist, we would probably receive only about half of what the taxpayer contributes. The answer to the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Knapman) is that it is the taxpayer—someone for whom many Conservative Members have a soft spot—who pays.

One example to quote to inquiring minds is the extent of the contribution supposedly made via VAT. For many years I thought that the VAT-linked contribution to the Community was 1 per cent. That was the ceiling which the erstwhile right hon. Member for Finchley came up against at Fontainebleau. It turns out that that was not the true figure at all. There are three or four main elements in the own-resources budgets, including a GNP element and apart from a common Community tariff, but the VAT one is linked not to the rates in this country but to a notional VAT assessment, rather like the old rates on property. We pay a percentage of that assessment.

When I asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer a few years ago for the equivalent amount as a percentage of the VAT take, I was told that it varied between 10 and 15 per cent., depending on movement in the basket of currencies. Conservative Members know only too well that VAT is a highly effective tax, the more so since it was increased. It works invisibly on the whole, and the squillions of pounds that it raises are beyond our comprehension. The equivalent of about 10 per cent. of it goes to the EC automatically—plus the gross national product increases, plus all the customs duties which accrue to the Exchequer. If the alcohol tax is harmonised and the money that the Exchequer receives decreases, the shortfall will have to be made up by other taxes paid into the British Exchequer.

To pay for all those networks, which I do not think will have the benign effect that we associate with those known to us at home, we shall have to spend large sums of money of a size that we do not yet know.

Mr. Harris: Because I intend to be brief I shall not give way to anyone except my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash). I say that in the sure knowledge that he caught a taxi two hours ago, having made a long speech at the start of the debate.

I have always held that an hon. Member's opinion of regional assistance will almost certainly depend on the constituency that he represents. I admit that, as I have the honour to represent one of the most peripheral areas of the United Kingdom, a part of the country which includes a group of islands, my view of support for transport is probably different from what it would be if I represented a constituency in Greater London or the home counties.

I represent the Isles of Scilly, and I notice that article 129b refers not just to peripheral regions but to islands and the need to link them. There has been much discussion of the benefits, real or imagined, for peripheral areas from the European funds. I can only say that the Isles of Scilly have benefited considerably from the Community's structural funds, and I hope that they will continue to do so under all the relevant parts of the treaty.

The position of the Isles of Scilly improved greatly when the link with mainland electricity was established. The disparity between charges on the islands and the mainland was done away with. It took a lot of campaigning by myself and others to get the funds for the link, which did away with what I regarded as an injustice.

I disagreed with the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) when he seemed to suggest that Scotland had been badly treated by the Government. I was trying to show that in relation to England the Scottish islands and highlands have had a good financial deal from the Government and the European Community. The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) was good enough to admit that some of the ferries to the Scottish islands receive an operating subsidy by way of road equivalent tariff. Such a subsidy is denied to the islands off the coast of England, including the Isles of Scilly. We have never enjoyed an operating subsidy, although we have pressed for one. However, we have received a loan for the replacement of the Scillonian, the ferry to the islands. I hope that when the present vessel, Scillonian III, is replaced we shall get another loan from the Government or the Community to help with the cost.

The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland was correct to say that a ferry linking an island to the mainland is equivalent to a road. Such a ferry should be supported in the way that the Government support the building of roads in the United Kingdom and Europe. That is a proper use of public money. I am not among those who argue for limitless subsidies for transport. However, if we wish to reduce the difficulties and disparities in peripheral areas such as the Scottish islands, the north of Scotland, west Cornwall or the Isles of Scilly, it is proper to use public funds. As a good Conservative I have no hesitation in arguing for proper assistance. [Interruption.] My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) disputes that, but if he still represented Glasgow, Cathcart I suspect that his attitude would be rather different.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Harris: No. I said that I would not give way and I will not, even though my hon. Friend was barracking me, as usual, and I mentioned him.

I welcome the treaty's provisions and hope that they will bring some benefit to the peripheral areas of the United Kingdom.

The Vice-Chamberlain of Her Majesty's Household (Mr. Sydney Chapman) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question, That the Question be now put, put and agreed to.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. Spearing: On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. Since the Minister spoke there have been other speeches and questions have been asked. Will the Minister reply to those questions?

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): The hon. Gentleman has been here for a long time and is familiar with our procedures. He has just heard me put the Question.

Mr. Knapman: On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. Those of us who are sometimes called sceptics represent about 70 per cent. of the British people. Apparently there was no more time to debate the amendments, which are vastly important. Will there be time to debate other amendments? Some of my hon. Friends have worked to prepare speeches on other groups of amendments and would like to deliver them.

The First Deputy Chairman: If the hon. Gentleman had not raised a point of order, I should have called the next group of amendments.

3.45 am

Mr. Wilson: I beg to move amendment No. 4, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert
'(except Article 129 on page 33 of Cm 1934)'.

The First Deputy Chairman: With this, it will be convenient to consider the following amendments: No. 15, in page 1, line 9, after 'II' insert
'(except Title XVI on page 39 of Cm 1934)'.

No. 31, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert
'(except Article 130r on page 39 of Cm 1934 relating to environmental policy)'.

No. 188, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 3(k)'.

No. 192, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 3(o)'.

No. 238, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 130s(2)'.

No. 239, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 130s(4)'.

No. 240, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 130s(5)'.

No. 246, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 130r(1)'.

No. 247, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 130r(2)'.

No. 388, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert
'except Article 130t as referred to in Article G on page 40 of Command Paper Number 1934'.

No. 54, in page 1, line 10, after '1992', insert
'but not Article 129 in Title II thereof'.

Mr. Wilson: I shall shortly—I hope very shortly—be succeeded by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith). I am sure that we are all anxious to continue——

Mr. Garel-Jones: I am sure that the Committee is grateful to the hon. Gentleman for moving amendment No. 4 to article 129 on the public health provisions. I presume that he will also speak to amendments Nos. 15 and 31 on the environment. I dare say that, when the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) joins us, he will be able to tell the Committee whether those are probing amendments, as I suspect they may be. The Committee can then have a debate on the public health and environment provisions of the treaty.

Mr. Wilson: The Minister is right. As I made clear about the previous amendment when I moved it, the amendments in the group are probing amendments. As the Minister said, they deal with public health issues and related matters. I hope that he accepts that we should have a debate on those important matters. I am, however, in some difficulty.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Perhaps I can help the hon. Gentleman. Why does he not just read out the brief that he had for the previous debate, and that was used in the debate before that? He can say that, although he is speaking to the amendments with great vigour, he disagrees with them all the way along the line. That is what has happened in the past three debates, and we understand will happen in the next 17 debates, and he could quietly get on with doing that. The position of the Labour party is becoming absurd.

Mr. Wilson: I am pleased to say that I do not need a brief to read out what the hon. Gentleman has suggested I say. I could make it up. However, he does us an injustice. I made it clear at the start of the previous debate that the amendments were probing ones. If one removes that absurdities from the debate on those amendments—I shall be fair at this hour of the morning, and say that at least as many came from Opposition Benches as came from Tory Benches, and my speech was concerned entirely with real issues—we had a sensible debate. It is reasonable that, under the headings, we should debate the issues properly.

There are procedural manoeuvrings going on, and some procrastination, as everyone knows. I assure the hon. Gentleman that procrastinations are not in my interest —quite the contrary.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I am sure that the Committee appreciates the difficulty that the hon. Gentleman is in. I know that several of my hon. Friends are anxious to discuss health and the environment. After the hon. Gentleman has made some general remarks, I would wish to respond, if that is for the convenience of the Committee. Having done that, the Committee can go forward and debate these matters.

Mr. Wilson: The Minister has made a helpful suggestion.

I shall deal now with the substance of the amendment. Under article 1, we are dealing with Community policy on the environment and how it should contribute to

"pursuit of the following objectives:

—preserving, protecting and improving the quality of the environment;

—protecting human health;

—prudent and rational utilization of natural resources;

—promoting measures at international level to deal with regional or worldwide environmental problems."

I am sure that no one on either side of the Chamber could dissent from these blameless objectives.

Community policy on the environment is dealt with in title 16. The aim is a "high level of protection". I see that my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury is with us. I was just getting into my stride. With your consent, Mr. Lofthouse, I will hand over——

Mr. Michael Spicer: No, carry on.

Mr. Wilson: I shall continue.

Community policy on the environment is aimed at achieving

"a high level of protection taking into account the diversity of situations in the various regions of the Community. It shall be based on the precautionary principle"—

I am sure that we all agree that that is a sound one.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I am sure that the Committee is grateful to the hon. Gentleman for having so effectively moved the amendment——

Mr. Spicer: On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. As a matter of information, is it right that the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) was reading a Government brief? Are we taking collusion to that extent? Is that what is going on? It certainly looked as if that was happening.

The First Deputy Chairman: I do not know what the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) was reading.

Mr. Garel-Jones: It is fairly well known to the Committee where collusion exists, and it is not between the two Front Benches.

Mr. Wilson: I would not wish the record to go uncorrected. I do not think that the "Treaty on European Union including the Protocols and Final Act with Declarations" is a Government brief.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I am sure that the Committee is grateful to the hon. Gentleman for having made it clear that the Opposition's purpose in moving the amendment is to allow the Committee to have a debate on health and the environment. I shall make some brief introductory remarks to set the debate in context and thereafter listen to what hon. Members have to say.

The chapter on public health is helpful in defining the scope of Community action, and will be of considerable benefit. Britain needs a sound legal basis for Community action in this area, and that is something for which we fought. The chapter on public health in the Maastricht treaty accomplishes that, laying out clearly the legitimate areas for Community action. The chapter reflects the principle of subsidiarity both in general and in specific exclusion of any harmonisation of the laws and regulations of member states. The chapter gives the Community a role in disease prevention, not in the provision of health care, through the encouragement and promotion of research, information and education. It hence provides the basis for the Community to support member states in the area of public health. Closer European co-operation is clearly beneficial both to the United Kingdom and to the other member states. I would find it difficult to believe that anyone in the Chamber wouuld wish to question the objective.

I would say the same of the changes introduced into the existing environmental provisions of the Maastricht treaty. Environmental policy has become an essential part of Community action since the environment title was incorporated in the treaty by the Single European Act. The environment is a prime example of an area in which Community action makes sense. Environmental problems are not respecters of international boundaries. There is widespread support for Community action on the environment in this country and other countries.

Maastricht represents a significant strengthening of the Community's environmental policies and I am sure that every member of the Committee welcomes that. It is beneficial not only to Britain but to Europe. We believe that there is a role for the Community in protecting the environment, because many of the problems can be tackled only through international co-operation. Maastricht strikes the right balance on Community action in that sphere, upholding the principle of subsidiarity while placing environmental concerns at the heart of Community decision making.

I think that I have said enough to put the debate in context, and I now want to listen to what hon. Members have to say.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): I support the remarks so ably made by my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson). As he explained, these are purely probing amendments. We strongly support the two relevant titles in the Maastricht treaty, but we tabled the amendments to draw attention to them and to provide an opportunity to discuss them and some of the issues they raise.

Title X deals with public health. It is worth saying that it is purely permissive. It deals with the encouragement of co-operation, with the lending of support to individual member states by the Community, with research, with information and with education. It does not require any member state to carry out anything, and it does not give the Commission undue power to interfere in the workings of any member state. It casts the Community in a supportive role in public health, which I am sure the Committee welcomes.

One of the main public health issues across the Community is the spread of HIV and AIDS, and that is directly addressed by title X. In being able to pick up examples of best practice across the Community, the Commission can use the permissive powers of title X to encourage the spreading of the best practices in treatment, care and education across the member states.

In facing new public health challenges such as HIV, it is important that we learn by example. Britain has done an enormous amount with public education about the threat of HIV. That example can be followed by other member states. I am sure that, in many respects, they too have things that they can teach us. The provisions of the public health title in the treaty are entirely praiseworthy. They open scope for improved provision across the Community, and they provide an opportunity for it to support the individual actions of member states.

I want to dwell at greater length on title XVI, which relates to the environment. It is one of the most important titles in the treaty. As the Minister rightly observed, the environment is no respecter of national boundaries. It is a truism that pollution crosses continents. That the air that passes over Chernobyl will eventually pass over the hillsides of Wales and that the sea that washes the coast of East Anglia is the same as that which washes the coast of Germany is so obvious that it does not need restating—but it is vital in constructing environmental policy.

In protecting our environment, we must understand that is a common environment—common to many nations and not the property of a single nation. That makes title XVI especially important. Article 130r(1) sets out important environmental principles, but I note that amendments in the name of the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) seek to delete both that and article 130r(2). I hope that the hon. Gentleman—who, remarkably, is not in his place, though I am sure for good reasons—does not demur from the principles that both paragraphs enshrine.

Mr. Harris: I am reliably informed—if I am wrong, I will apologise tomorrow—that my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash), who normally takes a great interest in such matters and whose speeches have detained the Committee for a long time, went home some time ago, even though an amendment in his name is before the Committee tonight.

Mr. Smith: I bow to the hon. Gentleman's better knowledge.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Before the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) bows to that better knowledge, does he accept that my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford has attended consistently throughout our debates; has almost lost his voice; and has a cold or flu? For one hon. Member to attack another for going home at 2 o'clock in the morning because he is unwell and has lost his voice is one of the most sickening examples of hypocrisy that I have encountered in 28 years.

Mr. Smith: I hesitate to enter into a debate between two Conservative Members. I hope that the hon. Member for Stafford did not table his amendments to delete article 130r(1) and (2) by way of contesting the basic principles that they enshrine, because they are extremely important.

Sir Russell Johnston: I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman that caring for the environment knows no boundaries. Does the hon. Gentleman believe that tension will be created between that excellent principle and the principle of subsidiarity, of which much is made?

Mr. Smith: The hon. Gentleman touches on an important point. It is conceivable—I cast no aspersions—that a Government wanting to diminish environmental protection might seek the cloak of subsidiarity as an argument for drawing attention away from the need to protect the environment, and to allow the level of that protection to fall from the high European standards to lower national standards. I must confess, however, that some months ago I feared for a time that the Government might indeed embark on such a course. The Secretary of State for the Environment, for instance, said on television that some aspects of environmental protection might be dealt with more appropriately at national level.

On the whole, the European Community's environmental protection record is considerably better than the British Government's. Any attempt to draw power away from the Community and back into the hands of the Secretary of State is likely to diminish environmental protection rather than enhancing it. I hope that the Government do not intend to do that; but the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) has raised an important point, and it is a pity that the Secretary of State for the Environment is not here to deal with it.

I was dealing with the important principles enshrined in paragraphs 1 and 2 of article 130r. Paragraph 1 sets out four basic reasons why environmental protection is important. First, there is the quality of the environment—the quality of the water we drink and the air we breathe. Secondly, there is the protection of human health. Thirdly, there is the prudent and rational utilisation of natural resources—the husbanding of the raw materials of the earth, which we must not exhaust at the expense of future generations. Fourthly, there is the need to promote measures at international level: this is not just a local or national issue, but a global issue.

Paragraph 2 refers to two particularly important environmental principles which Opposition Members have consistently supported, and which the Government claim to support strongly as well. They were drawn to the attention of the world by the earth summit at Rio. I refer to the precautionary principle and the "polluter pays" principle.

The precautionary principle is very simple: even when we are not certain that a particular environmental consequence will result from a particular course but merely suspect that it might, we must act to prevent any such occurrence. An example that is now at the forefront of our minds is the maritime transport of oil, which may have arisen earlier in the context of transport policy but which also has important environmental implications.

We may know that strengthening the construction of oil tankers will not necessarily guarantee that a tanker that runs aground will not spill large quantities of oil into the marine environment. Even though there is no absolute certainty that it will help, none the less it might, and because it might help, the importance of the precautionary principle needs to be taken into account.

We do not know for certain that to route a tanker to the north of Shetland rather than through the channel between Shetland and Fair Isle will inevitably be a safer route. We do not know for certain that to route large tankers carrying large quantities of oil through the Minch between the Hebrides and Skye will inevitably provide a safer passage. None the less, we know that to take such courses of action may prevent an accident, and because it might do so, the precautionary principle comes into play. In those circumstances, it is important for us to make sure that all tankers go to the west of the Hebrides and that no tankers go through the channel between Shetland and Fair Isle.

These are important issues. Therefore, the precautionary environmental principle adumbrated in the second paragraph of this article of the treaty ought to lead us to take important decisions about the routeing of oil tankers in order to prevent occurrences that might damage the environment. The precautionary principle is a sensible one to adopt when important issues such as these are involved.

About eight years ago, the Select Committee on the Environment studied the destruction caused by acid rain. The European Community published recently a report on forest damage in all the member states of the European Community. Its staggering and awesome conclusion is that forest damage and leaf loss is at its worst in the United Kingdom. About 57 per cent. of all trees in the United Kingdom have suffered damage through acid rain. I should have thought that any Government would want to consider that stark conclusion.

Eight years ago, the Select Committee on the Environment studied the acid rain issue, looked at sulphur dioxide and nitrogen dioxide emissions from our power stations and reached a set of conclusions. It said that the science was not totally proved, that it could not say for certain that sulphur dioxide, nitrogen dioxide and hydrocarbons mix in the atmosphere and then come down again in the form of acid rain, but that it thought that that was likely. Therefore, the Select Committee made a series of proposals, including proposals for the retrofitting of power stations in the United Kingdom with——

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that the dash for gas, the combined cycle turbines and the nuclear programme are desirable so as to ensure that there are no consequences such as those he describes?

Mr. Smith: No, I am not suggesting that. I am suggesting that the cleaning up of emissions from coal-fired power stations is sensible in order to ensure that we can continue to burn coal cleanly.

Sir Russell Johnston: I want to do something very unusual and ask the hon. Gentleman a genuine question. I was surprised to hear the hon. Gentleman say that our trees suffer far more from the effects of acid rain than those in other member states. However, we have fewer trees than, for example, the Federal Republic of Germany, where I had always understood the worst damage had been experienced. When the hon. Gentleman says that our trees are the worst affected, does he mean as a proportion or in total volume?

Mr. Smith: As a proportion. The hon. Gentleman rightly notes that Britain has less tree cover than some other Community countries. I remember as a member of the Environment Select Committee visiting part of the black forest, where devastation had been acute. The landscape that five years previously had been verdant tree cover had become a devastated wilderness, with a few bare stumps of trees in the middle. That had been caused simply by air pollution. Having witnessed that, many members of the Committee changed their minds fundamentally about the nature and importance of the problem.

4.15 am

Mrs. Gorman: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that a 10-year study of acid rain in the United States showed that highly acidic water could be poured over trees for that period without causing devastation? Is he aware of the work of Professor Beament at Cambridge, who concluded that the effects are caused by underground and water conditions not related to acid rain? There is plenty of evidence that slightly acidic rain has a helpful effect on the soil. The theory of acid rain that the hon. Gentleman is advancing has been discredited for a number of years.

Mr. Smith: I think that it is the hon. Lady who has been discredited rather than the theory that I am advancing. She advances the common lay fallacy that acid rain is acidic water; it is not. The effect that we call acid rain is a photochemical smog created by a combination of sulphur dioxide, nitrogen oxide, hydrocarbons and ozone. It does not come down in the form of water. If the hon. Lady had done a little wider reading on the subject, I suspect that she might have known that.

I do not want to be unfair to the hon. Lady, for whom I have great affection, but she is on record as saying that there is no such thing as global warming, and that carbon dioxide is good for people. If she persists in adopting such attitudes, she is going very much against the grain of the overwhelming bulk of scientific opinion in the world. I am sure that, at some stage, she will come to her senses.

Eight years ago, the Select Committee took the precautionary principle to heart. At that stage, the science was not totally proved, whereas it is now, but none the less it is said that we should start a retrofitting programme for our power stations, because the signs were that damage was caused, and we should take precautions.

Sadly, the Government did not listen. Subsequently, they decided to retrofit three power stations in Britain. Work is in progress on one. It has not started on the other two yet, but none the less the contribution is too little, too late. If, like Germany, we had retrofitted virtually all our power stations in the past 10 or 15 years, we would be in a much better position with regard to sulphur dioxide and nitrogen dioxide emissions. Sulphur dioxide emissions are rising in Britain, despite international agreements which the Government have signed and which are supposed to ensure that we reduce such emissions.

Mr. Gallie: I accept what the hon. Gentleman says about sulphur dioxide and nitrous oxide, but what about CO_2 emissions in comparison to those of Germany? Germany abandoned its nuclear programmes. That means that our CO_2 emissions are proportionately not as high as Germany's. Surely that is a problem.

Mr. Smith: I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman is wrong. At the moment, Britain contributes about 3 per cent. of global carbon dioxide emissions although we have only 1 per cent. of the world's population. Per unit of industrial production, Germany generates less carbon dioxide than we do. One of the most dramatic statistics of the global environment is that, per unit of industrial production, Germany and Japan generate half the quantity of carbon dioxide generated by the United States. The hon. Gentleman needs to consider the fact that Germany performs quite well on carbon dioxide.

I remind him that Britain's carbon dioxide emissions have risen by 2 per cent. in the past two years, even in the depths of a recession. Many of us find that extremely worrying, although the hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) probably does not. However, she is probably not a progressive thinker on this matter.

Mrs. Gorman: I am very interested in the hon. Gentleman's remarks about my competence or otherwise to pronounce on these matters. I do not know how much science he knows, but he knows an awful lot of fairy stories. Is he aware that less than 2 per cent. of the earth's inhabitable surfaces are industrialised and that the greatest part of the earth's surface is covered with water? The generation of carbon dioxide must be seen in proportion to how much of the earth is industrialised.

Is the hon. Gentleman also aware that historical evidence from ice cores shows that there have been times when life has existed happily on earth when the percentage of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere has been eight or 10 times greater than it is now, with no apparent harmful effect on plant or animal life?

Is he further aware that green plants photosynthesise at less than 50 per cent. of their capacity, the limiting factor being carbon dioxide? Therefore, carbon dioxide is a fertiliser in plant terms and does no harm, whether it increases or decreases.

Mr. Smith: The hon. Lady is wrong in a number of respects. First, she is wrong to describe facts as fairy tales. She also claimed that there have been periods of intense carbon dioxide production. There have been occasions, especially in connection with volcanic eruptions, for example, when, in a reasonably localised area, carbon dioxide has increased sharply for a brief period and then decreased.

However, the hon. Lady must realise that we are now experiencing a global increase in carbon dioxide levels in the world's atmosphere as a whole. Far from supporting her argument by pointing to the relatively small area of the world's surface which carries industry, that fact makes the position far more alarming, because as much of the rest of the world becomes industrialised, so the generation of carbon dioxide, which has already increased dramatically, will continue to increase. I fear that the hon. Lady's points, far from supporting her arguments, help to destroy them.

I was distracted down that road by the hon. Member for Billericay. The point that I was trying to establish was the importance of adopting the precautionary principle. Eight years ago, the Select Committee on the Environment adopted the precautionary principle. I wish that the Government had done so at that time in relation to sulphur dioxide emissions. Because they did not do so, we are now too late. Although, I hope, the Government may still see the light, it is eight years behind the time at which they should have done so. The precautionary principle is an extremely important aspect of environmental policy and I am delighted to see it enshrined in the paragraph.

The other important principle that is enshrined is that the polluter pays. The Government have advanced that principle in recent days and the Opposition certainly assent to it. However, let us consider the recent disaster on Shetland. The Government's attitude, quite rightly, is that it is the polluter—the tanker owner—who should pay. International arrangements are in place for compensation to be made available arising out of the liability for the accident.

However, the present compensation arrangements have a limit. There is an international scheme under which compensation will be paid for the costs of the clean-up operation, for the immediate response, and for the long-term loss of livelihood of fishermen, farmers and crofters, but there is a limit on that fund of £50 million.

What happens if that £50 million is found to be insufficient to compensate the people in Shetland, whose livelihoods have been dramatically affected by the grounding of the Braer? At the moment, there is no provision for either the polluter—the tanker owner—the liability fund, the insurers or the Government to pay anything above that £50 million. That limit on liability worries me considerably, and it certainly worries many people in Shetland with whom I was able to talk only a few days ago. If we are serious about enshrining "the polluter pays" as a proper principle in environmental policy, we must ensure that the full liability—not just a limited liability—falls on the polluter in an incident such as the grounding of the Braer.

There is a further issue. Not only is there an overall limit on the amount available for compensation: there are limits on the type of expenditure for which compensation will be available. The cost, for example, of long-term monitoring and research is not met by the compensation fund. Long-term monitoring and research has to take place. Never before have we had oil blowing in such quantities over agricultural land. No one knows what the long-term impact on crops and on grazing land will be.

[Mr. Smith]

It is important, therefore, that detailed research is done consistently over a long period to ensure that we know exactly what is happening to the soil in the parts of Shetland affected. There is no money in any fund or from anywhere to carry out that research work. No liability exists in the international protection fund to ensure that that work can be paid for.

Similarly, we have little knowledge about what happens to light crude oil when it enters the marine environment in the quantities that poured from the Braer. We must ensure that we look intensely at what is happening to the elements at the very beginning of the food chain when they are contaminated by oil and hydrocarbons. That important scientific exercise should be carried out consistently for months to come. Once again, however, there is no specific liability for that work and there should be.

If we are serious about the "polluter pays" principle, we should ensure that when an accident like that involving the Braer occurs the body that causes the pollution should pay for the cleaning up, for the compensation for loss of livelihood and for the long-term research and monitoring work.

Mr. Dickens: Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that when Saddam Hussein set fire to the oil wells across Kuwait and polluted the atmosphere for months on end the United Nations should have required him to pay?

4.30 am

Mr. Smith: The short answer is that the United Nations did that. The principle is enshrined in several United Nations resolutions that concluded the ceasefire after the Gulf war.

The first point that I want to make about the title is that it enshrines very important, sound environmental principles. The Opposition strongly support the "precautionary" and "polluter pays" principles. Secondly, the title includes provision for majority voting in relation to the environment and the Opposition support and welcome that.

I note that the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) wishes to delete the exceptions from the title. I do not know why he wants to do that. The exceptions are rather strong. They rule out anything to do with taxation, town and country planning, the use and management of water resources, the management of waste and a member state's choice between different energy sources. Those remain issues which must fall within unanimous voting procedures if the Community is to take any steps. Other areas of environmental policy are available for majority voting and we welcome that.

We should be aiming for the highest possible standards of environmental protection and not at the lowest common denominator. When we enable majority voting to take place, member states should not always proceed at the pace of the slowest.

Mr. Denzil Davies: My hon. Friend has rightly said that qualified majority voting decides such issues. He said that we all believe in that and that it is a good thing. If a member state has been outvoted and must then carry out the wishes of the majority, what would happen if it could not afford to do that? Assuming that there is no money in the cohesion fund, how does one surmount that difficulty?

Mr. Smith: The answer to that can be found in paragraph 5 of article 130s which makes provision for contributions from the cohesion fund and for temporary derogations for a member state where financial difficulties are incurred. I believe that it is simple to opt for temporary derogation rather than permanent derogation.

One of the things that we all, including my right hon. Friend, would wish to avoid is environmental dumping, with certain member states seeking, by means of a permanent derogation, to undercut the other member states of the Community in terms of environmental protection standards. My right hon. Friend would not wish to see provisions of that nature in such a treaty.

Mr. Davies: I understand that, but temporary derogation presumably means that the member state, after the temporary period comes to an end—my hon. Friend has not said how long that period will be—has to find the money. That means that there are public expenditure choices and that they are restricted, so other forms of public expenditure in that member state after the period of temporary derogation has come to an end will have to be forsaken and sacrificed as a result.

Mr. Smith: My right hon. Friend makes one mistake in assuming that good environmental practice inevitably means public expenditure being brought into play. It might, of course, mean that the private sector has to improve its standards and find the necessary funds. But even if it is a case of public expenditure being brought into play, I believe that ensuring that high environmental standards are maintained across the Community as a whole is an entirely valid purpose for the Community to insist on those standards.

Mr. Davies: Paragraph 5 refers to disproportionate costs for public authorities and member states, so I was referring to a public cost. If, at the end of the period of temporary derogation, the public authority has to find the money, given the constraints of public expenditure on taxation, that must be at the expense of something else, be it a hospital or a school. In other words, a further restriction is placed by qualified majority voting on the power and authority of a member state to spend its money as it wills.

Mr. Smith: Of course I understand my right hon. Friend's point. I am simply drawing his attention, in my initial response to him, to the fact that environmental protection measures are not necessarily solely taken by sovereign Governments. They can also be required of commercial enterprises. However, taking my right hon. Friend's point that a sovereign Government might be required by a majority vote of other member states to take a certain course of action and might find it difficult to fund that action immediately from its own resources and might secure a temporary derogation—it is of course noteworthy that the treaty is silent on the subject of how long such a temporary period is—we are speaking in entirely hypothetical terms.

If, by the time we get to the end of such a temporary period, and if the cohesion fund does not necessarily apply in those circumstances—there is a big string of ifs, Mr. Lofthouse—my right hon. Friend might be right, but there is an enormous amount of negotiation and discussion to be had throughout that process, not the least of which involves the length of period for which a derogation would apply.

Mr. Davies: My hon. Friend is very patient with me. Of course the cohesion fund does not apply to the United Kingdom, so that subsection is out. My hon. Friend implied that he did not want the temporary period to be very long or other countries could dump in this country. The reality is that the temporary period would be short, we would have to find the money, and that would be a constraint on public expenditure.

Mr. Smith: I am tempted to observe that, judging by the way the British economy is going at the moment, Britain might soon qualify for the cohesion fund, but I certainly hope that that will not occur.

At present, only four member states qualify for assistance from the cohesion fund. My right hon. Friend must not put words in my mouth and assume that I want an extremely short temporary derogation period. Whether or not a longer derogation period is required depends entirely on the circumstances and is a matter for amicable negotiation between the countries involved. I believe that my right hon. Friend has used an entirely hypothetical example that will not occur and cause problems in reality.

The important principle enshrined in the title is that we should aim at high and consistent environmental protection standards across the Community. What happens to the environment of other Community countries affects us. Therefore, my right hon. Friend should take account of the fact that the environment should not merely be the responsibility of a member state alone. The pollution generated in one member state may well affect the citizens of another. It seems absolutely right that the treaty should aim for the establishment of high environmental standards across the Community.

Mr. Jessel: Does not the hon. Gentleman think that, in order to prevent pollution, it would be better to have a Europe-wide organisation, not merely a European Community or union of 12 countries? For example, the pollution of the Rhine cannot be properly prevented unless Switzerland—which is not a member of the European Community—is included. Prevention of pollution of the Mediterranean cannot be achieved properly unless Turkey is included. Should not the Council of Europe be responsible for such matters, not the European union? If so, why do we need the treaty of Maastricht?

Mr. Smith: The hon. Gentleman attributes to the Council of Europe powers and procedures which do not exist and would be difficult to create. Of course, it would be more appropriate to deal with some environmental issues on the basis of ad hoc gatherings of certain nations. The most obvious example is that of the nations that come together for the Oslo and Paris conventions on pollution in the north-east Atlantic. In that case, a number of states that are not members of the European Community are included in the discussions. That fact does not invalidate the argument that strong environmental protection across the European Community—as a community—can benefit the citizens of individual member states.

Mrs. Gorman: Further to the issue raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel), if the hon. Member is concerned about the state of the atmosphere, is it not also true that, before lumbering our industries with extremely costly requirements to reduce pollution, we should consider that countries such as China —with a population of more than 1 billion—produce vastly greater amounts of industrial waste and gas into the atmosphere? We can do nothing about such pollution, but we set standards for our industries that will inevitably make the goods and services that they produce more expensive, thus making us less competitive. How does the hon. Gentleman think that such factors will help the citizens of Europe?

Mr. Smith: There are three differences between the hon. Lady and myself. First, I am concerned about the condition of our atmosphere and the hon. Lady is not. Secondly, I realise that, despite its large population and its growth rate of 10 per cent. a year, China still produces considerably less carbon dioxide than the industrialised north. Even at its present rate of industrialisation, it will take China a number of years to catch up. The third is that, although I recognise the potential for pollution generation in the developing world, I believe that the developed countries of the north should provide assistance in the form of technology transfer to ensure that best environmental practices are encouraged, supported and facilitated in the developing countries. That is better than criticising those countries, as some—not, I am sure, the hon. Lady—would do.

Europe's environmental record is rather good, largely because the Commission has taken action in the form of the drinking water directives, the sea bathing directives, the protection of Oxleas Wood and the items in the fifth action programme on the environment, which includes the drawing up of new measurements of economic progress to set beside GDP—throughout the Community and within the next few years. All these important European initiatives have helped to protect the British environment.

4.45 am

The one item which the Commission proposed and which I am sad to say the British Government did not accept was the proposal that an environmental impact assessment should be made of all items of Government policy in member states. Of course, the definitions would have to be well and creatively drawn, but it is unfortunate that the British Government exerted every effort to remove a directive of this nature from the list. In general, however, the record of Europe has been far better than that of the British Government in matters of environmental protection.

It is also important to adopt a regional approach to many of these issues. Of course the hon. Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) was correct: for some environmental issues a particular gathering of countries that does not fit neatly into the Community box may be needed. Still, the European Community is a major economic and trading bloc; it is a regional entity. Some environmental matters clearly apply right across the Community, so it makes sense to ensure that many of them are dealt with at Community level.

There is a great task to be done in assisting the countries of central and eastern Europe to clean up their environment, which has been so devastated over the past 40 or 50 years. No country in the EC can undertake that job on its own, but the Community can exercise its strength to help these countries to clean up. That in turn will help to clean up our environment, too.

It is worth noting that article 130t states that if any member state wants to go further to improve its environmental protection even more than the Community proposes, it should be enabled and encouraged to do so. That is an important provision, and I hope soon to see a Government who will push environmental protection further than the rest of Europe rather than lag behind.

Mr. Spearing: Before my hon. Friend completes his comprehensive survey, will he mention the enhanced powers in this area of the European Parliament? Does he agree that, although it is not solely confined to the environment, article 189b is important?

Mr. Smith: I had not intended specifically to address that issue, but as my hon. Friend raises it I shall do so. I strongly believe in the need for a strengthened European Parliament that can monitor and hold to account the European Commission. The record of that Parliament's environment Committee, which is chaired by my Labour colleague the MEP for Strathclyde, is extremely good. It has pursued the Environment Commissioner to make sure that he is accountable and has pushed environmental issues in the Community. I am sure that my hon. Friend welcomes that. I should like to see it further developed.

Mr. Spearing: My hon. Friend and I are keen to see monitoring of the environment. However, I would like to see it monitored even more keenly in this place, in all European nations, and in the Council of Europe. My hon. Friend has still not mentioned article 189b, which states that if there is a disagreement between the Council of Europe and the European Parliament on a proposal that may have been approved by the Council, the proposal goes no further. Such a provision is unlikely to be used in this area, but my hon. Friend will agree that it is a backward step vis-a-vis the European Parliament's powers over the Council.

Mr. Smith: I suspect that my hon. Friend is right to say that that power is unlikely to be used in this area. However, the European Parliament will wish to push it in relation to the environment.

The Opposition welcome the titles on public health and on the environment. We welcome the introduction of qualified majority voting and the attention that the Maastricht treaty pays to the environment. We hope that progress on environmental protection can be made in Britain and in the Community, because wherever we live in Europe the environment belongs to us all. We must insist through Governments, the Community and the European Parliament on the highest possible environmental standards.

Sir Teddy Taylor: I apologise to you, Mr. Lofthouse, and to the Clerk for speaking at all at seven minutes to 5 o'clock. I hope that the Government will consider whether it is fair, reasonable, proper and democratic to ask us to debate important issues affecting the whole of our country when one party has departed from the Committee on the instructions of its Whips. Other hon. Members are sleepy and probably not fit to discuss these matters.

Mr. Knapman: My hon. Friend will be aware that, when progress is reported, we have an hour and a half in which to debate those matters if we wish to.

Sir Teddy Taylor: I am well aware of that, and the Government should accept that.

We have just had a long speech from a Labour Front-Bench spokesman. I hope that he realises just how long he has been talking. He was the third such spokesman to tell us that the Opposition supported the measure. They were meant to be probing amendments. Like my hon. Friends, I have been here hour after hour, hearing the shadow Ministers saying that they are moving probing amendments, but then not probing. They never ask questions. It makes me wonder what they are at. The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) was asked three specific questions on the clauses, which he did not seem to understand. He talked about the cohesion fund without realising that it did not apply to Britain.

I must move on because I want hon. Members who wish to ask questions to have the opportunity to do so. However, I reiterate those two points. First, it is shameful that the Maastricht treaty, which takes away fundamental powers from the people of Britain and from their children and grandchildren, is being debated by a bunch of sleepyheads at five to five in the morning. Secondly, I do not know what the Opposition are playing at.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Was that the reason why my hon. Friend voted against the suspension of the debate earlier on—so that we could debate the matters at a sensible time when people were awake?

Sir Teddy Taylor: I should like the matters to be debated sensibly, without delay. I am amazed by all this business about precautionary principle. It is a bit like having three roofs in case the rain comes through the top one. It is a load of rubbish and nonsense. Let us get on to facts.

At the end of the long list of amendments grouped together comes my amendment No. 54, in which I propose that we take out the public health clause. I have not tabled it because I am against public health or because I think that money spent on that is wasted but because the whole clause is a load of hypocrisy. Hon. Members should be aware of that, and the Government should think about it.

Apart from some splendid sentiments about how the Governments hope that public health will improve and that all countries will co-operate—we heard how we shall co-operate over HIV and other issues, although why it has to be European countries and not others, I do not know —the treaty does nothing at all except set out nice words, including statements that there will be more health information and education and co-operation on the massive subjects such as drug dependence and tobacco.

I should like the Government to tell us how they can approve that nonsense when they know that the EC is spending more and more every year—this year it will be £1 billion—on growing high-tar tobacco, which is nasty stuff, and dumping that not in Europe, because it is illegal to smoke it here, but in the third world, east Europe and places in Africa where people do not understand language and danger. We keep hearing that something will be done about tobacco growing, but nothing is done. All that happens is that, every year, the expenditure increases. Who is suffering as a result? As with all the other Euro-policies, the poor, the ignorant and those who do not understand suffer.

We are growing high-tar tobacco that we are not allowed to smoke because it is too dangerous. We are giving piles of subsidy—it is subsidised more than anything else in the EC—but the Government have the cheek to approve a public health policy saying how wonderful it is that we can all work together to improve public health. I just wish that, instead of all those wonderful words about co-operation, getting rid of bad things and everyone working together, they would face up to some of the basic issues. That is never done. We are always told that improvements are around the corner, but we never see any.

The second issue is the environment. What does article 130t on page 40 mean? That brings in something that, as an obsessive reader of Euro-treaties, I have not seen before. It says that the European nations will get together to form their common rules. That means, for example, that the polluter will pay, unless he is a farmer. Many people are facing higher water rates because of nitrate pollution —nitrate pollution is shoved in under subsidy—but farmers do not pay for the pollution that they cause because they are, in effect, a separate category of people.

5 am

We are told that we shall have a lot of new rules and many new ideas and that individual member states can have "more stringent protective measures" if they wish. That is our freedom. We are told for the first time, however, that such additional measures must be compatible with the treaty and that they

"shall be notified to the Commission."

What does that mean? Does it mean that if a British law happens to be tighter or tougher than European law or a European decision for reasons that suit us, we must go to the Commission to be given its assurance, and that of the Council, that our law is compatible with European law? I have never seen such a provision before.

Mr. Rowlands: The hon. Gentleman has said more than once that article 130t is new. In fact, it comes from the original treaty. It was added to the treaty by the relevant provisions of the Single European Act. The hon. Gentleman is right to say, however, that the additional phrase in article 130t is the reference to the Commission. He should probe to ascertain why that has been added to the original treaty of Rome, as amended by the Single European Act, which otherwise represents the whole of article 130t.

Sir Teddy Taylor: The hon. Gentleman is right. So much of this stuff is from previous treaties. Indeed, it goes right back to the treaty of Rome. The feature that is new is the requirement to notify the Commission. The Commission's officials are meant to act as our civil servants. Does the provision mean that any new laws that we enact—they might be additional laws—must be reported to the Commission and approved? Does it mean that our existing laws must be reported and approved? The matter is far from clear and I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister of State will make a short and simple statement on what is meant by

Does that mean our existing laws, which might be more European than European laws, or does it mean new laws?

Thirdly, is it wise to give so many additional powers in respect of the environment to the EEC? In the previous debate, I should have liked to ask some important questions—for example, whether the new transport policy would apply to the channel tunnel to bail it out of near bankruptcy and to stop it heading for disaster. I should like the Government to explain the value of all these additional measures with additional expenditure. We know that whenever the EEC has taken new powers and responsibilities there have been additional burdens for the British taxpayer and more damage to the poor people here whom no one seems to bother about.

During the previous debate—my right hon. Friend the Minister of State must have heard this—hon. Members said that the new transport subsidies were wonderful. They seemed to think that the subsidies would bring new ferries, roads and goodness knows what. Most of the money would come from the cohesion fund, which means that nothing would come to us. At the end of the day, however, approval seems to be obtained. Does it make sense to introduce huge additional powers over the environment for the EEC, which will cost a great deal of money and take money from the cohesion fund? That is spelt out clearly at the foot of article 130s. What is the point of it all when it will mean that less money will be available to the Government to do the things that need to be done?

Unfortunately, we get the impression time and again that the Government are hiding things from us. I believe that that is so when it comes to cash. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer was asked time and again recently how much money we were paying in to the EEC. We were given a straight answer—£2·6 billion. That is quite a lot of money. It is £4 per week per family in Britain. Just over a week ago when "Britain in Europe" was published—copies were available in the Vote Office—I found that the sum had changed. Instead of £2·6 billion it had become £1·5 billion. Did other hon. Members notice that? I tabled a question asking why that had happened and I was told that it all depended on how one looked at the sums and added them up.

I have a sneaking feeling that, because Maastricht will cost us a great deal more money, the figures are suddenly being changed. Something very funny is happening. After Edinburgh, the Prime Ministers of all the other countries went back to their people and said, "Look, we are going to be very wealthy because of Edinburgh. We will have lots more money—billions of pounds or dollars". However, both our Government and the German Government told us that it would cost us very little. The sums do not add up.

It would be infinitely better if, instead of introducing silly new provisions that will simply add to expenditure and complexity and will not help the people of Europe or of Britain, the Government tried to persuade the EC to concentrate on solving real problems and on stopping the absurdity of spending £1,000 million of our money this year on growing high-tar tobacco and dumping it in Africa, the third world and eastern Europe.

Mr. Denzil Davies: I wish to speak to the amendments relating to article 130s, which was dealt with ably and comprehensively by our environment spokesman, my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith). I do not know whether the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the right hon. Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones) intends to reply to this debate on the environment. The Minister for Public Transport was present throughout our previous debate, but unfortunately the Government Whip moved the closure motion and the Chair accepted it before the Minister could reply. I thought that to be extremely strange behaviour.

With no disrespect to the Foreign Office Minister, I wonder whether the Government intend to have an Environment Minister here during this debate. We are dealing with a fairly specialised article. I do not suggest that I am an expert on the environment; I intend merely to examine the words of the article. Should not an Environment Minister—it does not have to be the Secretary of State—be present to reply to the debate, especially as a Transport Minister was here for the previous debate, even though he was not given the opportunity to reply? If an Environment Minister were here, with the courtesy of the Government Whip he might be allowed to say something. That would do this important debate the justice that it deserves.

[Mr. Denzil Davies]

The Foreign Office Minister is looking at his notes, no doubt thumbing through the brief from the Department of the Environment with some trepidation. Obviously, he intends to reply to the debate. I hope that he will be given the opportunity to do so. As a former Whip, I do not think that the Government Whips would dare to move the closure and deny the right hon. Gentleman that opportunity. Who knows? As the Bill progresses, that may happen. The Chair has already made some strange decisions, although I will not go into the detail now.

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman's remark is not acceptable to the Chair. The Chair's position on the acceptance of a closure motion is simply what we might call an emergency power to stop absolutely blatant abuse. It is for the Committee to reach a decision on whether it wishes to curtail debate.

Mr. Davies: I may be wrong, but I have always understood that the Chair has a discretion as to whether to accept a closure motion.

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. It is quite true that the Chair has a discretion, but it is of a particular nature and is intended to stop absolutely blatant abuse. It is not intended to indicate when the Committee should end discussion; that is for the Committee to decide.

Mr. Davies: My understanding is that the Chair has a discretion as to whether initially to accept a closure motion. Am I or am I not correct?

The Second Deputy Chairman: Yes, but I tried to describe the circumstances in which the Chair exercises that discretion.

Mr. Davies: But there is discretion and, having sat through these debates, my belief is that it has not been exercised once, in respect of any one of a large cluster of amendments. I do not think that there has been blatant filibustering every time.

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. The right hon. Gentleman's remarks are bordering on criticism of the Chair, which is unacceptable. I ask him to move on to the substantive part of his speech.

Mr. Davies: I will, Dame Janet. I am sorry that my remarks are unacceptable, but, having listened to this debate, they reflect my point of view.

Article 130s is good in parts. We are all in favour of a sound, proper and clean environment, and one country cannot decide matters without the co-operation of others. Pollution knows no frontiers or boundaries within the EEC, or further east, with Poland, Czechoslovakia and other countries. It obviously makes sense for the countries of Europe which enjoy economic and trade co-operation to collaborate in respect of environmental matters.

I welcome the article's provision for unanimity because I see no reason why Europe should not develop on the basis of co-operation between nations. That is a healthier, better, more sensible and more democratic way. The article recognises that.

I refer to those paragraphs dealing with the establishment of some form of tax or another fiscal measure, the choice of different energy sources by member states, and the general structure of energy supply. I infer from paragraph 2 that such matters must be decided by the Council,

"acting unanimously on a proposal from the Commission and"— perfectly properly—

"after consulting the European Parliament and the Economic and Social Committee".

I have no objection to that sensible way of proceeding.

I cannot understand why we cannot proceed in that way in respect of other parts of the treaty and of co-operation between member states in general. That would provide the Community with the democratic base that it will desperately need over the next few years, as the problems of both eastern and western Europe mount and worsen.

The rest of article 130s—here I differ from my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury—refers to qualified majority voting. It is nothing new and has existed for a long time. The votes are, of course, weighted in favour of the larger countries, but qualified majority voting has been extended over the years.

The Single European Act considerably extended the spheres of qualified majority voting. I am not sure whether article 130s also does so—perhaps they always existed in the treaty of Rome, in respect of the environment. Certainly the article reiterates and re-emphasises qualified majority voting in those areas of Community action described in paragraph (1).

It is all very well to say that we favour qualified majority voting, but, as I tried to emphasise when intervening on my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury, it is not only a restriction on sovereignty in theory but imposes a constraint on public expenditure.

Once the Council of Ministers has voted by qualified majority for a course of action, a member state that considered that it was unable to adhere to that course of action but which lost the vote would have to conform. My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury valiantly tried to suggest, "It will be all right—back to negotiations: those guys in the Commission are nice chaps—we can ask for a temporary derogation." When such a derogation is requested, it must be shown that the cost is deemed disproportionate for the public authorities of a member state. I do not know who does the deeming, although I am sure that the Minister of State can tell us: he has his brief with him. Governments like to deem: they do it all the time in Finance Bills. They deem black to be white, and male to be female. Will the Government deem the cost disproportionate? Will the judgment be purely subjective, or will the Government have to prove their case to the Council of Ministers, the Commission or some other body?

Let us assume that the cost is shown to be disproportionate. What does "disproportionate" mean? "Proportionality" is one of the vogue words that have recently crept into general policy. It was originally confined to lawyers, and has been used in judicial review cases: if a Minister's action is disproportionate, a court may strike it down. But what does the word mean in its present context? Is 1 per cent. disproportionate? Is 0·5 per cent? Is it, indeed, a question of percentages? Only lawyers like myself would begin to consider such pedantic matters at 5.15 am. Faced with the broad sweep of the treaty, no one bothers about them much; but we scream and shout when faced with a problem about which we can do nothing.

Even if the cost can be shown to be disproportionate, all that will result is a temporary derogation. My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury suggested that I had put words in his mouth. I did not do so. He said that he was pleased that the derogation would not be permanent. That, of course, would make no sense: as my hon. Friend himself pointed out, a permanent derogation would allow one country to act as a dumping ground while others had to bear the costs—proportionate costs, presumably—of its heinous polluting action. The derogation cannot be too temporary: it cannot be like income tax, which was apparently supposed to be temporary when Addison introduced it long ago.

If all the countries have voted by qualified majority that a certain action is a heinous polluting action, any derogation is likely to be allowed for only a short period. Ultimately, a public authority will have to pay. It says here that the polluter should pay. That is another of those glib, politically correct phrases that are currently in vogue. What does it mean? It means that the polluter writes the cheque, but not that he pays. The taxpayer—the ultimate consumer of goods—will pay, because the cost is handed down.

I am sorry to criticise my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury, but when he says from the Dispatch Box, "We are in favour of the polluter paying", he does not seem to realise that "the polluter" is all of us. We pay through taxation and the prices that we pay in the shops. Eventually, the costs of the tragic accident in the Shetland islands will be paid not by the polluter—the person who steered the ship—but by those who purchase petroleum or use it in the manufacture or distribution of products.

Mr. Chris Smith: I sympathise with my right hon. Friend's point, but he is wrong in one respect. All of us have already paid for the Shetlands event: the cost of compensation, and of covering the tanker's liability, comes out of the international fund to which the tanker owners contribute, and which is levied on the ultimate cost of oil. My right hon. Friend is wrong to attribute future costs to that event.

Mr. Denzil Davies: My point is that eventually a cheque has to be paid by the people who own the tanker. That does not mean, however, that they will bear the cost. It will be handed on, either to an international body or to those who purchase the product. Clarity of language, even in politics, is always useful.

We ought to drop this nonsense phrase. We are all in favour of the polluter pays principle, but the polluter does not pay. We all pay. We shall have to clear up our environment, and that will cost money.

Mr. Rowlands: Earlier my right hon. Friend asked where that phrase came from. It was the Single European Act which introduced that phrase in respect of the environment.

Mr. Davies: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He reads the treaties assiduously.

Qualified majority voting is rather like a charge on the Consolidated Fund. One can do nothing about judges' salaries or payments to the European Community in the public expenditure review, as some of us found out years ago, to our chagrin. One cannot say, "We'll cut judges' pay, or sack a few of them." Years ago it was suggested that we should cut some of the payments to the European Community—that we should stop the cheque, as it were. I see that the Minister of State is aghast at the suggestion. I am obviously breaking the Official Secrets Act by saying that some of us suggested that we should stop the cheque. But we cannot do that, either.

The Treasury always used to frighten junior Ministers with the word "hypothecated." If one made a suggestion of a radical nature, it was hypothecation and therefore not allowed. We find nowadays that more and more public revenue is hypothecated, with 10 per cent. taken out here and 10 per cent. there, with another bit going off to the European Commission and something else going off to NATO. That leaves only a bit to spend on the poor British public—for example, on building schools and hospitals, on social welfare and pensions. The part that is left over grows smaller and smaller.

We are all in favour, so it is said, of qualified majority voting on the environment, but the Government should be allowed to exercise choice. We might decide that we want to put up with some pollution so that a new hospital can be built. A democratically elected Government ought to be allowed to make that choice. They should not be outvoted by other countries, on the basis of qualified majority voting. That is what I believe to be democracy. It is not an old-fashioned desire to cling to the nation state.

Mr. Chris Smith: Does my hon. Friend accept that it is not just a case of making our own decisions about putting up with our own pollution but that the problem with pollution is that, because it spreads across national boundaries, we might end up having to put up with somebody else's pollution that we, as an independent and sovereign nation state, would be unable to do anything about?

Mr. Davies: Indeed, but that is a decision for us to take. The veto should be available so that we can balance the one against the other. My argument is that the unanimity rule should be there to protect the democratic process in this country. Without the unanimity rule, we lose our control. Ministers can hide behind the principle of qualified majority voting. No doubt they have already done so. Ministers of whatever party can say, "We tried very hard at 3 o'clock, 4 o'clock or 5 o'clock in the morning, but the terrible Germans and French outvoted us; however, we did our best." Then we have to pay for it, unless we obtain a temporary derogation.

[Mr. Davies]

My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury was not here for our earlier debate on the cohesion fund, so he can be forgiven for not appreciating immediately that the cohesion fund is restricted to certain countries. Only Spain—the Minister of State is nodding and endorsing this—Portugal, Ireland and Greece can get money from the cohesion fund. GDP figures suggest that, after 10 years of Conservative government, Wales is the poorest region of Britain. It is possible that Wales is poorer than some parts of Spain; I do not know. The Minister of State probably knows that income per head in Spain is approaching 90 per cent. of the United Kingdom average. I imagine that in the major conurbations of Spain income per head is much higher than in parts of Britain, but a clause on the cohesion fund was slotted in to buy Gonzalez off. We in Wales, however, cannot get money to tackle pollution. The Government do not have the money, but my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) and I represent constituencies which have experienced considerable pollution.

Mr. Rowlands: My right hon. Friend is making an important point. The GDP of the communities that we represent in mid-Glamorgan is 72 per cent. of the United Kingdom average, which is lower than Northern Ireland. Some parts of wealthy Spain must be better off, whereas we have had a history of pollution and dereliction, which we have been steadily clearing.

Mr. Davies: If we take 72 per cent. of the United Kingdom figure, we get close to the overall Spanish figure, let alone a figure for the wealthier parts of Spain. It is extremely unfair that the article allows only four countries to benefit from the cohesion fund when often the poorer regions suffer most from environmental pollution, as we know to our cost.

The article is good in parts. With the unanimity rule, it offers a better way forward for Europe. Later, we shall deal with articles that limit the deficit on borrowing to 3 per cent. of GDP. The Government will have to make progress in that direction. Yet we are being asked to approve an article which, in effect, imposes higher expenditure on the Government.

Mr. Rowlands: And the article on transport.

Mr. Davies: Yes, indeed.

Quite a few of the articles will impose additional costs on the Government because they lost a vote in the Council of Ministers. That means an increase in public expenditure.

Mr. Spearing: My right hon. Friend is being very practical. Does he agree that the Council rarely has a vote? The inter-European, round-the-table opinions, the work that is done beforehand and the informal and semi-informal discussions usually make the line-ups very clear. If a country or Minister wants to make a stand on something, the others usually give way on something else. The merits of the matter may be the last consideration. Sometimes, it is not a matter of being outvoted but perhaps of giving something away to gain something else.

5.30 am

Mr. Davies: My hon. Friend makes an important point. I do not know how often what he has outlined happens, but there is presumably a voting procedure which may be followed. My hon. Friend is in fact arguing that the unanimity rule is not perfect because, despite a veto, there is a trade-off. Perhaps even the unanimity rule can be watered down because of the way the bargaining is carried out. However, the unanimity rule is in theory written into the article.

Mr. Spearing: My right hon. Friend is dealing with an important point. Although the former Prime Minister, Lady Thatcher, was an enthusiast in the end—or so she said—for the Single European Act, does he recall that at the Heads of Government meeting that preceded the treaty, she said that she did not think that one was needed, but her veto was not enough?

Mr. Davies: Clearly, the veto cannot always be exercised.

I conclude by referring to the provisions which are

"primarily of a fiscal nature" and which, of course, need unanimity. As I understand it, the Commission currently proposes to levy a carbon tax which presumably comes under paragraph 2 as it is a provision

"primarily of a fiscal nature".

I see that my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney is agreeing with me.

I hope that I shall not be out of order if I say that I hope that there will be complete resistance to the nonsense of a carbon tax. We are trying to save our coal mines while the Commission makes such a foolish proposal. Being an irresponsible body—I use the word "irresponsible" in its true sense—the European Parliament will no doubt pass it. However, I hope that the Government—I know that my hon. Friends will support them and I can even speak for the Opposition Front Bench—will be wholly opposed to any suggestion of a carbon tax, which would go against all that we are trying to do to save the coal industry. That reinforces my argument that the unanimity argument, which is in paragraph 2—at least in theory—is sensible because it prevents nonsense such as a carbon tax being imposed on us to the considerable detriment of the mining industry and of our industry in general.

Article 130s is good in parts, but let us have more about unanimity and proper democratic co-operation between states.

Mr. Knapman: I agree with much of what the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) said, especially with regard to the notion that the polluter pays; in the end, it is the consumer who pays. He cited the example of the tanker—if there is a claim on the insurance company, the premium is increased, which affects the price of the product. That is eminently sensible, and I am sorry that the Labour Front Bench cannot understand that.

I have been examining the provisional selection of amendments, which cover so many important subjects—industrial, consumer, commercial, agricultural, market, network, transport, telecommunications, energy, health and environmental issues. However, we did not know that that they would all be debated in one day. For those people who read the more serious newspapers, I wonder what the British public will make of today's business when they see the House of Commons trying to debate all those issues in one day and starting a fresh group of amendments at 4 am.

I draw a few issues to the Minister's attention. One could not accuse our European leaders of thinking small —article 3 states that they wish for "a policy in the sphere of the environment".

If we add to that article 130r, we have quite a lot on environmental policy and the cost of it.

Paragraph 4 of article 130s says:

"Without prejudice to certain measures of a Community nature, the Member States shall finance and implement the environment policy."

Every time I look at the treaty, I see expense, yet I see no money resolution. Can my right hon. Friend the Minister give us any idea of what the costs of the environmental programme will be? If he cannot give us costs for the whole programme, perhaps he can give us the costs for parts of it that may have been discussed recently.

The proposals go far. Article 130r says:

"Community policy ... shall contribute to ... the following objectives:

—preserving, protecting and improving the quality of the environment;

—protecting human health;

—prudent and rational utilisation of natural resources"—

whatever that means—

"promoting measures at international level to deal with regional or worldwide environmental problems."

No aspect of human life is left out of the title. Every nook and cranny is invaded.

What will the cost be, especially to the British taxpayer? If it is necessary to put up taxes in a few weeks' time, I shall support it as an unfortunate necessity. But if my constituents think that their taxes will go up to pay for these proposals, there will be a very much more difficult message to sell.

I was totally quiet on the first group of amendments. I presume that the dawn is breaking over the Thames, so it seems a suitable time to discuss the ozone layer. I believe that I am right in saying that under the Maastricht treaty, EC policies for the environment will be decided by qualified majority vote by the Council of Ministers.

I sometimes wonder—my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) is right—whether the state of the environment in the Community is rather better than the Commission likes to suggest. I recently read a newspaper article that suggested that just as the biggest nuisances in the 19th century were the Luddites, there is every chance that the biggest nuisances in the 20th century will be the greens.

Already a large volume of environmental law has been passed, which is likely to be added to. The new proposals could prove to be an excuse for protectionism. We have so many environmental projects, especially in the Mediterranean countries. To me and to many of my hon. Friends, many of those projects look like bribes for support through the cohesion fund.

The enforcement of EC environmental policy is geographically uneven and unfair. The policy is both bureaucratic and over-influenced by pressure groups. Most of us can look at our postbags and agree that that is so. The Community does not have a civil service as we do. We find that the vast sums are dominated by the bigotry of centralised planning and control.

Under the Maastricht treaty, environment becomes a sector of policy decided by qualified majority, as we have already decided. That was to be expected because the environment was a natural target for Community action. Pollution knows no frontiers. I was much intrigued by the intervention by my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) who asked about pollution on the Rhine. The polluter will pay there, although it will be difficult to make Switzerland pay. I gather that there is quite a lot of pollution on the Rhine because pollution apparently does not all occur in the British Isles. If there were pollution on the Rhine, how would the responsibility for that pollution be split up? In any particular case, how would the problem be dealt with? How would the responsibility be split up if Switzerland were not prepared to pay?

The Single European Act assumes that the increased output anticipated as a result of the falling of economic barriers at the end of last year should correspondingly add to pollution. That assumption is not justified on the record of the 1970s and 1980s when the pollution of all market economies fell substantially. The best way to achieve improvements is through market forces.

In respect of unleaded petrol, we have seen that the only way in which one needed to make an environmental improvement was to make unleaded petrol cheaper and leaded petrol dearer. Very shortly afterwards, that did the trick.

Mr. Chris Smith: The hon. Gentleman said that that did the trick. It certainly helped, but it did not achieve the objective of changing people's consumption of petrol to unleaded. It raised the consumption of unleaded to 30 per cent. of the market, but it did not do the trick.

Mr. Knapman: The two choices are to allow market forces to settle the matter or to pass laws. By making unleaded petrol cheaper, a large proportion of demand opted for unleaded. As newer cars come onto the market, even more cars will run on unleaded petrol. I believe that that is a very sensible way to approach matters. However, from the intervention of the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith), I assume that he does not believe that that is a sensible approach.

Mr. Chris Smith: The hon. Gentleman must not misunderstand me. I simply entered a slight caveat to his apparent implication that there had somehow been a wholesale switch to unleaded petrol as a result of the price differential. The price differential has undoubtedly helped. It is a good thing and something which we have supported consistently. We have urged, and continue to urge, the Chancellor of the Exchequer to widen the differential still further to increase the use of unleaded petrol.

Mr. Knapman: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making that clear. My colleagues and I are often not sure whether to accept what the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury says from the Opposition Front Bench or to read the amendments in the name of Labour Front-Bench spokesmen. However, I was very glad to hear that the hon. Gentleman has such faith in market forces.

A more telling reason for increased interest in Brussels in the environment is its increased popularity and emotive appeal. That was reflected in an opinion poll in 1988 which showed that three quarters of EEC citizens believed that environmental problems were immediate and urgent and then reaffirmed that view by the election of 30 members of the Green party in 1989.

[Mr. Knapman]

By then, the greener approach to Community policy was already enshrined in an environmental impact directive of 3 July 1988 which called for ecological awareness to be part of the planning and decision-making process in all sectors and notably in agriculture, oil, energy, transport, tourism and regional development. The practical effect of that was that certain categories of project—for example, crude oil refineries and new motorways—were made subject to impact assessments to identify their affects on human beings, fauna and flora, soil, water, air, landscape and the cultural heritage.

European Commission information handouts suggest that its citizens suffer from serious environmental problems. However, I suspect that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay said, some of those warnings should be taken with a large pinch of salt. With the election of the Greens and all the advice, we must be very careful where we go from here if we are not to make some industries totally uncompetitive.

The Commission has a vested interest in exaggerating the problems as justification for extending its own powers. However, an official 10-year inquiry in America concluded that there was no definite causal link between acid rain and dying forests—indeed, the damage to German forests is now thought to have been done by drought—that acid rain has no apparent effect on lakes, buildings, human health or agriculture and that it might even contribute to soil fertility. The impact on rivers of the growing use of nitrogen fertilisers by farmers, though, seems to be genuine enough, but the blame should be placed squarely on the production incentives built into the common agricultural policy.

5.45 am

We need to examine the legal position which perhaps the right hon. Member for Llanelli is better qualified than I to examine. Until 1987, when the Single European Act came into effect, there was no explicit legal provision for Community action. In spite of that, more than 100 directives and other legal instruments were adopted in the 15 preceding years under article 100 of the Rome treaty and the catch-all article 235. The Single European Act spells out the need for the Community to achieve a high level of environmental protection, but its insistence that it must be combined with free trade has a somewhat hypocritical ring and should sound a warning that protecting the environment could become an excuse for restricting trade.

There was a case before the European Court of Justice on 20 September 1988. In this respect, the outcome of the Danish bottle case, as it is known, looks ominous. The court found that the Danish system of requiring returnable containers for beer was indeed a restraint on trade, but that it was justified on the ground of environmental protection. Even to the mildly cynical, that looks more like protection of the bottle industry against competition from aluminium cans than environmental concern. The powers of revision granted to the European Parliament where proposals are submitted under article 100a are likely to favour a radical environmental policy. That has been the record to date.

On finance, I asked my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Health to give a few figures to sleep on tonight. I understand that about 1·2 billion ecu was earmarked for environmental projects in 1989-93. Of course, much of that will be channelled through the European regional development fund and the European investment bank. It would be interesting to know the cost of the environmental ranking of the current EEC engineering project in the Missolonghi marshes in Greece, where Byron died. That project is widely considered to be a scandalous devastation of one of the finest wetlands and wildlife sanctuaries in Europe. Numerous other programmes have been designed for the depressed coastal areas of the Community. Although those schemes are claimed to be intended to improve the quality of life of the inhabitants, that aim is perhaps subordinate to the political need to bribe the Governments of those countries to support federalist initiatives.

Nor should we forget the enforcement that we have had to date. In 1989, there was considerable annoyance in Britain at the Commission bringing us before the European Court of Justice for infringing EC standards of purity of drinking water. Britain was not alone in being arraigned. Currently, there is even more concern that although our drinking water is actually purer than bottled water sold in supermarkets, we are required to make it still purer, and that will double water charges to the householder over 10 years. That is largely due to EC regulations.

The worry, as with other directives, is that British officials—in this case, the National Rivers Authority—take compliance much more seriously than their continental counterparts in Europe do. It is difficult for those of us who travel in Italy, Portugal and elsewhere to think that those countries regard such directives in the same serious—not to say pedantic—way. It is absolutely absurd for Britain to be treated as the dirty man of Europe when the local river in Brussels, which takes away untreated sewage from the Commission's headquarters, flows on totally unchecked. Nor is the European Commission free from its own propaganda. It evidently considers it its duty to mobilise public opinion behind a forward policy for the environment. To that end, it organised and financed the European Year of the Environment and provided support for the European Environmental Bureau—a Brussels-based lobby group linking more than 100 organisations in member states.

The Commission also encourages citizens to make complaints. It is the Commission's practice to accept drafts from interested parties helping to frame laws. That is dangerous territory and verges on a conspiracy of bureaucrats, bootleggers and baptists to promote legislation to further their mutual interests and powers at the taxpayers' and consumers' expense.

Those of us who voted against the Ten o'clock motion need make no apology for keeping the Committee up until this time of night. Given the amount of amendments that we had to discuss, we should be being extremely generous were we not to insist on a further hour and a half's debate on the motion to adjourn the consideration of the Bill. We have to rely entirely on your protection, Dame Janet, to ensure the number of hours that the Committee sits. If such a number of amendments come before the Committee again, it should be taken for granted that we shall discuss any adjournment motion on the Bill in detail for 90 minutes, whatever the time of day or night.

Mr. Rowlands: One of the most mundane and wearying, but essential tasks that the Committee has to conduct is to check what we are passing, and test what we are buying when we buy the Maastricht treaty, rather than the previous treaties. The best evidence to justify that statement has been presented, I am sorry to say, by some Conservative Members who have all but quarrelled among themselves over what they did or did not buy when they agreed to the Single European Act.

If we were honest with ourselves, we would have to admit that, with notable exceptions—I was not one of them—no one suspected the truly radical character of that Act. A large majority of hon. Members did not fully appreciate the coach and horses that would be driven through in the name of that Act, which was mainly presented—I think, by both the Front-Bench teams—as more of a technical measure to stimulate the market and clarify the position. I know that there were exceptions—I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) was one of them—but I cannot remember heavy three-line Whips or cases being put as strongly as they have been in our present discussions.

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): I sat through discussions on both the Bills. As I said earlier, I must have committed a horrible crime to have been landed with dealing with this one. I led from the Front Bench on discussions on the Single European Act, and made it absolutely clear that we were debating a matter of considerable importance—a trail blazer. I made it clear that the decisions that we were taking in relation to the Single European Act would formidably change the Community's nature. I remember speaking in the guillotine debate with my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) when we both made precisely that point. My hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) should exonerate the Labour Front-Bench team.

Mr. Rowlands: Given my hon. Friend's observations, I exonerate our Front-Bench team. If the Act was trail-blazing, it was obvious that a number of hon. Members—particularly Conservative Members—did not know which trail was being blazed. They are now discovering the trail's destination.

Sir Teddy Taylor: While I accept what the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) says—he was present through the night when we discussed that Bill—and as it was, as he said, a matter of great importance, will he give us an explanation at some time as to why only 46 Labour Members turned up to vote against its Third Reading? I accept that that was more than the number of Conservative Members who voted against it, but I should have thought that as it was such an important Bill, more than 46 Labour Members would have turned up for the vote on the Friday morning after the all-night sitting.

Mr. Rowlands: The hon. Gentleman reminds us of an important event. I was only drawing attention to my guilt —and that of others—and to my decision that on no account would I make the same mistake again. One of our tasks in this historic Committee stage is to make sure that we understand the text to which we are agreeing. I want to speak, therefore, not about the general principles of these articles but about the differences between them and the articles in the two previous treaties of the past 30 years.

Mr. Spearing: The Single European Act and the Maastricht Bill are amending treaties. This Bill is short but dense. Amendments tabled to it refer to a treaty that already amends another treaty. Quite properly, the amendments are grouped under subject headings, but they are not easy to follow, the more so since articles in this treaty often refer to articles in other treaties. All in all, it is impossible to know what we are voting for.

Mr. Rowlands: My hon. Friend describes the peculiar legislative labyrinth through which we must pick our way. Unlike proceedings on a normal Bill, with this one we cannot see how amendments will alter the text of the main or previous Acts. We must plough our way back through three treaties in the course of considering a three-clause Bill that seeks to incorporate a treaty lock, stock and barrel in our legislation. There is, therefore, a special case for scrutinising the Bill even more closely than we usually would.

For the purposes of this discussion I shall refer for comparisons to Cmd. 455, published in September 1988. it incorporates the treaty of Rome as well as the Single European Act amendments to it—they are helpfully provided in footnotes to each page. I should like to compare the treaty of Maastricht with the treaty of Rome and the Single European Act so as to identify what has been included, what omitted and what added.

Once we let these articles through they will automatically become part of our legislation. Comparing article 130r with the relevant article, as amended by article 25 of the Single European Act—as it, in turn, amended the original treaty—we find that at least the first three listed objectives are exactly the same as those in the Single European Act treaty. But let us immediately note that the fourth objective is an addition. The article refers to,

"promoting measures at international level to deal with regional or worldwide environmental problems."

That is a perfectly desirable additional objective. I hope that the Minister who replies to the debate will provide answers to our questions. The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the right hon. Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones), is carrying the major part of the burden for the Bill.

6 am

In the debate on the article dealing with industry, the Minister did not identify what was new and what was old in the article. We later discovered that the article contained a key element that was different. This time we shall ask specific questions and hope that we get specific answers. My first question is how the fourth objective was included in the Maastricht treaty. Secondly, what is its parentage and who was behind it? Thirdly, was it based on a collective view? It is obviously compatible with the mood of Rio.

Obviously, it is desirable to promote "measures at international level to deal with regional or worldwide environmental problems."

But what suddenly caused that to enter the Maastricht treaty when it was not in the Single European Act that was passed five or six years ago?

Paragraph 2 of the new article 130r includes half of the relevant section of the Single European Act. My hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) spoke forcefully last week about the precautionary principle which is additional to the Single European Act. However, the principle of preventive action is not. Article 130r states:

"environmental damage should as a priority be rectified at source and . . . the polluter should pay . . .".

My hon. Friend gave the impression that the notion that the polluter should pay was a new doctrine, but it was in the Single European Act. Paragraph 2 of article 130r contains a revised version of what was in the Single European Act. It states:

"Environmental protection requirements must be integrated into the definition and implementation of other Community policies."

What does that mean? The original text simply said:

"Environmental protection requirements shall be a component of the Community's other policies."

I am sure that, like me, many hon. Members wonder why words are changed. What is the significance of changing a rather simple sentence about environmental protection requirements being a component to,

"Environmental protection requirements must be integrated into the definition and implementation of other Community policies"?

Was it done for clarification, does it incorporate a supplementary thought or does the wording introduce a slightly different principle? I am not sufficiently qualified to decide, but I should like the Minister to explain the alteration. I am curious about that, but I am much more curious about the remaining part of paragraph 2, because the addition compared with the Single European Act is completely new. It is almost gobbledegook. It states:

"In this context, harmonization measures answering these requirements shall include, where appropriate, a safeguard clause allowing Member States to take provisional measures, for non-economic environmental reasons, subject to a Community inspection procedure."

That is new. May I have illustrations of the type of problem that Ministers or the distinguished Heads of State who put those words in the draft treaty envisaged? May we have an illustration of "non-economic environmental reasons" why member states should undertake measures? What was the driving force behind putting those words into a sombre draft treaty?

What about the tacked-on bit:

"subject to a Community inspection procedure"?

What will be the nature of such an inspection? I cannot find anything in the Single European Act about such inspection powers, let alone a procedure. Where is it laid down? Who describes it? What happens when the Commission turns up to conduct its inspection?

Those questions arise because the wording is completely new, and adds something to the functions and tasks of the Commission. Given that we have been told the treaty as something which will strip down the powers of the Commission through subsidiarity, I am surprised to find, running right through chunks of it, the Commission being given new responsibilities for investigating every nook and cranny, particularly on the economic and monetary side.

Even leaving aside those two paragraphs of article 130r, we have questions to which I do not know the answers. We should not approve the article until we get answers from responsible Ministers who understand the meaning of it, and can explain why the extra provisions had to be made in the treaty in 1992, which will be incorporated into our legislation if we agree to the Bill.

Those are my initial queries on article 130r. There are also amendments to article 130s. My right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) scrutinised the substance of the article, and I shall deal with the wording and presentation of it. There are huge differences between it and the original article 130s in the Single European Act. That simply says:

"The Council, acting unanimously on a proposal from the Commission and after consulting the European Parliament and the Economic and Social Committee, shall decide what action is to be taken by the Community.

The Council shall, under the conditions laid down in the preceding subparagraph, define those matters on which decisions are to be taken by a qualified majority."

The huge new article 130s sets out a whole new ball game. My right hon. Friend has already touched on some of its paragraphs. They pave the way for fiscal provisions and for "measures concerning town and country planning, land use with the exception of waste management and measures of a general nature, and management of water resources".

Has paragraph 2 got a parentage?

Does any part of it come from any other parts of the previous two treaties? I find it difficult to discover from where the provisions come. Are they new provisions? If so, why do we need them? Why should there be introduced into the treaty additional provisions which were deemed not to be necessary four or five years ago? I am not opposing them; I am not suggesting that they are wrong. I merely want to know why we are being asked to adopt them and to identify the true nature and import of the proposed changes that we are being asked to endorse.

The Minister of State is now in his place on the Government Front Bench, but he missed my initial request. I hope that the Under-Secretary of State for Health took a note of it to pass to the right hon. Gentleman. We need a line-by-line explanation, which we were not given during our consideration of the industry and transport articles. The Minister of State failed to give us a full explanation of why certain articles have been added to and changed since they appeared in the previous two treaties.

Mr. Spearing: Does my hon. Friend agree that the comparative exercise to which he is drawing our attention, which involves articles 130r and 130s, should have been put before us in a White Paper? When we consider domestic Bills in Committee, notes on clauses tell us why a section in earlier legislation is being amended or changed and what the effect of the amendments or changes will be. In other words, they would have provided us with a full commentary, as it were, and set out the comparisons to which my hon. Friend is drawing our attention. I agree that it is right that my hon. Friend should ask the Minister to justify the Government's position, but surely the explanation should have been given to the nation six months ago.

Mr. Rowlands: My hon. Friend has introduced an important consideration. Over the years, when considering Bills in Committee, I have found that the quality of notes on clauses varies. Sometimes they are almost repetitions of the clauses themselves. They are of variable quality and value. Their quality varies from Department to Department and from Minister to Minister, but in some instances I have found the notes to be of value. My hon. Friend has made a suggestion which I think we should take up with the Minister, even at this late stage. The production of such assistance might curtail much of the textual analysis to which I have been driven. That might well happen if we have notes on articles that explain why some provisions differ from those that are set out in the Single European Act.

It is far better, however, for the explanation to be in Hansard where it belongs, so that it is the property of everyone. It would promote discussion, however, and possibly expedite it, if the Minister of State took on board the constructive suggestion of my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing). When we draw stumps on this group of amendments, or on later ones the right hon. Gentleman might then endeavour to produce a note on each article to identify the character and nature of the changes that are being made. A modest amount of detail would save the laborious textual analysis that I have had to undertake.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The hon. Gentleman has been kind enough to suggest that if that information were available it would be quite likely to curtail debate. Perhaps he will discuss the matter with his right hon. and hon. Friends and then take it up with the usual channels. It is not a matter for me, but I dare say that the usual channels would be extremely interested if he were able to deliver a curtailment of debate of the sort that he is talking about.

Mr. Rowlands: I can only speak for myself. I would not have undertaken the exercise in which I have been engaged for some minutes if I had had a note on the article that gave me the information for which I am asking the Minister. Instead, I have to ask the Minister to explain the meaning of and the background to the changes before we can reach a judgment.

6.15 am

Sir Teddy Taylor: As my right hon. Friend the Minister has made a sensible and useful offer, should those of us who have been asking questions—not holding up the Committee—ask him to start with the words in article 130s:

"provisions primarily of a fiscal nature"?

Does the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) agree that that is a good starting point to say to the Minister, "Tell us what that means"? Does it mean a tax on the environment? Should we tell him that we are interested in deals to help to speed up the Bill's passage? In return, he could tell us what those six words actually mean. What is the scope and what is involved? If he can answer that, it will be a great start.

Mr. Rowlands: It would be a good start, but I have a further important request relating to paragraph 2 of article 130s. I am alarmed by the statement:

"measures significantly affecting a Member State's choice between different energy sources and the general structure of its energy supply."

Where did that proposal come from; what is behind it? Is it included in either of the two previous treaties? I cannot find those words in them. What do they really mean? We must remember that they are in the context of a good environment.

Does the proposal mean that the EC is trying to restrict the choices of member states in which energy policies they pursue? Is it suggesting that, for example, there is dirty brown coal in some parts of the Community that should not be mined and used to create power? Has it any nuclear connotation? Perhaps my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith), who is so knowledgeable in these matters, will enlighten me.

Mr. Chris Smith: I am sure that my hon. Friend recognises that the paragraph ensures that all the choices about the balance between coal, nuclear and other forms of energy production will remain matters for unanimous voting in the Council of Ministers, rather than simply majority voting. Therefore, an individual member state can preserve its individual decisions in all those matters.

Mr. Rowlands: I had not come to the question of how the choices would be ultimately decided. We have been asked to endorse a power over the way that we exercise our choice. I remind my hon. Friend of the operative words of the paragraph:

"acting unanimously on a proposal from the Commission".

Therefore, once again, the Commission is to initiate the member state's choice—not some collective European choice—between different energy sources. It is first to be reported on and recommended by the Commission.

I thought and believed that, if nothing else, until today we had managed to decide ourselves whether we wanted to build coal-fired or nuclear power stations, whether we wanted to continue with the new range of gas licences or whether we wanted to embark on exciting new energy conservation measures and combined heat and power schemes. If I am wrong, perhaps someone will correct me, but I had thought that those had been very much at the heart of the energy argument.

When I served as a Front-Bench energy spokesman for six years, we debated the relative merits of our respective energy resources, but that was never deemed to be anything but a matter of democratic choice. It was not for others to tell us what we should do. Occasionally, Energy Commissioners would produce the odd discussion paper, but no one believed that the choice was anything but our own.

Given the crucial decisions that the Government and Parliament will have to make in the next few weeks and months, which could have a profound effect on jobs in many of our communities and those communities' futures, we are entitled to ask whether this is a new power to be vested in the Council, albeit by unanimous decision, so that it will determine the respective balances of energy requirements and needs within the United Kingdom.

Mr. Spearing: My hon. Friend is making an extremely good speech, but it will be helped by a dialogue. Surely the answer to his last question is yes. Both Parliament and the public have failed to grasp that a veto and unanimity do not necessary afford the protection that people imagine. Conservative Members and the Government may agree to the balance of energy that they apparently now favour at a meeting of the Council of Ministers subsequent to the passing of the treaty, but if a subsequent Government took a different view—or even if the present Government were converted by experience or persuasion—they could not change that balance back again. Although unanimity is projected as a protection, it only works once, and then it becomes a ratchet.

Mr. Rowlands: My hon. Friend is extremely knowledgeable in such matters, and rightly issued a warning. I am deeply concerned about the extent to which it is a new responsibility. I cannot find the same words in the treaty of Rome or the Single European Act. If the Minister tells me that they are not new but are provisions common to the treaty of Rome and to the Single European Act, I shall reconsider.

Given my understanding of the potential import of that wording, and coming as I do from communities that have been deeply involved in the debate, dilemmas and choices of energy supply, I do not believe that we can let those words, and the additional requirements in article 130s, go through on the nod if they introduce a new aspect to the balance between the environment and energy supply that is not to be found in the treaty of Rome or the Single European Act.

The Minister may say, "You've gone overboard with this argument. This is a common form of wording that we have lived with for the past 30 years." If he does, at least I will be satisfied. However, I will not be satisfied without a proper explanation, and I am not prepared to vote for and support article 130s, if, as I fear, it is a new bridgehead that will infringe or damage in any shape or form the democratic choice and decisions of the Government of the United Kingdom and of other member states in deciding the balance of their energy supplies and their relationship to the environment.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Having listened to and enjoyed this debate for more than 14 hours, I am glad to have this opportunity, for the first time, to participate briefly. I do not intend to speak for any length of time. There are rumours going around the Tea Room and other places that it is the fault of my hon. Friends and myself that right hon. and hon. Members are having to stay up all night. The contrary is true. We voted in favour of bringing the debate to a close at a reasonable time, at 10 o'clock—some six and a half hours ago. It is unacceptable that such important debates should be taking place at this late hour. There has been no filibustering, and there have been no over-lengthy speeches on either side of the Committee. I have been here throughout the debate. I do not know why the Government did not report progress earlier, so that we could hold our debate at an appropriate time and allow others to join in.

I should also have liked to vote on amendment No. 4. Imagine my shock when I found that the Opposition not only did not plan to vote, but had been speaking against their own amendment! I should not have been shocked, of course; they did exactly the same on amendments Nos 1 and 2. My shock turned to horror, however, when I observed that Labour Members were to lead debate on the next 15 groups of amendments. In view of the nature of some of those amendments, I suspect that the same thing will happen. It is all a bit of a farce: what is the Labour party up to?

Mr. Chris Smith: What the Labour party is up to is ensuring that we can have good-quality, considered debate on essential parts of the Maastricht treaty. Because of the way in which the procedures of the House operate, the only way in which we can debate parts of the treaty that we support is by tabling amendments that seek to delete them. This is purely a device to ensure that we can debate, for example, important environmental considerations which Labour strongly supports. It is the only way of securing a public airing of such matters where it ought to take place—here in the House of Commons.

Mr. Spicer: I find Labour's whole strategy very mysterious, not only in regard to amendments but in regard to voting. Labour seems to be on a three-line whip, while managing to slip people mysteriously into the night when the going gets rough.

I can understand the position of other parties. For instance, the Liberals' support for a federal Europe is entirely understandable, although I do not agree with it. The position of Conservative Front Benchers saddens me, but I understand it. However, I cannot understand the chicanery that is going on in the Labour party.

I should have liked to vote on the amendment, because I think that removing article 129 is a good idea. I am also opposed to the shift in environmental provisions. As the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) pointed out, those provisions are fairly obscure; the hon. Gentleman asked a number of worthwhile questions, which I hope will be answered fully.

For many years, the Community has been experiencing a shift of emphasis. I accept that the amendments do not relate to a black and white change: we are not discussing issues such as, for instance, the single currency, which represents a generic jump forward. I remember going to the Council of Ministers as an Energy Minister. My hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South-West (Mr. Butcher) made an enlightening speech about his experience as a Minister.

When I was the Minister for Aviation and also when I was the Under-Secretary of State for Energy there were four points on the agenda. The first was the British position: to try to develop a freer trading common market. That was shot down as anti-communautaire. The second point was, typically, either Commission inspired or Franco-German inspired. It related usually to directives concerned with the environment or safety regulations. In the case of energy, it related particularly to environmental matters. That was considered to be pro-communautaire and was readily accepted.

The third point tended to be the press release in which we pointed out that we were shifting the emphasis away from the market-oriented matters towards directives—in this case towards environmental matters—as against trying to obtain a freer flow of energy between countries. The fourth point concerned the bribes or handouts to the Portuguese, the Greeks, the Irish and so on who had supported the Franco-German position. That was the way in which Council of Ministers meetings tended to function.

One could argue about how pure the British position was, and about the genesis of the move towards political union, but for many years the British position was that the trading possibilities within the European Community should be emphasised. For some time, however, others have been shifting the emphasis away from trade, the freer movement of goods and competition, towards an emphasis that has little to do with trade. I could not agree more that co-operation on environmental matters between countries makes sense. I agree wholeheartedly with what my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) said—that we are considering boundaries wider than those of the European Community. The point was made that the former eastern bloc poses a particular environmental problem.

6.30 am

Mr. Jessel: Does my hon. Friend agree that that applies also to the control of drug trafficking, an extremely serious matter which is referred to in article 129 of the treaty? How can we control drug trafficking if we confine it to the countries of the European union? It is nonsense that the European union should be concerned with the prevention of drug trafficking. A much wider international organisation is required to deal with that problem.

Mr. Spicer: My hon. Friend has made two extremely good points. I agree with him completely. It is germane to argue that there should be a new, centralised competence for the environment and for drug trafficking, on the basis that it is ridiculous to exclude boundaries beyond the competence of the European Community, especially in the case of the environment when it comes to the former eastern European countries.

Mr. Chris Smith: I must point out that article 130r specifically does not exclude the interests and needs of other countries. If the hon. Gentleman looks at paragraph 4 he will see that it says:

"Within their respective spheres of competence, the Community and the Member States shall co-operate with third countries".

The provisions of the treaty, as drafted, clearly permit and encourage the Community and its constituent member states to provide the sort of assistance to eastern Europe that the hon. Gentleman has in mind.

Mr. Spicer: That is perfectly true, but one must differentiate, as the hon. Gentleman did, between competence and co-operation. Anybody can agree about co-operation. Most members of the Committee would accept a statement of co-operation, but there is all the difference in the world between increased competence and co-operation. That distinction must be drawn to hon. Members' attention. My concern is that the treaty proposes a further shift of emphasis from market methods to matters that have little to do with the market.

In an intervention at the beginning of the debate, my right hon. Friend the Minister of State accepted that shift of emphasis. He then said that it was balanced by the issue of subsidiarity. That was the point which I thought he was making.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Fortunately, I have my speaking note here. I said not that it was a minor shift but that it represented a significant strengthening of the Community's environmental policies. I did not mention subsidiarity, although article 3b applies across the treaty. I do not want my hon. Friend to be in any doubt about that. It represents a significant strengthening of the Community's environmental policies.

Mr. Spicer: That is fine. At least my right hon. Friend is not making the point that he made in previous debates, when he said that there was no change. On this group of amendments, he is saying that there is significant change. That gives me further cause for concern. His notes may be better than my memory, but I was fairly certain, although Hansard will confirm tomorrow, that he went on to say that the shift was countervailed by questions of subsidiarity. If he did not say it, I have heard others argue that we can afford this shift to centralisation of competence on environmental, health and other matters because it is counteracted by subsidiarity.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Was not it unfortunate that the Minister referred to the "strengthening" of environmental powers? Should not he have said the "extension" of environmental powers? Will he be a little more careful with his language? If we are to make further rapid progress, Ministers must say things as they are. We are talking about not the strengthening but the extension of powers, and there is a big difference.

Mr. Spicer: That is a good point, to which my right hon. Friend will reply if he feels it appropriate to do so.

I wish to say two further things about subsidiarity. First, if the Government feel that they developed a new approach to refining subsidiarity at Edinburgh, should not they include the new concepts and refinements in the terms of the treaty, because the article that currently refers to subsidiarity is acknowledged to be inadequate in legal and other terms? Do they not have a duty, if they feel that they made progress on subsidiarity, to include this matter in the terms of the treaty?

Secondly, and more fundamentally in the context of environmental issues, where subsidiarity has been used as a counterpoise to the new trend toward greater centralisation, the Government have a duty to respond more than they have, and to argue carefully why subsidiarity does not mean greater centralisation. Someone will have to explain how or why one view is taken about, for example, the Winchester bypass and another is taken about the EC's involvement in Oxleas wood. It seems that subsidiarity applies differently even within the competence of environmental issues.

The question immediately arises, "Who is to determine how subsidiarity is to be applied?" The answer can be found only in the treaty, and the only people to determine such matters are the institutions of the European Community—the court and the Commission. In that case, subsidiarity compounds the trends towards greater centralisation on environmental issues instead of leading to a devolution of power of a balancing of those trends, and the Government should come clean about it.

I have not heard anything that counteracts my view. Indeed, the Minister confirmed my worst fears of a shift towards centralisation on matters on which, until a few years ago, it was British policy to say that we were not party to the EC's overall objectives. We have moved so far and so fast, and the Minister has confirmed that the treaty merely exacerbates the process. For that reason, I should have liked the Labour party to press its amendments, because it is on the right track. It is extraordinary that the Labour party has tabled such good amendments, against which it then argues.

Mr. George Robertson: It might save time later and save the hon. Gentleman making the same speech again, if I say that there is no possibility of the Labour party pressing the amendments, because they would remove from the treaty the very things that it campaigned hardest to get in, to which the Government were most resistant before copping out when they got to Maastricht. The hon. Gentleman should not be so disingenuous as to pretend that the amendments are anything other than pegs on which to hang debates; he is making careful use of them. We are certainly not going to press amendments which would remove from the treaty what we most sincerely want to keep in it.

Mr. Spicer: That sounds as if the Labour party was rather lazy in drafting its amendments: it was not really interested in trying to improve the treaty but merely sought to table large groups of probing amendments. It is a very easy trick, and I have used it myself. One simply copies a chunk of the Bill and tables an amendment, which can be debated. It is a sloppy way of trying to initiate a debate. I might repeat my speech—it depends on how the Labour party performs in the following 20 or so debates resulting from the strange amendments against which they will now argue. I have said enough, and made my point.

Mr. Garel-Jones: May I say en passant—as they might say in the Community—that I am surprised that my hon. Friend the Member for Worcestershire, South (Mr. Spicer) should be so shocked by the device of the probing amendment. In my brief experience of Committee work, it is a standard practice. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) for having made it clear that these are probing amendments which have given us the opportunity for a debate.

I assume both from the speech by the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury and from the fact that no hon. Members have dwelt for long on it that the health chapter meets with the acquiescence of the Committee.

In essence, the amendments would dilute the very positive gains that the treaty represents for the environment. Those gains were commended by the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury and I think that they would be commended by most right hon. and hon. Members. The highest possible level of environmental protection is the very least that our citizens expect. That is what the Maastricht treaty will provide when it is ratified. We would not wish—I am delighted that this is the position of the Opposition, including the Liberal Democrats—to see the important principles established in the treaty removed or compromised.

Mr. Spearing: Will the Minister give way?

6.45 am

Mr. Garel-Jones: Not for the moment.

Maastricht maintains the existing objectives of Community environmental policy, and refers to

"—preserving, protecting and improving the quality of the environment;

—protecting human health;

—prudent and rational utilization of natural resources".

It adds a new objective:

"promoting measures at international level to deal with regional or worldwide environmental problems."

That recognises the significant contribution that the Community now makes to global environmental issues, such as last summer's conference in Rio.

Community environmental policy hitherto has been based on the principle that preventive action should be taken, that environmental damage should be rectified at source and that the polluter should pay. Maastricht builds on those principles, providing for "sustainable and non-inflationary growth respecting the environment", and ensuring that the principle of a high level of protection of the environment is extended from internal market measures to environmental policy generally.

Maastricht has also added—the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury welcomed this—the precautionary principle. That wise step will ensure that measures may be taken to avert a potential environmental threat, although there may be some uncertainty concerning the nature of the threat or its effects. The inclusion of the principle means that there has been a shift of emphasis from whether action should be taken to considerations of which measure should be taken and when.

A particular concern during the British presidency was to promote the idea of the integration of environmental concerns into other areas of Community policy. Maastricht reinforces the existing commitment under the Single European Act so that environmental protection requirements will no longer simply be a component of other Community policies, but must now be integrated into the definition and implementation of other Community policies. That may, from time to time involve difficult decisions in, for example, balancing economic needs with environmental ones.

The treaty represents a major step forward. We are especially keen to see the principle put into practice. We firmly believe that environmental policies must be built into other policies, such as agriculture and transport, if we are to tackle the world's environmental problems effectively. We welcome the extension of qualified majority voting to the majority of items to be adopted under article 130s, as that will allow the European Parliament a greater voice.

Unanimous voting by the Council is, however, retained for fiscal measures, for certain land use, planning and water management issues, and for matters affecting a member state's choice between different energy sources and the general structure of its energy supply. That is as it should be. These issues are predominantly national concerns, so it is appropriate that the unanimous voting should be retained.

Mr. Timothy Kirkhope (Lords Commissioner to the Treasury) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Water Incidents (Lowermoor)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Greg Knight.]

7.2 am

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): I do not think that I have occupied my seat in the Chamber for quite so long as you during the night, Madam Deputy Speaker, but I am delighted to reach this stage, as I am sure you are.

In raising the sad saga of the Lowermoor water treatment works, my purpose is threefold. First, I seek an assurance from the Government—I am delighted to see that the Minister for the Environment and Countryside has arrived, having been summoned by his bleeper—that they will meet their residual responsibility for the actions of what was then a public organisation, the South West water authority. Secondly, I wish to impress on the privatised water company the folly of procrastination when meeting realistic compension claims. Thirdly, I wish to urge immediate attention to a number of lessons of national significance to be learnt from the incident.

I wish to make it clear to the House and anyone who may read our proceedings that the water in north Cornwall is now the best-monitored drinking water in the United Kingdom. Anyone who might have any doubts on that score can rest assured that it is a wonderful place for a holiday and in no way a health risk.

It is a long time since the incident occurred so I hope that I shall be forgiven for briefly reminding the Minister and the House of what happened. On Wednesday 6 July 1988 at about 4.30 pm, 20 tonnes of aluminium sulphate were mistakenly discharged into the wrong tank at the Lowermoor treatment works in north Cornwall by a relief driver. Within a matter of hours, 20,000 people, from Crackington in the north to the Camel estuary further west, were receiving poisoned drinking water.

However, the water company responded with confusion and complacency, partly because of a previous pump failure and partly because of obsessive concern to minimise bad publicity. Hon. Members will recall that this took place during the run-up to privatisation.

I quote an extract from the Lawrence report, commissioned by the authority itself:

"On Friday 8 July it was finally discovered that the incident was the result of the misdelivery of aluminium sulphate. Some of the staff were clearer about the implications but, on the evidence given to me by the public, information given out by different individuals in the Fowey District, in Exeter, and through the media continued to be confusing and contradictory".

Referring to the lack of information, he continues:

"I have observed two reasons why this was not done. No manager took charge in the way implied and there seems to be a culture in which the public are told as little as possible and expected to trust the authority to look after their interests."

These criticisms applied not just to the first two days after the incident but to the next two months. Misleading advice on the extent of the problem and its likely health effects, and on sensible precautions, was given out. During this period residents at the extremities of the network were never even told that they could be affected by the incident or that their supply was part of the system fed by Lowermoor.

Not surprisingly, when those residents began to experience the same inexplicable symptoms, they could not understand what had happened. The symptoms were often exacerbated by the flushing of the mains which continued for many weeks, dislodging both chemicals and metals.

The Lawrence report went on:

"A general statement about the problem having been aluminium sulphate was published by the Authority on 22 July. Amongst the contradictory advice that was given was the opinion that the water was safe. At the time data on toxicity had not been checked. Advice should have been given on what was known on the basis of the monitoring that was by then being done. But it is obvious that for a long time there would be contaminated water in the byways of the system and in such places as the tanks of holiday homes. Precautions should always have been advised."

They were not. It was only on 5 November 1991, three years later, that the then Minister at the Department of Health sent a letter to all households in the whole area of the Lowermoor water distribution system, in which, speaking of the Clayton report, he said:

"The report concludes: 'We do not expect lasting physical harm from the toxicity of the contaminated water itself . . . We still have no doubt that the accident itself and subsequent events have led to real mental and physical suffering in the community."

In my contention the original incident was a terrible failure, but the failure to explain, inform and warn was worse. The confusion, contradictions and cover-up were despicable and deplorable.

We are approaching the fifth anniversary of this regrettable incident and still South West Water has not settled the majority of major claims. It has settled a large number of minor claims with what many regard as derisory sums, but the big claims are still outstanding. The company's claims to have achieved great benefits for the community are belied by the evidence from many of my constituents. Yesterday I received a letter from a couple to whom, for obvious reasons, I shall refer as Mr. and Mrs. M:

"The truth is that they have been settled solely for the reason that the large numbers of persons involved did not have the funds to carry on the very just fight, were not eligible for legal aid by only a slight margin or were so tired, frustrated and worried by the amount of legal bumpf that was being presented to them, a lot of which they were unable to understand, that they decided to take the pittance they were offered and continue to suffer."

From meeting them, I know that that was all too often the experience of those who suffered in the incident. That is confirmed by one of the solicitors who has been acting on behalf of many of the claimants. In the past few days he has written:

"One of the interesting features about the cases is the enormous number of people suffering from anxiety and stress. I have arranged for approximately two thirds of my clients to be examined for anxiety and stress and every report confirms that they are suffering from such symptoms. The general conclusion of the reports is that people have suffered from a threatening event for which no adequate explanation was given at the time nor has any adequate explanation been given since . . . The anxiety and stress of the claimants is being compounded by the litigation itself which is taking a considerable length of time. This is particularly because of what I see as the obstructive attitude of the solicitors acting for South West Water and also because the case itself is unique which means that a considerable amount of additional work needs to be undertaken before the cases can be brought before the court."

The same solicitor demonstrates all too clearly the pettifogging attitude of the water company when he writes:

"in the light of the comments by South West Water that they are anxious to settle cases, it does seem rather odd that their solicitors should appear to be taking the opposite point of view. As an example, only last week, South West Water's solicitors wrote to say that they were not prepared to accept medical reports from GPs in support of clients' claims and were insisting that there had to be reports from consultants. Obviously while this is not a problem so far as those people who are legally aided are concerned, it does present a problem for people who are not legally aided because then they have to fund the costs of further medical reports."

Another firm of solicitors acting on behalf of 170 plaintiffs—there are upwards of 200 in all—writes:

"Many of the Plaintiffs suffered short term acute symptoms such as vomiting, diarrhoea, mouth and skin ulcers and nausea. In addition, many of them have developed long term problems such as aching in their joints, poor concentration and lack of judgment. Understandably, many of the Plaintiffs have felt extreme anxiety about the pollution incident itself and their subsequent poor health."

The letter explains the legal process that has taken place and states:

"the Defendants formally admitted that they were liable in damages but only for short term acute symptoms proven to be caused by exposure to the water and in respect of which they accepted damages should be payable. However, the Defendants disputed, and continue to dispute, that the pollution incident could have given rise to any longer term health problems and insist that the Plaintiffs establish the link between the contamination and the alleged long term symptoms."

All that is greatly at variance with repeated assurances in the press and elsewhere by the directors of the company that they are seeking an early settlement of all liabilities. On 16 November 1992, no less a person than the Master of the Rolls said in the Court of Appeal:

"The defendants having admitted liability, the parties wish to settle but cannot do so while they continue to differ on the appropriate measure of damage. It is desirable that they should be guided on the appropriate measure to facilitate the negotiation of early settlements . . . Both cost and delay are better avoided."

I say, "Hear, hear" to that.

I shall give a tiny sample from the shoal of letters, notes and interviews that I have had. Mr. A, a salesman, who used to drive 50,000 miles a year on business, found that because of memory loss he simply could not do that. He found himself driving on the wrong side of the road, he could not remember whether he had stopped at traffic lights, he cannot remember where he is and he sometimes forgot to charge his customers.

Ms C was off work for 18 months and, after many hospital tests, including two bone biopsies, has had so much time off work that her employment is now under review.

Perhaps the most significant example is Mr. G whose personality has completely changed. His business has declined, he has lost his motivation, and the business is now in serious trouble. His grandchildren have gone from calling him Gramps to calling him Grumps. I could refer to others, but I wish to make progress and allow the Minister as much time as possible.

The interesting point about so many of the examples is that the sufferers are able to quantify the effect of health deterioration in terms of employment, their businesses or direct financial consequences. However, the company still says that it is not prepared to entertain what it calls "pure economic loss." The legal adviser says that this is not recoverable as a matter of law.

There are a number of questions. First and foremost, the Government having refused a public inquiry, despite requests from all parties and a huge number of residents, when they could have dissolved uncertainty and suspicion once and for all, we must ask what they are doing now to ensure that their citizens are receiving redress. There does not seem to be a citizens charter for those who are poisoned by the public water supply.

Secondly, given the sorry saga of lack of information, and the fact that the Departments of the Environment and of Health never explained what had happened, what steps have been taken to prevent a repetition?

Thirdly, the drinking water inspectorate, which, in the Conan Doyle phrase, was the dog that did not bark in the night, is shown up by the incident to be a toothless watchdog. The fish in the river are better protected by the National Rivers Authority than we poor human consumers.

Fourthly, what about compensation claims? The whole legal process—the gladiatorial contest; the adversarial system—is inadequate in such circumstances. Wealthy institutions can grind down the individual citizen over years of expensive litigation. There must be a better way. Would not payment into court of an agreed minimum amount at the outset be more acceptable? Perhaps something along the lines of the industrial tribunal would be a better forum for such discussions. Does the Minister believe that this could ever have happened while the water industry was still publicly accountable, and could it happen again now? Now that it is in private hands, such an incident would be even worse. It is alarming that there is even less control of the industry than there was when the accident happened.

Those of us who lived through the incident and now see the way in which the company is wriggling believes that its lawyers, insurers and directors are as slippery as eels. It is time that the Government pinned them down.

The Minister for the Environment and Countryside (Mr. David Maclean): The incident that occurred at the Lowermoor water treatment works on 6 July 1988 has given rise to a great deal of public concern, and attracted considerable media attention. It continues to do so four and a half years after it took place. It is noticeable that as well as the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler), my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) is here.

Initially, concern centred on how the mistake could have been allowed to happen, and the speed and accuracy with which information was communicated to the public. I think that all agreed—and indeed the then South West water authority accepted—that the incident should not have occurred. However when it did, it would have been sensible to provide the best information to the public as quickly as possible. Following any such incident, consumers must know that the problem is being rectified and that their interests and safety are considered paramount. Such information will help to restore that vital ingredient—confidence—in the quality of their water supply. This was one of the lessons of Lowermoor, to which I will return.

I start by saying a few words about responsibilities, and how they have changed considerably following Lowermoor and privatisation. Before privatisation and the Water Act 1989, the regional water authorities in England and Wales were the main bodies responsible for water supply. Local authorities ascertained the sufficiency and wholesomeness of that water, but it was not a criminal offence to supply water unfit for consumption and any dispute about the insufficiency or unwholesomeness of supplies was determined by the Secretary of State.

The Lowermoor incident occurred in 1988, but the case against the South West water authority did not come to court until December 1990, after privatisation. Thus it was the residuary water authority which was charged with the common law offence of causing nuisance by supplying, without warning, water liable to endanger public health or comfort, and also for causing poisonous matter to enter the River Camel. The prosecution was undertaken by the Director of Public Prosecutions after investigation by the Devon and Cornwall constabulary. The residuary water authority was found guilty of causing nuisance, but not guilty of causing poisonous matters to enter controlled waters. The judge made it clear that the authority was not answerable for the act of putting aluminium sulphate into the wrong tank.

Responsibilities are different today. There is a parallel in that the Water Act 1989 put a duty on the Secretary of State to take enforcement action against a water company that fails to supply wholesome water. And local authorities are still required to keep themselves informed about the supply situation in their area and liaise with the water company if they suspect something is wrong. But for the first time, the 1989 Act made it a criminal offence to supply water that is unfit for humans to drink. Regulations made under the Act set strict standards for drinking water quality and a new and active drinking water inspectorate has been created. That dog did not bark, as it was not even conceived in 1988.

The inspectorate has since been created. It ensures that companies are complying with regulatory requirements and checks that they have proper procedures in place for dealing with all types of incident or emergency.

If a water contamination incident should occur now, the enforcement bodies that would undertake any prosecution would be either the drinking water inspectorate, acting on behalf of the Secretary of State, or the National Rivers Authority. But I consider that, following the steps that the water companies and Government have taken, which I shall be describing, an incident like the one in 1988 at Lowermoor is most unlikely to recur.

If, nevertheless, a similar type of incident were to occur now, the water company concerned would be under an obligation to inform the Secretary of State as soon as possible, and in writing within 72 hours, of any significant drinking water health risks or matters of national importance or consumer concern. When the Secretary of State is notified of an incident, the company is required to include details of the event and its cause, an assessment of the effect, the action taken, the persons notified and any press notice. Within one month a full report must be provided, giving details of the results of water sampling and an assessment of action already taken or proposed. The company must provide copies of reports and advice in support, for example from its medical advisers.

Acting on behalf of the Secretary of State, the drinking water inspectorate would consider whether a breach of the water quality regulations had occurred and in particular whether it appeared that water unfit for human consumption had been supplied. The inspectorate would take into account the quality of the water supplied, whether any illness resulted and whether the company had acted with due diligence and taken all reasonable steps to prevent the supply of unfit water. It would then advise the Secretary of State whether to prosecute the company.

The drinking water inspectorate may also decide to disseminate information about the lessons learnt, so that all water companies—not only those directly concerned—can make the changes that seem to be necessary in the light of experience.

Of course, the companies have duties and responsibilities immediately an incident happens. These have been set out clearly in the regulations and in guidance published by my Department and the Welsh Office. Water companies must take all reasonable steps to restore the supply of wholesome water, and they must advise customers quickly and appropriately if water is unsuitable for consumption, or whether it should be boiled if that would make it safe, or whatever. If necessary, action must be taken to supply potable water by tanker or other means, paying particular attention to the needs of special groups such as kidney dialysis patients and bottle-fed babies.

I started by mentioning that one effect of the Lowermoor incident was to highlight the importance of good communications between those responsible for supply and the local and district health authorities. So now, under our current regulations, companies must notify local authorities and district health authorities as soon as possible of any event that gives rise, or is likely to give rise, to a significant health risk to the community in those authorities' areas. That is an important provision which is now enforceable by the Secretary of State.

Various inquiries and investigations have taken place since the Lowermoor incident. They are well known, so I shall refer to them only briefly. First, the South West water authority commissioned Dr. John Lawrence, director of ICI's Brixham laboratory and non-executive director of the water authority, to investigate the circumstances surrounding the incident. Dr. Lawrence identified a number of management and systems failures and his criticisms were accepted by the water authority. His report was published a month after the incident in August 1988.

In the light of the Lawrence report, the then Secretary of State asked all water utilities to carry out a thorough review of their management and operating procedures at water treatment works, especially unmanned installations. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), then Minister of State, reported to the House in April 1989 that a number of improvements had been made to procedures in the water industry following the Lowermoor incident. Those improvements covered such matters as waterworks site security, procedures for receiving chemicals at works, remote monitoring of the final treated water, internal reporting arrangements for incidents, and emergency procedures including liaison with all those concerned with public health issues.

Following continuing public concern, the then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health established the Lowermoor incident heath advisory committee, headed by Dame Barbara Clayton, to inquire into the public health implications of the incident and to advise the Cornwall and Isles of Scilly district health authority. That group was staffed by acknowledged and independent experts in the areas of pathology, the health effects of aluminium, epidemiology and water quality.

The group has produced two reports. In July 1989, it found that it was not possible to attribute the very real health complaints to the toxic effect of the incident, except as a consequence of people's anxiety. It concluded that much of that anxiety was attributable to the press prominence given to alarmist statements for which there was no scientific evidence.

The group made a number of recommendations regarding management and communications to the public in the event of any such incidents. Those have been taken on board by the companies as standard procedures and, where appropriate, incorporated into regulations.

A further important recommendation was to set up an expert organisation to provide directors of public health with authoritative medical and toxicological advice. As a result, the formation of the independent health advisory group on chemical contamination incidents, under the chairmanship of Professor Sir Eric Stroud, was announced in October 1990.

The second report of the reconvened Clayton group in November 1991 followed up on complaints by residents of the Lowermoor area that their health had suffered as a result of the incident. The group concluded:

"The research reported to us does not provide convincing evidence that harmful accumulation of aluminium has occurred, nor that there is a greater prevalence of ill-health due to toxic effects of the water in the exposed population". It continued:

"We still have no doubt that the accident itself and subsequent events have led to real mental and physical suffering in the community. We emphasise that we do not believe that people in the Lowermoor area are imagining symptoms. The physical problems associated with all the worry and concern and the psychological harm could last for a long time for some people. Such a situation is well recognised following major accidents".

As a result of that concern, the Cornwall and Isles of Scilly district health authority will continue to monitor the general health of people in the area.

The Government welcomed the second report of the Lowermoor incident health advisory group and everyone with an interest in the consequences of the incident has reason to be grateful to Professor Dame Barbara Clayton and the members of the group for producing such a thorough and authoritative report.

As a result of the Lowermoor incident, civil claims have been made by some 700 people. The Water Act 1989 made the privatised water companies responsible for any residual civil liabilities of the old regional water authorities. In consequence, those claims are against South West Water. I was pleased to learn that the majority of them have been settled, but about 170 are left outstanding.

In respect of the outstanding claims, I understand that South West Water has made payments into court calculated on the basis of short-term symptoms that have been substantiated. However, there are those who claim damages for not only short-term symptoms but long-term symptoms such as loss of memory and for aggravated and exemplary damages. They are pursuing their claims together, through their solicitors, as a class action. I feel sure that the hon. Member shares South West Water's concern that those outstanding claims should be resolved as soon as possible—although he has been sceptical about its claims in that regard. However, I stress that those matters are for the parties and the courts to decide. A legal case is in progress, and neither the Government nor I have any locus in those matters.

In summary and conclusion, the investigations, reviews and reports that I described amply demonstrate that both the South West water authority and the Government treated the incident very seriously indeed. My Department, including the drinking water inspectorate, and the Department of Health are satisfied that appropriate action has been taken in the light of the independent reports of experts to ensure that the lessons of Lowermoor have been learnt. Moreover, legislation has been framed to ensure that if incidents nevertheless occur, all parties are in a position to react quickly and effectively.

Question put and agreed to.

House of Commons

Tuesday 19 January 1993

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

Royal Assent

Madam Speaker: I have to notify the House, in accordance with the Royal Assent Act 1967, that the Queen has signified Her Royal Assent to the following Acts:

1. Gas (Exempt Supplies) Act 1993
2. British Coal and British Rail (Transfer Proposals) Act 1993.

Oral Answers to Questions

EMPLOYMENT

Wages Councils

1. Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what further representations she has received about her proposals to abolish wages councils; and if she will make a statement.

The Minister of State, Department of Employment (Mr. Michael Forsyth): My right hon. Friend has continued to receive representations for and against the proposals.

Mr. Canavan: Why do the Government persist in the absurd claim that the abolition of wages councils will create jobs? That claim is clearly refuted by the research done by the Department of Trade and Industry, the Institute of Personnel Management, the London school of economics and the Low Pay Unit.

Instead of abolishing wages councils, will the Minister take steps to give more protection to the 2·5 million people, mostly women, who are covered or supposed to be covered by wages council agreements? If the Government are serious about law and order, will they employ more inspectors to stop unscrupulous employers breaking the law by employing people at less than wages council agreements?

Mr. Forsyth: When the hon. Gentleman represented part of my constituency he supported a Labour Government in abolishing 11 wages councils, taking half a million people out of the so-called wages councils. I am sure that he did so because he recognised the arguments for employment. It is the height of hypocrisy for him to come to the House and complain about this Government following the very measures which they——

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman used a word which is unparliamentary.

Mr. Forsyth: I am happy to withdraw the accusation of hypocrisy. I note that the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) acepts that the Labour Government abolished 11 wages councils, just as this Conservative Government will do.

As to the hon. Gentleman's point about the effect on employment, only a socialist would believe that one would get more jobs by increasing the price of labour.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My hon. Friend's history is disputable. One of the wages councils which was abolished was in the road transport industry, where collective negotiation was putting up pay.

If my hon. Friend believes that putting pay up is the best action to take, is not the fastest way to do it to have higher rates for the minimum wage for wages councils? Does he prefer to consider the question whether abolition of the wages councils is a sensible idea in a year in which we are likely to abolish the out-of-date restrictions on Sunday trading, which will affect retail workers?

Mr. Forsyth: I favour deregulation of the labour market in relation to Sunday trading because I believe that it will create more jobs. I assume from my hon. Friend's question that he has the same view. I am therefore a little puzzled as to why he does not see a deregulatory measure —the abolition of wages councils—as being in the interests of the labour market as a whole. It was certainly a view which he accepted in answers that he gave when he was a Minister. Then he accepted the principle that there was a relationship between the creation of jobs and the fixing of wage levels by statutory bodies such as wages councils.

Mr. Dobson: Will the Minister confirm that the Secretary of State received a letter in November from Cyril Stein, the boss of Ladbrokes, who pays himself £584,000 a year? In the letter Mr. Stein welcomed the abolition of wages councils and said that the wages council award which gave his employees £2·92 an hour was causing difficulties for his company.

Mr. Forsyth: The wage of the chairman of Ladbrokes is a matter for the board of directors and the shareholders. [Interruption.] Hon. Members who are cheering might like to know that the Chairman of the Select Committee on Employment is one of those directors.

48-hour Week

2. Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if she will refer to the European Court the decision of the Council of Ministers to consider the 48-hour week directive on the basis of the Single European Act; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: A challenge cannot be made unless the directive is adopted. We are continuing to argue strongly against its adoption. We have already made it clear that we will challenge the legal base of the directive should it be adopted in its present form.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Does the Minister agree that as the Government failed to challenge the directive on the first reading, which they could have done by not allowing a unanimous decision, they have shown that most of the phoney row between the two Front-Bench teams about the social chapter is basically artificial? Will he at least give me the simple assurance that there is no way in which the Government will allow the vital social chapter amendment to be considered halfway through the night by a bunch of sleepy-heads when the rest of the world is asleep?

Mr. Forsyth: The timing of consideration of business in the House is not a matter for me, I am pleased to say. My hon. Friend is wrong to imply that it would have been possible for the Government to challenge the legal base of the working time directive before it was agreed. A challenge can be made only after a directive is agreed and my right hon. Friend has had considerable success in ensuring that that has not happened. The Government remain opposed to the working time directive and we shall continue to oppose it. I give my hon. Friend an absolute assurance that if the directive is agreed in its present form, we shall challenge its legal base.

Mr. Grocott: Is not it a fact that after 14 years of having a Conservative Government in power, workers in Britain work for longer hours each week and have lower annual leave entitlements and fewer statutory bank holidays than almost any of our European competitors? Does not that represent a further savage indictment of the Government's economic incompetence?

Mr. Forsyth: What is a fact is that we have a far higher proportion of our population in work than almost any other European country. If we took the hon. Gentleman's advice employment opportunities in Britain would be reduced at a time of high unemployment. The Government, who are committed to reducing unemployment, would not be so foolish as to put socialism before the jobs of our fellow citizens.

Mr. Sykes: Does my hon. Friend agree that the social chapter and the 48-hour week would have a devastating impact on jobs and prospects at a time when Britain is about to emerge from the recession?

Mr. Forsyth: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. I find it amazing that anyone could believe that it is a proper role for the Government to say how long people should work in the workplace. That is for agreement between employees and employers. Only very foolish politicians on the Opposition Benches would go along with the proposition that someone should be prevented from working overtime by decisions taken in the House, the European Commission or the Council of Ministers.

Labour Statistics

3. Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what are the latest official figures for the numbers unemployed and the percentage of unemployed; and what the corresponding figures were for May 1979.

The Secretary of State for Employment (Mrs. Gillian Shephard): On a seasonally adjusted basis, claimant unemployment in the United Kingdom stood at 2,908,900 or 10·3 per cent. of the work force, in November 1992; compared with 1,087,000, or 4·1 per cent. of the work force, in May 1979.

Mr. Winnick: The increase since 1979 should shame every member of the Cabinet, not least the Secretary of State herself. Is not it clear that unemployment will substantially increase even further shortly—to well over the 3 million mark—even on the official figures? Do not the Government recognise that they are playing with fire by allowing such high unemployment, with all the resulting misery, poverty and devastation which it causes for our fellow citizens? If the Secretary of State had any pride, she would resign.

Mrs. Shephard: The hon. Gentleman knows very well that I share his concern about unemployed people. But I am not inclined to take any lessons from him or his hon. Friends on how to deal with unemployment, given the extraordinary proposals emanating from the Labour Front Bench in the so-called shadow budget for jobs. He and his colleagues should recall that the last shadow budget cost Labour the election. This one shows that they have learnt no lessons in economics. Their policy would damage investment and training and cut jobs, yet they call it a budget for jobs. It is ridiculous.

Sir Michael Neubert: Does my right hon. Friend, like me, find the suggestion that high unemployment is unique to this country a touch unconvincing? Can she say how many people are out of work in Europe today and how that compares with 14 years ago?

Mrs. Shephard: My hon. Friend is right—we share the difficult problems of unemployment and the recession that causes it with other member states in Europe and countries further afield in the industrialised world. Only the policies of this Government can possibly cope with unemployment. The ridiculous shadow budget for jobs shows the Opposition's cynisism, when they deliberately seek to tax out of existence industries that provide 350,000 jobs.

Ms. Quin: The House would welcome some information from the Secretary of State about how she proposes to prevent unemployment from rising to more than 3 million. Would she like to comment on the figures that she supplied to me yesterday in a written reply showing the extent of adult male unemployment, which has rocketed not only in the north, where it is 16·4 per cent., but in the south-east, where it is 13·2 per cent? Do not those figures show the savage decline in our manufacturing? What will the Government do to ensure that employment in manufacturing increases?

Mrs. Shephard: The first thing that we would not do would be to tax manufacturing out of existence, which is the intention of the Labour party. We need policies of low inflation, low interest rates, a competitive exchange rate, low wage claims and the largest-ever range of help and opportunities for unemployed people, which we have in place.

Mr. Evennett: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that measures in the Chancellor of the Exchequer's autumn statement will create new jobs in this country and that, with the low inflation announced last week, there is a tremendous opportunity for new job creation in the economy during the next few months?

Mrs. Shephard: That is precisely why the autumn statement was so widely welcomed by business interests. The increase in capital allowances, extra help to boost exports, the cut in car tax and help for the construction industry were all welcomed by business, which creates jobs. Those measures will help to combat the difficult problem that all of us face.

Employment Training

4. Mr. Enright: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many of those leaving employment training in Yorkshire and Humberside achieved vocational qualifications in the last six months for which figures are available.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Patrick McLoughlin): In the six months to March 1992, 30 per cent. of all people leaving employment training in Yorkshire and Humberside gained a qualification or a credit towards one. That is significantly higher than during the same period a year ago.

Mr. Enright: Is the Minister aware that the President of the Board of Trade is hell-bent on throwing miners on the scrap heap? Does he consider that that answer will be of any assistance to them? Do not many people who go on such courses find them an insult to their intelligence and therefore leave early and do not get work at the end of the course? Indeed, many people have to go back for two or even three courses. Will he examine the quality of training, which is very low?

Mr. McLoughlin: As the hon. Gentleman will know, my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade will publish a White Paper on the energy question. On quality, I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman. We are concerned about getting quality from our employment training scheme, which is why my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced changes as a result of the very good settlement that she achieved in the autumn statement. It would be refreshing to hear the Labour party and Opposition Members talking about supporting training schemes, instead of opposing every scheme that the Government have introduced.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Does my hon. Friend accept that it would be wholly unacceptable to throw people out of work in the nuclear industry in Lancashire and Cumbria simply to provide jobs in Yorkshire?

Mr. McLoughlin: My hon. Friend will draw equal comfort from the question that the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) asked me at the previous employment questions. She rightly shows that that is one of the questions that my right hon. Friend must take into account when drawing up the White Paper.

Mr. Skinner: Is the Minister aware that, when the coal board was flourishing, the Yorkshire and Humberside coalfields—indeed, every coalfield in Britain—used to run a training scheme? They trained miners not only to dig coal, but to become electricians, fitters and carpenters: they trained them to do almost every job that had to be done down the pit. Literally scores of industries used those workers when they left the mines. Now there is no worthwhile training scheme; all that the Government do is run slave labour schemes, taking 500,000 young men and women off the unemployment register at the same time.

Mr. McLoughlin: I do remember that. I also remember that most parents would prefer anything to sending their children down the coal mines.

Industrial Action

5. Mr. Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many working days were lost to industrial action in the last 12-month period for which figures are available.

Mr. McLoughlin: There were 504,000 working days lost to strikes in the 12 months to October 1992. That is the lowest 12-month total ever recorded.

Mr. Duncan: Given that foreign-owned firms have a high regard for our industrial relations record and given that pressure on employment prospects will continue until well after the end of the recession, does my hon. Friend agree that a healthy no-strike record is of the utmost importance to attracting inward investment and is equally important to reducing unemployment in general?

Mr. McLoughlin: I entirely agree. Because of our current low strike record—which is due to the industrial relations changes introduced by the Government—the United Kingdom is now receiving more inward investment than any other European country.

Mr. Burden: Will the Minister reflect on evidence provided by the Employment Gazette, which pointed out that the number of strikes was falling across Europe, even in countries with far more extensive rights to strike than Britain? Will he also reflect on the evidence given to him by, for instance, the chambers of commerce and the Institute of Personnel Management, which have drawn attention to the foolhardiness of the Government's further trade union reforms? Does he accept that those reforms have much more to do with having another bash at the unions and appeasing the Conservative right wing than with promoting industrial relations?

Mr. McLoughlin: The one thing that Conservative Members will not take is being lectured by the Opposition about industrial relations. As I told my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan), in the past 12 months 504,000 working days were lost through industrial disputes. In January 1979, when another party was in government, 3 million days were lost—3 million days in that month alone. We will take no lectures from the Labour party about how to improve industrial relations and reduce strike action.

Union Members

6. Mr. Trend: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what assessment she has made of the effect of the Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Bill on the rights of individual union members.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Bill gives union members important new rights, including greater freedom to decide which union they join and the right to a full postal ballot before a strike. It also introduces important new rights for individual employees.

Mr. Trend: Will my hon. Friend confirm that the legislation is another positive step towards establishing individual rights for trade union members and that it is in the best traditions of the Conservative party since 1979? Will he also confirm that every extension of trade union democracy has been opposed by the TUC and the Labour party?

Mr. Forsyth: I agree, with one qualification: Labour Members have opposed such legislation and then—before a general election—have turned round and said that they have experienced a sudden conversion on the road to Damascus. Where we have progressed forward step by step, the Opposition have progressed backwards step by step. Our action has benefited the economy as a whole and is undoubtedly the reason for the current high levels of inward investment in Britain.

Mr. Eastham: Why do not the Government act more evenhandedly when it comes to the rights of trade unionists? Is not it a fact that some employers will not recognise trade unions in their companies? What protection will the Government give to workers?

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Gentleman is confused. He is confusing the interests of workers with those of trade unions—and that is why he and his hon. Friends sit on the Opposition Benches.

Mr. Nicholls: Will my hon. Friend remind the House that the conversion to which he referred is not total? Does he recall that for the first time in its history there is now a proposition from the Labour party that it should be illegal to sack strikers? Is not it remarkable that Opposition Members take that position, which goes further than any Labour Government have in history?

Mr. Forsyth: My hon. Friend has great experience in these matters and I agree with him. The Labour party has always been the striker's friend and the Conservative party has always been the trade union member's friend. The Conservative party has given the trade unions back to their members and has enhanced the rights of those members in the teeth of opposition from the Labour party.

Part-time Workers

7. Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what measures she intends to take to provide employment protection for part-time workers employed by their existing employer for less than five years.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Bill gives part-time workers new rights, including maternity leave and protection against exclusion or expulsion from a trade union. It will also give employees the right to receive a written statement of terms and conditions of employment provided that they work eight or more hours a week.

Mr. Mackinlay: Does the Minister consider it fair and consistent with the rules of natural justice that part-time workers—millions of them women—should have no protection from unfair or arbitrary dismissal? Is not it a fact that many part-time workers are dismissed or have their contracts arbitrarily altered as though they were chattels rather than people?

Mr. Forsyth: What an astonishing question. The hon. Gentleman is criticising the provisions in respect of the rights of part-time workers which were introduced by the last Labour Government in 1975.

Mrs. Browning: Does my hon. Friend agree that the more strictly regulated economies such as France or Germany do not produce the part-time work opportunities that we have in Britain?

Mr. Forsyth: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Labour Members have not yet discovered that the more they add to the cost of employing people and the greater the burdens they put on employers in taking on labour, the more people will become unemployed and the fewer job opportunities there will be in the economy. We have the highest level of employment among part-time women workers, as well as among women in the economy as a whole, as a result of having a free labour market. If the Opposition had their way, there would be fewer opportunities for people to get jobs and I am sure that that is not what they want.

Mr. Dobson: Will the Minister confirm that it has been the case since records were kept that more British people, including women, are in employment than in any country in Europe except Denmark? At the same time, thousands of loyal, long-term staff, including those at Burtons and Forte, have been thrown out of full-time jobs which many of them have had for years and forced to go part time? Is not it utterly unfair that they should then be deprived of employment rights and entitlement to benefit just to suit the need and the greed of their employers?

Mr. Forsyth: Their employment rights reflect the position that was thought appropriate by the last Labour Government. The hon. Gentleman should recognise that he cannot continue adding to the burden on employers and expect employment opportunities to be created in the economy. The reason why we have far more people in work—that has been the pattern for some time—is that, unlike many of our European partners, we have had a longer period of Governments committed to free enterprise and policies that create wealth and employment.

Mrs. Chaplin: Does my hon. Friend agree that many women wish to work part time because it fits in with their family commitments? Will he ensure that nothing is done to endanger part-time jobs in Britain?

Mr. Forsyth: I agree with my hon. Friend. She is absolutely right that many women work part time because they wish to do so. Only the Opposition, with their interest in the trade union movement, would wish to deny millions of people that opportunity.

Child Care

8. Mr. Chisholm: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans she has for the provision of after-school child care.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The Government are providing £45 million through training and enterprise councils and local enterprise companies over the next three financial years to help employers, schools, parents, local authorities, voluntary organisations and partnerships of all these to create some 50,000 additional out-of-school places for children.

Mr. Chisholm: Given that the United Kingdom is bottom of the European child care league, any initiative is welcome, but is the £15 million a year ring-fenced, and is this additional money, or does it come from an already inadequate Department of Employment budget? What proportion will go to Scotland, and why is the money available only for start-up costs when continuing funding is necessary for low-income parents?

Mrs. Shephard: I refute the hon. Gentleman's basic premise. He should know that more than 90 per cent. of all three and four-year-olds already receive some kind of day care, and that the statutory school starting age is lower here than in the countries of many of our European counterparts.

This is new money. Scotland will receive 9 per cent. of it, based on the children of primary school age formula. The hon. Gentleman should be a little more welcoming, given the welcome that the project has had from kids club networks, play groups, the Working Mothers Association, the Day Care Trust and so on.

Mr. Rowe: Does my right hon. Friend welcome the recent circular from her colleague in the Department of Health making it easier for small providers of child care to avoid some of the bureaucratic burdens piled on them by people such as health and safety inspectors? Will she promise to work closely not only with the Department of Health but with the deregulation unit in the Department of Trade and Industry to ensure that a proper path is trodden between protection of children and the capacity of respectable individuals and voluntary organisations to provide this necessary form of care?

Mrs. Shephard: Given the entirely welcome increase in the numbers of child minders and registered day nurseries, I agree with my hon. Friend. The extra guidance from the Department of Health to what are perhaps over-zealous local authorities which might have discouraged the setting up of yet more facilities for young children is entirely to be welcomed.

Training Levy

9. Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans she has for a compulsory training levy.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I have no such plans.

Mr. Mullin: May I put it to the Secretary of State that no amount of exhortation to the myopic and greedy people in charge of so much of British industry will persuade them to invest in long-term training? Our only hope of finding training for future generations of a sort that will enable us to hold our heads high in Europe will be to compel these employers to pay a training levy. Failing that, we are doomed.

Mrs. Shephard: I find the hon. Gentleman's enthusiasm —and that of his party—for yet more burdens on employers disappointing but predictable. Opposition Members obviously have not noticed, because they are stuck in the past, that policies of compulsion were tried in the 1960s and 1970s, and they failed. I suggest that the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues try listening to employers instead of vilifying them as they tend to do. The commitment of employers to training remains undiminished by the difficulties of recession. This year they committed a record £20 billion to training—an excellent record representing a great commitment.

Mr. Quentin Davies: Is it not quite extraordinary at a time of cyclically high unemployment which is disturbing us all—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. Give the hon. Gentleman an opportunity.

Mr. Davies: I am glad to see that I still have my fan club among the Opposition. Is it not extraordinary that some people can think of nothing better than dreaming up new ideas to add to the costs of taking on more employees, thereby destroying the prospects for new jobs?

Mrs. Shephard: It is enough to name a burden for business to be certain that Opposition Members will support it in principle. What are more damaging for business—after all, it creates jobs—are a minimum wage, a payroll tax, a training levy, and support for a social action programme. Labour supports all those; all of them threaten jobs, as my hon. Friend is right to point out.

Training and Enterprise Councils

10. Mr. Hutton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if she will make a statement about the level of funding for training and enterprise councils in 1993-94.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: In 1993-94 we will make £2·2 billion available for TEC-delivered programmes.

Mr. Hutton: Is the Minister aware that many training and enterprise councils, including Cumbria's, are bracing themselves for substantial cuts in the volume of adult training resources being made available by the Government? Is she further aware that unemployment in south and west Cumbria is increasing dramatically and that unemployment has doubled in my constituency in the last two years? Will she give an assurance to my constituents that the Cumbria training and enterprise council will continue to have sufficient resources to provide its current quality training profile and so offer my constituents living under the shattering blow of unemployment the prospect of secure alternative jobs in new industries in the future?

Mrs. Shephard: The hon. Gentleman should know that the sum of £2·2 billion is broadly the same as last year, despite the fact that TECs have fewer young people with whom to deal on youth training because of the longer staying on at school rate. The recent deal in the autumn statement was greatly welcomed by the TECs. The hon. Gentleman must be aware that Cumbria TEC is an active member of the action team set up by the Government in response to redundances at Sellafield and VSEL. Any question of additional resources for the TEC, should there be further problems in Cumbria, would have to be considered in the light of what could be managed at the time.

Mr. Dickens: Why, during Question Time, are we always on the defensive? Why do we not tell people that Britain is the only country in Europe that guarantees a training place to every 16 and 17-year-old who is without a job or is not in further education? The reason is simply that we recognise that, with mechanisation and automation, skills must be changed and new skills learned. Does my right hon. Friend agree that this is the party— [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. I look sympathetically on the hon. Member, but I do not allow him to make speeches at Question Time.

Mrs. Shephard: It is difficult to imagine anybody less defensive than my hon. Friend. He is right to draw the attention of the House to the fact that during the last 12 months, about 225,000 young people entered youth training. Of those, about 10 per cent. have benefited from credit schemes and three quarters of them are satisfied with the outcome of YT. It is indeed a good record, and the Government are pledged to maintain it.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Will the Secretary of State explain to her hon. Friend the Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) that the Conservatives are always on the defensive because they have an appalling record, in particular in the funding of TECs, where the budget has been cut in real terms? Is the right hon. Lady aware that many, including a large number of Conservative Members, are concerned about special needs training? She will be aware of the recent report from the Spastics Society showing that people with special needs are not being given the training they require. She will also be aware that Members in all parts of the House have written to her on that subject. Will she meet a delegation of hon. Members on an all-party basis so that the issue may be thrashed out?

Mrs. Shephard: I am always happy to meet delegations of hon. Members, in particular to discuss important matters such as the way in which TECs are equipped to deal with special needs. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to talk about records, perhaps I should ask if it is not a matter of concern to him that under the last Labour Government only 7,000 youngsters were on Government training programmes.

Mr. Ian Taylor: Despite the high levels of unemployment in the south-east, may I ask my right hon. Friend to pay tribute to the TECs working in and around the county of Surrey for the work they are doing, particularly with young people? At a time when industry is having difficulties, we should commend companies that have fully participated in those training schemes.

Mrs. Shephard: I agree that in recession some TECs have found it difficult to provide industrial places for people on youth training. TECs have employed a variety of imaginative and successful initiatives such as marketing campaigns, new workshops and initial training provision of exactly the kind described by my hon. Friend in Surrey.

Employment Statistics

11. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what changes she plans to improve the accuracy of employment statistics.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Department has already taken steps to improve the reliability of employment statistics and additional work, including the first full census of employers since 1981, is in hand.

Mr. Flynn: Is the Minister aware that a woman who works as a cleaner in the House in the early hours of the morning, who has a similar job in a London hospital in the afternoon, and who works as a barmaid at the weekend is treated by the Government as three people? Why do the Government persist in including 750,000 people who have double jobs twice and sometimes three times in the unemployment statistics? Why do they include 1 million non-existent self-employed people in the statistics and insist on counting at least 2 million part timers as though they were full timers? They should stop blaming the last Labour Government for all their problems, stop creating fiction and start creating jobs.

Mr. McLoughlin: The employees in employment series is the count of the number of jobs in the economy and follows the practice of the previous Administration. [Interruption.] We have made no secret of that. I am not sure from the hon. Gentleman's question whether he wants us to count the three Labour Members who are also Members of the European Parliament as doing one or two jobs.

Mr. Alexander: Is it not the case that every time the Government arrange to improve the accuracy of the statistics Labour accuses us of distorting them?

Mr. McLoughlin: That is correct. My hon. Friend points to the picture that the Opposition always paint. As I have said, the method used to count those who are in employment is no different from that used by the previous Administration.

Labour Statistics

12. Mrs. Jane Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what are the latest figures for the number of people unemployed in the Liverpool travel-to-work area.

Mr. McLoughlin: In November 1992 unadjusted claimant unemployment in the Liverpool travel-to-work area stood at 72,704.

Mrs. Kennedy: In view of those appalling figures what advice would the Minister give to the 27-year-old man who came to see me recently in Liverpool and who in 1983 at the age of 17 took Lord Tebbit's advice and went looking for work? He travelled throughout the south of England from job to job without finding anywhere permanent to settle. He returned to Liverpool in 1991 when the work dried up and has been unemployed for two years. What is the appropriate advice for him?

Mr. McLoughlin: The appropriate advice to give that gentleman is to contact the Employment Service which has been very effective in placing a number of people in work. I am rather surprised that the hon. Lady did not quote the figures showing that between 1986 and November 1992 unemployment in her constituency fell by 2,232, which is 26 per cent. lower than in 1986.

Mr. John Marshall: Has my hon. Friend estimated the impact on unemployment in Liverpool of the introduction of a national minimum wage? Would not that destroy jobs whereas the abolition of wages councils will create jobs?

Mr. McLoughlin: I am grateful to my hon. Friend who rightly points out that Labour has not changed its mind about a national minimum wage, although some Opposition Members, including the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair), have accepted that it would reduce people's employment prospects. That is a strange way to try to increase employment.

Mr. Loyden: When will the Minister and his Secretary of State stop fudging about unemployment and stop giving ridiculous and silly answers to questions on a matter that affects millions of families? I note, and it would be significant for others to note, that the Secretary of State constantly refers to the burden on employers. At no time did she mention the burden on the unemployed and their families. When will the Government face their responsibility for the present economic climate that brought about such unemployment?

Mr. McLoughlin: We take the plight of those people who are unemployed very seriously. That is why we shall not take easy options to try to bring about an unrealistic end to high levels of unemployment. I would say to the hon. Gentleman that in his constituency, unemployment is 33 per cent. lower than it was in 1986. I should have thought that he might welcome that.

Manufacturing Industry

13. Mr. Hain: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many employees are employed in manufacturing industry; and what the figure was a year ago.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The number of employees in employment in manufacturing industries in the United Kingdom was 4,485,000 in September 1992 compared to 4,746,000 in September 1991.

Mr. Hain: Is the Minister aware that of the 21 leading industrialised nations, this country is second from bottom in the amount of manufacturing growth since 1979, and that there is a burning anger among local manufacturers and their workers about the fact that this Government are clueless about the need for policies to revive our manufacturing sector.

Mr. Forsyth: Only today the European Community has estimated that Britain is likely to have a higher growth this year than our European partners and the hon. Member's concern about manufacturing unemployment and employment would be more convincing if he and his party did not support all the measures in the social chapter which would reduce our competitiveness and make us less likely to have inward investment which has provided so many jobs in his constituency, in Wales, in Scotland and in other parts of the United Kingdom.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Sir John Hannam: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 19 January.

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Sir John Hannam: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the social chapter, which he skilfully negotiated out of the Maastricht treaty, would destroy investment, business confidence and jobs in this country? Is it not therefore the greatest hypocrisy to support such a damaging measure while at the same time claiming to care for the unemployed?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is entirely right about that. When I negotiated Britain's exemption from the social chapter I seem to recall that I was accused of making Britain a paradise for foreign investment. I hope very much that that proves to be true. The reality is that the Opposition disagree about that. The truth is that they are hostile to industry and do not understand business. Until they drop their commitment to the social chapter they cannot also claim to be seeking lasting jobs.

Mr. John Smith: On that very subject, is the Prime Minister aware that of all the Prime Ministers we have had since the war, he has the worst record for growth, the worst record for investment and the worst record for jobs? Is he not ashamed of such a miserable record?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is a fine one to talk about records. His record as shadow Chancellor lost Labour a record fourth election precisely because he proposed record tax increases.

Mr. John Smith: Does the Prime Minister not note that he failed completely to deny that he had the worst growth record, the worst investment and the worst employment record? Since there is anger throughout the country [Interruption]—I hope that Conservative Members will not treat unemployment flippantly. Since there is growing anger throughout the whole country at rising unemployment why does the Prime Minister not agree to put a windfall profits tax on the excess profits of monopoly privatised companies and use the money to create jobs?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. and learned Gentleman also forgot to mention another record of mine; the record for bringing down inflation so that we can recreate lasting jobs. The fact is that what we just heard is the old Labour party speaking; the party of the 1960s and 1970s. They hate profits. They would rather have nationalised industries making losses than privatised industries making profits. They cannot stand firms being successful and they do not understand that firms need profits to provide investment, to provide growth, and to provide jobs. That is why their record in government has always been one of complete and record failure.

Mr. Smith: Can the Prime Minister explain to the House and to the country why it was all right for a Conservative Government to introduce an excess profits tax on banks in the first recession but now to oppose an excess profits tax on the privatised utilities? Does not the Prime Minister appreciate that every pound of these excess profits and of managers' fat salaries has come from the British people? Is not it time that they got some of it back to create jobs for them and their families?

The Prime Minister: I am quite happy to educate the right hon. and learned Gentleman about that, since he clearly does not understand. In the early 1980s interest rates were raised sharply to control inflation. At that time, the banks did not pay interest on current accounts. As a result of that, they genuinely made windfall profits. That was why the Government taxed them. The utility tax that the right hon. and learned Gentleman proposes— [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The House must come to order. I cannot hear the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister: Labour Members do not like understanding reality; they do not like it at all. The fact of the matter is that the utilities are already regulated. If they make excessive profits, the regulator can change their pricing formula, and he has already changed BT's from RPI minus three to RPI minus 6·25—real price cuts for consumers, which we never saw under a nationalised industry. That is why the appropriate policy is tough regulation, not 1960s artificial control.

Mr. Sims: I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister shares the widespread concern about the collapse of criminal proceedings against a couple whose daughter died a violent death because they invoked their right to say nothing. Is he aware that the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children has details of 10 similar cases? Whatever the arguments may be for or against the right of silence in cases generally, is not there a strong argument in favour of reviewing its application in cases where children have been cruelly treated or even killed?

The Prime Minister: I cannot, of course, discuss the particular case raised by my hon. Friend, but I understand the concerns that he expresses. Decisions on whether to prosecute are entirely for the Crown prosecution service. My hon. Friend may know that the right to silence is one of the matters being considered by the Royal Commission on criminal justice. I would not wish to anticipate its report.

Q2. Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 19 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Mackinlay: Will the Prime Minister give the reason for the rising and record levels of unemployment in Essex —a county which includes my constituency of Thurrock and, of course, the betrayed people of Basildon?

The Prime Minister: I will tell the hon. Gentleman one thing that is very clear about unemployment: it will fall as a result of this Government's policies. That is what he had better understand.

Mr. Couchman: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is ironic indeed that in the very week when the Leader of the Opposition produces a phoney budget for jobs the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) is seeking to destroy 140,000 Sunday jobs, which are vital to many families in this country?

The Prime Minister: On this and other issues the reality is that Labour policy is inconsistent. It changes not only from election to election but from week to week. Not long ago, the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) proposed the biggest tax increases in peace time. Nine months later, he said categorically that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor should not increase taxes in the Budget, but 10 days later he calls for a windfall tax.

Q3. Mr. Rooker: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 19 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Rooker: Can I ask the Prime Minister if, until unemployment starts to fall, he will make it part of his political strategy to assist the unemployed by easing the rules on socal security benefits so that those unemployed people who have household responsibilities and who are in their 20s, 30s, 40s, 50s and 60s can genuinely take advantage of opportunities to improve their education and training rather than, as at present, be penalised if they study too much or lose their homes if they have household responsibilities? For a very small investment in people, we could have a huge return for the country.

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman makes a point which is well worth considering, and in the past we have looked at some matters related to it. This is the sort of matter which we are prepared to examine. The hon. Gentleman will know from his own experience in social security that there is significant help, for example, with mortgages, and he will also know the additional help that is being given to people towards training and studying.

Q4. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 19 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Greenway: Will my right hon. Friend join me in condemning trendy, mixed ability teaching— [Interruption.] Opposition Members are products of it —which has so damaged the education of millions of children since the 1960s? [Interruption.] I hope they care. Are not moves to return the teaching of children to traditional methods just plain common sense? Is it not now also time to end trendy teacher-training methods?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is a distinguished former head teacher so I particularly welcome his remarks. I agree that the way forward is to return to the basics of education, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education said yesterday that we had plans to strengthen primary education. I am sure that we are right to look carefully also at getting the teaching methods right. Common-sense, practical teaching which puts good teachers in front of good children is undoubtedly the right way to improve our education system.

Mr. Ray Powell: Is it not fair that when an hon. Member is named or mentioned in a Prime Minister's question the Member involved should have the right to reply? I respect and thank you, Madam Speaker, for calling me. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. Give the hon. Gentleman a chance to put his question.

Mr. Powell: Obviously, the Prime Minister, as with a lot of the policies that he has presented to the House, is misguided and is misrepresenting facts. The question that he was asked regarding a Bill that I will present on Friday——

Madam Speaker: Order. I must now call the hon. Gentleman to order. I am looking for a very direct question to the Prime Minister, right away.

Mr. Powell: The Bill is an all-party Bill supported by five of the Prime Minister's colleagues. It is not a Labour party Bill and therefore the Prime Minister should correct the answer that he gave just now.

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman will, no doubt, be a firm advocate of his own Bill in a few days' time. I can tell him that in due course my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary will bring proposals to the House and will give it a series of alternatives upon which to make up its mind on this thorny issue.

Q5. Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 19 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Field: Does my right hon. Friend welcome the publication of the highway code today? Will he ensure that copies are made available to Opposition Members, some of whom seem to be stuck on a roundabout, uncertain as to which exit to take, while others seem intent on overtaking their leaders on the inside, while we on the Government side look forward to a major road ahead?

The Prime Minister: I should like, if I may, to try to respond to that testing question. I very much welcome the publication of the new highway code. I am bound to say that it does seem to me extremely important that the Leader of the Opposition perhaps should study it. He might learn, after his proposals this morning, that he should not signal right when he is turning left.

Sir David Steel: Will the Prime Minister clarify the support that the Government give to enforcement action against Saddam Hussein? Is it correct that that support will be given only as long as the action is in accordance with international law in agreement with our coalition partners and involves the minimum necessary use of force?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I can confirm to the right hon. Gentleman that that has been the position thus far, and it is our position, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Defence Secretary set out the other day.

Parliamentary Question (Madam Speaker's Ruling)

3.30 pm

Madam Speaker: I have to give a ruling to the House in response to a point of order from the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) last Wednesday. I undertook to examine the circumstances in which a question was tabled in the name of the hon. Member for Kincardine and Deeside (Mr. Kynoch) to the Secretary of State for Scotland.

I have established that a parliamentary clerk in the Scottish Office did in fact, as the hon. Member for Dumbarton suggested, send a question to the Table Office, and that the question was written on a question form pre-signed by the hon. Member for Kincardine and Deeside. Since the form was signed by an hon. Member, the Table Office behaved perfectly properly in accepting it. I hope, however, that any practice that may have grown up of pre-signing forms will now cease.

I must make it absolutely clear that the tabling of a question is a formal parliamentary proceeding which must be undertaken only with the specific approval of an hon. Member, if not by himself or herself personally. What happened was an abuse—[Interruption.] Order. I have not finished. I have received apologies from the Secretary of State and from the hon. Member for Kincardine and Deeside, together with the undertakings that such an occurrence will not be repeated.

In raising this point of order with me, the hon. Member for Dumbarton said that he was referring the matter to the Procedure Committee. It will be for that Committee to decide whether it wishes to consider any wider implications that this incident may have for the rules of tabling questions. For my part, I accept the apologies and the undertakings that have been given, but I make it absolutely clear to the entire House that there must be no recurrence whatsoever of this practice.

Business of the House

3.32 pm

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): With permission, I should like to make a short business statement.

The subject for debate on Thursday 21 January will now be "events in the Gulf and the Royal Air Force", on a motion for the Adjournment of the House. I believe that that will be for the general convenience of the House. The House will also wish to know that, as I said last Thursday, the debate will be opened by my right and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence and will now be wound up by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs.

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): I thank the Leader of the House for that announcement. He will know that we have been pressing for a meeting of the Security Council and for an opportunity for the House to discuss these matters. I am sure that the Leader of the House will understand, especially in the light of what was said during last week's business questions, that inevitably it is likely that the debate will concentrate on the position in the Gulf. I hope that he will bear it in mind that there may be a further request for a service debate on issues involving the provision of service by the Royal Air Force at a later date.

Mr. Newton: I note the hon. Lady's point. As I understand it, and subject always to the Chair, it will be in order for hon. Members to raise other points, but I have no doubt that the House will expect—as I do—that the main focus of the debate will be the situation in the Gulf.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the treasured single-day debate on the Royal Air Force will be largely about the Royal Air Force, because it is active in the Gulf?

Mr. Newton: That is a helpful point, and I think that it will command some assent from the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett).

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North-East): In view of the answers we have been given, would it not now be intelligent to consider whether the debate on Thursday should concentrate exclusively on events in the Gulf, so that as many hon. Members as possible with an interest in that topic might have an opportunity to contribute, and whether, therefore, a separate and distinct day should be assigned for a debate on the Royal Air Force?

Mr. Newton: We can all agree that it is highly likely that the main focus of the debate will be the Gulf. However, as it is principally the RAF that has been involved in the Gulf, I am not sure that it would be right to rule out reference to other matters affecting the RAF.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): As the debate on Thursday will deal with issues affecting the lives of British soldiers and of people throughout the middle east, and will therefore be desperately important and will require the total attention of hon. Members, can the Leader of the House give us an assurance that the Government will not seek to make Members tired and harassed by expecting them to debate vital issues, like the social chapter, in the early hours of the morning——

Madam Speaker: Order. I think that I can help the House. This is a very narrow business statement, which does not relate to that matter.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Is the Leader of the House prepared to give an undertaking on behalf of the Government that there will be no final decision to send British troops to Kuwait until Thursday's debate has taken place?

Mr. Newton: As the latest information that I received before coming to the Chamber was that no formal request of this kind had been received, the appropriate thing for me to say is that these are matters for discussion in the debate on Thursday.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): Will the motion be drawn sufficiently widely to enable us to consider what happens as we send troops and naval personnel to the Gulf? I am thinking in particular of the use of the flag officer sea training facilities at Portland, which have been used for every deployment to the Gulf and to other theatres of war, and of the quality of the training that is provided there.

Mr. Newton: All this will be subject to your views, Madam Speaker, as to what is in order. As I have said, the debate will take place on a motion for the Adjournment of the House. It could not be drawn more widely than that.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): I welcome the fact that the Secretary of State for Defence will open the debate. Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman be in a position to tell us what impact the deployment of troops in the Gulf area would have on the extra battalion in Northern Ireland?

Madam Speaker: Order. That question also is far too wide. The Leader of the House has made a very narrow statement about a simple change of title. He has paid the House the courtesy of informing it of the change and of letting it know which Secretaries of State will handle the debate. I must ask hon. Members to restrict the questions to those matters.

Mr. David Tredinnick (Bosworth): Will my right hon. Friend explain why he did not consider linking this matter with the deployment of British troops in the Yugoslav theatre——

Madam Speaker: Order. I refer the hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members to "Erskine May", which, on page 297, makes it very clear that questions arising from a supplementary statement of this nature should be very narrow. I shall take only a few more questions.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): Can the Leader of the House give us an assurance, first, that no further military attacks involving British forces will take place before the debate; and, secondly, that it will be possible to move an amendment to the Adjournment motion so that those who are opposed to the use of force will be able to register their opposition?

Mr. Tredinnick: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Order. I take points of order after statements.

Mr. Newton: As you, Madam Speaker, above everyone, know, questions about what would or would not be in order are for you rather than for me. However, my understanding is that amendments to motions for the Adjournment would not normally be in order. As to the earlier part of the right hon. Gentleman's question, I repeat what I said to his hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South about not seeking to pre-empt the debate on Thursday.

Points of Order

3.40 pm

Mr. David Tredinnick (Bosworth): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I have been trying to follow the ruling that you have just given, and I do not want to transgress in any way, but it occurs to me that perhaps the deployment of forces in the Iraq theatre is related, in that the numbers of troops——

Madam Speaker: Order. I am trying to help the hon. Gentleman and the House. I will read the two lines from "Erskine May" that relate directly to what has just taken place:

"The Speaker has ruled that when a narrow business statement is made,"— which is exactly what has taken place—

"changing only one item of business, supplementary questions are confined to that item."

The Chair will allow a wide debate. It is a debate on the Adjournment and, as the Leader of the House has said, it could not be much wider than that.

Several Hon. Members: On a point of order.

Madam Speaker: Order. I am quite capable of seeing and hearing hon. Members.

The House has been delayed by points of order that are simply points of frustration.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): I hope that my point of order is entirely relevant. The debate on Thursday, now merged, means that the detailed consideration of a number of aspects of the problems and conditions of the Royal Air Force will now not be able to attract the attention or be given the time that would otherwise be available; problems such as contractorisation, career prospects and procurement will all be diminished.

I know that you cannot instruct the Government on how they should structure business, Madam Speaker, but my point of order is this. Every year, for so long that a precedent has been established, the House has had the opportunity for regular debates about each of the three armed forces. The abuse of this precedent—that is what it is—means that proper consideration of the service in question will be minimised.

I ask you, Madam Speaker, or, if you cannot give a ruling, the Leader of the House, to give an assurance that there will not be a long delay before the House has an opportunity to have a debate in which the detailed considerations and anxieties of the Royal Air Force can be considered.

Madam Speaker: The hon. Gentleman is aware that I cannot rule on that matter. It seems to me to be the sort of subject that he might put to the Leader of the House during business questions at some time.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Yesterday there were a number of points of order arising out of your response to my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) when he made a Standing Order No. 20 application about Iraq. I think that it is fair to suggest that your reply left the door ajar. It seems to me—I would like you to respond to this if that is possible—that this business statement today is some recognition of that half-open door, but that a debate has been produced that is unsatisfactory not only to my hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy), who wanted to speak about the Air Force in detail, but also to those of us who would have liked a proper vote in respect of Iraq and the bombing, and the lapdog attitude of the Government to Bush, that man who is drugged to the earholes. We all wanted to take part in a principled debate, but I am afraid that it is like the curate's egg: it is a bit of both and it is not the right answer that you promised yesterday.

Madam Speaker: I promised nothing yesterday, as the hon. Gentleman will know if he looks at Hansard. He must draw his own conclusions.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Can you confirm that an Adjournment motion will not allow substantive amendments to be tabled? This seems unsatisfactory to whole range of opinion in the House, as many hon. Members would have liked to submit amendments on the degree of United Nations sanction for any action that might be taken.

Madam Speaker: The hon. Gentleman and the House are aware that no amendments can be tabled to an Adjournment motion.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Can you confirm, Madam Speaker, what I think you just said—that it will be possible to have a vote on Thursday evening so that those of us who do not support the Government's policy in the Gulf may have an opportunity to register that dissent, as opposed to the consensus that has been presented to the whole country until now?

Madam Speaker: I did not say that at all. I made the point that it was a motion on the Adjournment. The hon. Gentleman knows what that means as well as I do: there can be no amendments to it.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Is it possible for you to use your good offices to persuade the Leader of the House to review what he has just told us? A number of hon. Members who have spoken are opposed to what has been happening. Those of us with different points of view, with reservations, nevertheless believe that it is necessary to have a debate on what is happening in Iraq and what should or should not be done. My hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover and other hon. Friends have made the good point that no one will be absolutely certain about the debate: will it be mainly about Iraq or the situation in Iraq? Why not simply have a debate on Iraq?

In response to my hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy), who said that matters relating to the RAF will not be adequately raised, surely there is a case for having a proper debate, as always, on the services including the RAF. Will the Leader of the House consider changing his mind?

Madam Speaker: Such questions must be put to the Leader of the House during business questions. It is not a matter for the Speaker of the House, who has no responsibility whatever for arranging the business programme. It is for the Leader of the House and the usual channels, as the House knows.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I raise a matter of greatest importance which has come to the attention of the House during the past quarter of an hour, and I seek your advice. Although I do not want to deal with the specific case on which you rule, there is a wider case, which is the politicisation of the civil service. It seems that, over the past 14 years, there is a possibility that the objectivity of the civil service, which is precious, is now in question. How can we have a full examination of that matter by the House?

Madam Speaker: The hon. Gentleman can try to achieve that by putting a question to the Government during business questions. He can achieve it either through debate or by questions in the House.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. My point is that—this is from the Front Benches—the change of title of Thursday's debate has changed the whole character of the debate. In practice, it will be a debate on Iraq. During the three previous debates on the Gulf in the last Parliament, in a consensus, supporters for the Government, mostly Privy Councillors, were wheeled out on both sides, largely to the exclusion of any significant extent of dissent.

There is a significant extent of dissent among Opposition Members towards the Government's supine support of American policies. I hope that, with your fresh occupation of the Chair, Madam Speaker, bringing a new view to the House, the consensus which prevailed in those three debates on the Gulf will not prevail on Thursday.

Madam Speaker: That is hardly a point of order for me. The debate on Thursday is in the hands of the House itself.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. For the benefit of the House, could you rule whether the previous five points of order put to you were points of order or points of frustration?

Madam Speaker: They were certainly not points of order. I will not attempt to describe what they were, but they certainly were not points of order.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. You and the House will know that I am a member of the Select Committee on Defence (HON. MEMBERS: "Very important."] I agree, and if anyone thinks differently, they are fairly stupid.

Arrangements have been made for the Select Committee on Defence to visit Supreme Headquarters, Allied Powers Europe on the day of the debate. I do not need to go into great detail except to say that that will mean that many of the members of the Select Committee will be excluded from the debate because they are required —[HON. MEMBERS: "You can choose."] I will continue— [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. I am trying to find out what the point of order is. The hon. Gentleman will undoubtedly come to his point now.

Mr. Cook: I am trying to remove some of the ignorance and short-sightedness which is evident on the Government Benches. If an hon. Member is to fulfil his duty to the Chamber, I must be present on the Select Committee visit. For us to get back from the visit in time will mean that probably only one hon. Member will be able to contribute to the debate. My point of order is whether you, Madam Speaker, can prevail on the usual channels to institute some device that will ensure consultation to include members of a Select Committee on a particular topic, rather than exclude them. It is a perfectly reasonable question, after all.

Madam Speaker: Hon. Members who speak in the House must first catch my eye, irrespective of whether they are members of a Select Committee, Standing Committee or whatever.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Would you ask questions in the right places about the abuse of the letter board yesterday by the Secretary of State for Education?

Madam Speaker: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will give me more information and come to my office. I always try to help Members on such matters.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): As someone who served in the RAF in Iraq, do I stand a chance of being called on Thursday?

Madam Speaker: That is the most pertinent point of order that has been put to me today.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 101(3) (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.).

LIVERPOOL HOUSING ACTION TRUST

That the draft Liverpool Housing Action Trust (Area and Constitution) Order 1993 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Andrew Mitchell.]

Question agreed to.

Telephone Entertainment Services (Supervision)

3.51 pm

Mr. Terry Lewis (Worsley): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to establish a statutory body for the supervision of telephone entertainment services.

I return again to the issue of filthy phone calls and, most specifically, those which take place in premium-rate services, about which I have spoken to the House many times. Recently, I spoke in the debate on the Consolidated Fund Bill at great length. Therefore, I have no desire to go into the sordid cases again. Instead, I wish to deal with the detail of how such services are regulated at present under the system of self-regulation.

I welcome the concern expressed by the Leader of the House. He is in his place for the debate, as he promised at business questions last week. That gives me an opportunity to clarify my question to him. I mentioned that, like other right hon. and hon. Members, he had daughters. I felt that that would give right hon. and hon. Members a different perspective on the offences against some young ladies which I have raised in the House over the years and the consequences of allowing the services to continue.

The Leader of the House seemed to be under the impression that I was suggesting that the daughters of Members might have been involved in the lines. I was not. I am worried about the safety of women away from the services that we are discussing—on the street and in public places. I want right hon. and hon. Members who are members of the Government and have powers over such matters to think along those lines. It might be educative and informative for them to speak to their wives and daughters about the issue that I have raised, about which there have been mountains of publicity in the past six or seven years.

When I speak of the need to improve regulation, it is obviously a criticism of the existing system of self-regulation under the so-called Independent Committee for the Supervision of Standards of Telephone Information Services. I have long believed that the system is inadequate, and have said so on many occasions in the House. Events in recent weeks and months prove the point that I have made.

The committee is compromised, because it is funded by the industry which it is supposed to police. It is compromised because its chairman is on record as saying that he does not see anything wrong with pornographic conversations between two people. He ignored all the other problems of which Members of Parliament will be well aware.

The premium rate services started in 1985. ICSTIS was set up following growing public disquiet in 1986. What has it achieved? It has achieved one or two good things, but has done so always by the back door, picking away at the periphery and never attacking the heart of the problem. ICSTIS did not deal directly with the huge bills that youngsters were running up for their families or that employees were running up for small businesses. It established a fund, made providers of such services put up a bond of £50,000, appointed a retired High Court judge and established a bureaucracy to vet claims.

My view then, as now, is that, if a service being sold in the marketplace is useful and people want to buy it, there is no need for such a fund. Why try to sanitise something before it is delivered to the marketplace? That process should have been attacked, but that did not happen.

All the chatlines that caused problems with high bills have now gone because the providers of such services would not put up the increased bond, and because I and many other hon. Members encouraged people to apply for compensation from the fund, which killed it. Why go through all that trauma? Why punish families with debt? Why let all that continue without attacking the problem?

The only sanction that ICSTIS can apply is—after tortuous procedures—to recommend to British Telecom that the provider of such a service should be disconnected. I and several newspapers have given evidence to ICSTIS and to other people that the system does not work. As soon as the providers are cut off, they set up somewhere else and usually provide even worse services than before.

In her latest investigation, Denna Allen, a national journalist from The Mail on Sunday, said:

"British Telecom pulled the plug on Michael Allen's firm EasyBreak last week following revelations that girls were breaking the law by talking dirty.

But wealthy Allen has been advertising a new 'Best Live One-To-One' sex line called Greetland in The Sport newspapers.

So as EasyBreak lines were silenced, Greetland numbers were humming with callers."

Both companies share the same Manchester adddress and Allen, whose wife's firm Comtel was originally cut off, is carrying on in business. Comtel was owned by his wife and was closed down three years ago when I was instrumental in getting a BBC journalist into its offices—I had to get her down via a fire escape because things were getting risky, but that is another story.

ICSTIS can demand tapes which are often doctored—as the providers have admitted—and can cut off the providers, who then go somewhere else and perhaps nominate their spouse as the next owner of the business. Such providers still employ people in Dickensian conditions, and they still corrupt and demean which is against section 43 of the Telecommunications Act 1984.

Parliament cannot touch the people whom I have been complaining about for so long, and there is something sinister, demeaning and wrong about the whole process. I want to bring the subject back into the public arena, so that Parliament can restore its authority over such matters. The Telecommunications Act is ripe for fresh consideration, as people have been able to skirt around section 43 willy-nilly. ICSTIS cannot help, OFTEL will not help and Parliament should reconsider the whole subject and do something about it. As the list of sponsors shows, I have all-party support for the Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Terry Lewis, Mr. Don Dixon, Ms. Ann Coffey, Mrs. Ann Winterton, Mr. Roy Beggs, Mr. Peter Hardy, Mrs. Margaret Ewing, Mr. Terry Rooney, Mr. Archy Kirkwood, Mr. Harry Cohen, Mr. William Ross and Mr. George Howarth.

TELEPHONE ENTERTAINMENT SERVICES (SUPERVISION)

Mr. Terry Lewis accordingly presented a Bill to establish a statutory body for the supervision of telephone entertainment services: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 5 February and to be printed. [Bill 115.]

Orders of the Day

European Communities (Amendment) Bill

Considered in Committee [Progress, 18 January]

[MR. MICHAEL MORRIS in the Chair]

3.59 pm

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): On a point of order, Mr. Morris. Is it still a convention of the House for hon. Members to give notice to other hon. Members when they propose to make personal attacks on them in the Chamber? I have in mind column 71 of yesterday's Hansard. Is it also a convention for the hon. Member who makes the attack to give way to the recipient? I have in mind column 73.

I do not seek to detain the House for long, Mr. Morris, and I know that you will decide whether the conventions were observed last night. Let me say, however, that I do not think that they were observed; let me say also—as the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) repeatedly refused to give way last night—that her assertion was completely untrue.

The Deeside Toyota engine plant formed the centrepiece of my election address. The general managers of Toyota UK and Toyota Deeside wrote separately to thank me, suggesting that my co-operation and support, and my visits to the engine factory, had been much appreciated. It is a magnificent factory, and I feel that the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South behaved in a rather shabby manner last night.

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Morris): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising his point of order at the beginning of main business. I have read yesterday's Hansard, and I note that my colleague the First Deputy Chairman dealt with the issue at the time. It is, however, worth reminding hon. Members on both sides of the House that, if they intend to refer to other hon. Members, they should do those hon. Members the simple courtesy of dropping them a note, or putting a note on the board. If neither course is possible, they should do their best to contact the hon. Members concerned in their offices.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): Further to that point of order, Mr. Morris. If your ruling applies to me, does it also apply to the attack on me that the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) has just perpetrated?

The Chairman: I have already made it clear that my ruling applies to every hon. Member in the House.

Clause 1

TREATY ON EUROPEAN UNION

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): I beg to move amendment No. 5, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert

'(except Article 128 on page 33 of Cm 1934)'.

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Morris): With this, it will be convenient to consider the following amendments: No. 131, in page 1, line 9, after 'II' insert

'(excluding Article G D(18) on page 16 of Cm 1934).'.

No. 213, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 128(1)'.

No. 214, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 128(2)'.

No. 215, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 128(3)'.

No. 216, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 128(4)'.

No. 217, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 128(5)'.

No. 53, in page 1, line 10, after '1992', insert

'but not Article 128 in Title II thereof'.

Mrs. Clwyd: The purpose of amendment No. 5 is to enable the House to discuss article 128 of the treaty, which concerns culture and creates a new legal competence for the Community. Previously, the Community justified its actions on cultural affairs by reference to article 235 of the treaty of Rome.

If the amendment is put to the vote, I shall ask my right hon. and hon. Friends not to support it.

I regard article 128 as one of the most important in the treaty. It relates to the essence of civilised living, and it will lie at the heart of future developments in Europe. When Jean Monnet, the founding father of the European Community, was asked some years later what lessons he had learnt, he replied:

"If we were to do it again, we would start with culture."

I wholeheartedly support the idea of the Community's stimulating intellectual ideas, cultural activities and artistic creation. However, I can see some dangers ahead and I shall discuss them later.

Article 128 calls on the European Community to "contribute to the flowering of the cultures of the Member States, while respecting their national and regional diversity".

Paragraph 1 also talks about.

"bringing the common cultural heritage to the fore."

I am not sure whether I know what a common cultural heritage is, but I suspect that it is grounded in the ideas and values of the Renaissance, in the Enlightenment Project and in liberal political thought. Certainly I believe that to be a better approach than seeing Europe's cultural heritage in terms of what the writer Ken Worpole described in a speech in Vienna last year as a "spatially bound and historically continuous national cultural past".

Culturally, history seen in those terms is on the one hand romantic and safe, but on the other illusory and dangerous.

I believe that the approach that I have outlined as a basis for European heritage is more likely to be useful and less open to abuse than that which seeks to define it in terms of ethnic origin, racial background or some spuriously defined European identity.

Having said that, it is important that cultural development within the European Community should act to some extent as both challenge and counterpoint to some of the shallower cultural developments in the United States which threaten to engulf the western world. Some of that culture is shallow and tacky. That is perhaps not surprising, as it is the product of commercial and private patronage as well as an expression of triumphalist capitalist values. While one may deplore snobbish distinctions between so-called high art and low art, we should not be afraid to contrast good and bad art and seek to build on the European traditions of good art.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Listening to the hon. Lady's somewhat surprising attack on American culture, one is bound to ask whether she has ever heard of jazz. Does she think that that is a product of unbridled American capitalism?

Mrs. Clwyd: There are exceptions to every rule; I consider the hon. Gentleman's point somewhat unnecessary.

Paragraph 2 of article 128 calls for co-operation between member states in four specific areas: first, the improvement of knowledge and dissemination of the cultural history of the European peoples; secondly, conservation and safeguarding of cultural heritage of European significance; thirdly, non-commercial cultural exchanges; fourthly, artistic and literary creation, including the audio-visual sector.

Paragraph 3 calls on the Community and member states to foster co-operation with third countries as well as with various international organisations. No one should be surprised that Britain was adamant that any proposals under article 128 should have no effect unless they were agreed unanimously.

Returning to the overall aims of article 128, I begin by pointing out to our European partners that the public expenditure settlement for the arts in Britain next year shows that our Government are prepared to renege on both the letter and the spirit of its provisions. If the future of European culture and article 128 depend on the actions of this Secretary of State and this Government, bad times are ahead.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the most essential cultural provisions of any civilised country is the ample provision of libraries? Those of us who had the privilege of being educated partly in public libraries—and who make no apology for that—believe that it is deeply regrettable that so many libraries are closing and that existing libraries are open only on certain days. Indeed, it is now almost impossible to find libraries which are open every day from Monday to Saturday, and then only for restricted hours, through no fault of the staff.

Should not one of the first priorities be to reassure people that there will be adequate provision of libraries and books? Apart from all the rhetoric, such provisions have done so much in the past, and hopefully will continue in future, to give people the opportunity to read and to widen their horizons, giving them an understanding of events which otherwise they would not have.

Mrs. Clwyd: That is a good point. There is tremendous concern about the future of British libraries. My hon. Friend is not one of the great supporters of the European Community, but he will notice as I proceed with my speech that I shall state that I hope that, when it comes to maintaining our culture and all that it means, the Community will press member Governments to make adequate provision for libraries, so that people may continue to enjoy what they enjoyed in the past under Labour Governments. They are worried because provision is diminishing under this Government. Perhaps the Minister will offer us assurances on that.

After the 1922 autumn statement the Select Committee on Treasury and Civil Service decided for the first time ever to question the Chief Secretary to the Treasury about the national heritage budget. It is to be congratulated on so doing. In its report, published on 16 December, the Committee points out that in real terms, using the Treasury GDP deflator, the spending of the Department of National Heritage will fall by no less than 5·4 per cent. in 1993-94 compared with this year. The Committee goes on to say that expenditure by the Government on the performing arts will fall in real terms by more than 10 per cent. over the course of the survey period, compared with 1992-93.

Judging by these figures which, to our European partners, are both shameful and pitiful, the future of music, literature, drama and the fine arts is far from safe in the Secretary of State's hands. It is no wonder that Peter Jones, the outgoing director of English National Opera, has described the figure as "a killer blow for arts organisations big and small".

He and others have quickly spotted that, at the first opportunity, the Secretary of State has broken the Conservative party's promise in its election manifesto to maintain expenditure on the arts.

It is a pity that successive Prime Ministers and Arts Ministers have not been able to match President Mitterrand and Jack Lang, the former French Minister of Culture, in providing inspirational drive and massive cash resources for the arts and culture. That being so, is it any wonder that, while Paris flourishes and threatens to become the cultural capital of Europe, London becomes ever more polluted and less pleasant to live in, with its culture on the verge of decline?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for National Heritage (Mr. Robert Key): The hon. Lady tempts me too much. I noticed that there were no wails of anguish when the arts budget increased by 30 per cent. over two years in the previous two years. I noticed also that she still regards Paris as only a threat—quite rightly, because the artistic talent of this country is second to none in the world and will continue to be so.

I further notice the way in which the hon. Lady endorsed the comments of her hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) about libraries, which were astonishing. His views on public libraries are antediluvian and bear no relation to the excellent library facilities that we have. As a matter of interest, it is Labour libraries that have been closing, notably in Derbyshire, and it fell to me and to this Government to insist that some of them be reopened.

Mrs. Clwyd: The Minister has not answered the main point of my attack. He has not denied that there will be cuts in expenditure on the arts in the coming year. His answer was a diversionary tactic. Nor does he have much to say about the future of libraries. He can only accept my hon. Friend's valid concept of the worth of the library service to the British people. I hope that the Minister will address the points that I am making rather than try to divert the argument.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): It is fair for the hon. Lady to attack the Government's policies. If she were a member of the Council of Ministers and were considering applications for cultural funds from, say, Windsor castle to pay for repairs there and from the Coliseum in Rome, on what basis would she and her hon. Friends decide which was the more European proposal?

4.15 pm

Mrs. Clwyd: I appreciate the deep-rooted dislike that the hon. Gentleman has for the European Community, but I fail to understand the purpose of his question. One would make decisions as a Minister according to the priorities of the day, so it is impossible to answer his question. I should certainly not promise £60 million of public money to repair Windsor castle without making sure that the money was not available from elsewhere.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mrs. Clwyd: I shall give way later, when I have made progress with my speech.

News of the Government's incompetence over the British Library project, which has rightly merited comment from the Treasury Select Committee and the Public Accounts Committee, has long since reached Europe. The management of the project, which compares badly with the way in which, for example, the French manage their great national and international schemes, is making Britain a laughing stock.

Much of the world admires the best of European culture—Italian painting, German music, French literature and British drama—which, for the most part, have been liberating cultural forces in Europe and have helped to develop societies which are liberal, tolerant and civilised, but I am conscious of the fact that, in Europe and elsewhere, art continues to perform many roles. Governments and established institutions in Europe have often encouraged art to express national pride and identity.

Locating art and culture in that way in specific places at specific times may be no bad thing. The problem comes when art and culture are used to create a nationalism which is exclusive and threatening and when art and culture are used emotively to stir up national passions. In the years between the two world wars, Goebbels on behalf of Hitler used many art forms—films, radio, music, dance and sculpture—for such purposes. In that way and at that time, European culture became embroiled in—and debased by—a perversely destructive ideology.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): I hesitate to interrupt my hon. Friend lest I bring down upon my head scalding denunciations of my lack of culture, of which I am aware. I do not disagree with much of what my hon. Friend has been saying about a lack of commitment or finance for important aspects of our national artistic development, but will she spell out why she thinks that there should be any commitment in the Community to make that good? I see no indication that the sums of money or commitment about which she has been speaking would be forthcoming from anywhere else.

Mrs. Clwyd: I shall not pour scorn on my hon. Friend, who frequently makes valid points in debate. I am not certain of the point of her intervention, but I will give her one example of how the EC has assisted in providing money for cultural purposes.

When I became a Member of the European Parliament, one of the first actions of the socialist group was to insert a line in the budget to support less-used languages. I am glad to say that that line is still there and that it supports, among other languages, the Welsh language of which I know that my hon. Friend has some knowledge. Many activities in Wales depend on the money provided by that line in the budget. When it was suggested recently that the money might be cut, considerable lobbying ensured that it was sustained.

When I was a Member of the European Parliament, there was real awareness of the need to protect the diversity of culture and language in the European Community. I have no doubt that such sensitivities still exist and that money will be found when the need is established by Members of the European Parliament who, I hope, will be given more power by the treaty to influence the content of the budget.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Clwyd: I shall give way shortly, but for the moment I should like to proceed.

No one should doubt that, if fascism arose again in Europe, art would once again be contaminated and artists would be tempted to collaborate with evil forces. The recent discovery that Heine R. Müller, one of Germany's finest authors, was an agent of the security police and supplied words for Stasi files, is a grim reminder of how artists can betray values. If such a regime arose, there would, of course, be differences because a modern European dictator would almost certainly concentrate more on controlling pop art and pop culture and would make more use of advertising and communications agencies, which have a curious ability to act without regard to moral values.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): I share the hon. Lady's concern about the perverted use of art for ultra-nationalistic purposes. Is she confident that the article that we seek to amend will not be used by European institutions and the Commission in particular as a vehicle for European propaganda for a European state with a European culture? To a certain extent, that would be a perversion of the use of art. Is the hon. Lady not concerned that the article might be used to exert pressure to rewrite European history books? Perhaps we would find out that Waterloo was an honourable draw.

Mrs. Clwyd: The answer is that I am not in the least concerned about that prospect. I was taught no Welsh history in Welsh schools because that became part of the curriculum only comparatively recently. I sometimes wonder how I, as a person of distinctive nationality, could have been denied the history of my country within the United Kingdom. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would like to address that, rather than speaking about what the Community might do to rewrite history.

Despite worries in Europe about the rise of right-wing forces and an increase in racism, there is yet no sign that fascism is seriously on the march. However, concerns have been expressed, not least in the European Parliament, that the concept of European culture must not become an expression of fortress Europe, creating barriers to immigrants and propelling racist forces within the EC.

[Mrs. Clwyd]

One of the principal reasons for setting up the EC was to prevent central Europe from developing in that way and to ensure that democracies, guided by pluralist principles, would become the norm rather than the exception. Those who would break up the EC and replace it by what President Mitterrand has called "tribal Europe" would risk loosing political and cultural forces which could destroy our democratic values. No one should be in any doubt that, in a tribal Europe based on competing nation states, cultural forces would combine for the worse with the new politics.

There is, of course, another and more hopeful side to what I have been saying. Art does not always serve the needs of Governments. It can be critical, questioning, unnerving, radical, and even revolutionary in intent and content. It can make Governments sweat and even blow them off course, sometimes by the power of simple explanation, sometimes by using irony, ridicule and satire, or it can, as in the case of films and television, embarrass Governments by the sheer power of its imagery combined with explanation. We know that that is true. It is one of the reasons, for example, why the Government have sought to interfere with the broadcasting authorities over programmes such as "Zircon", "Real Lives", "Death on the Rock" and "Tumbledown". Nothing, not even drama, is safe from interference from the Government.

The people of Europe know just how revolutionary art can be. Writers played an important role in helping to create the climate in which the French revolution could take place, a revolution which has been more written about than almost any other event in the history of the world. On the very morning that the revolution broke out, even Wordsworth—a reactionary poet—was forced to make the refreshing comment:

"Bliss was it in that dawn to be alive".

Two hundred years later, the last Conservative Prime Minister, now Lady Thatcher—for whom notions of liberty, equality and fraternity meant nothing—made it clear to the House of Commons and to the French people that she could not understand what the celebrations were about.

More recent political upheavals, in Russia and Czechoslovakia, were given impetus by the work of writers such as Solzhenitsyn and Havel. Fortunately, oppression sometimes encourages creative art, and art sometimes inspires action through imparting knowledge, raising emotions, creating expectations and giving people courage.

Tomorrow, in the European Parliament, there will be a debate on the priorities identified in article 128. Perhaps I can make some suggestions to enlighten that debate by highlighting the following points. First, the Community laws, which have so far been adopted with a view to creating a single market, do not provide a genuine defence of pluralism. Unless we can act quickly, there will continue to be an alarming decline in the heritage of artefacts, traditions, styles and ideas which underpin Europe's pluralist identity.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): I wanted to get in before the hon. Lady went on to discuss the views which may or may not be expressed in the debate tomorrow in the European Parliament. My point relates to the third paragraph of article 128, which refers to responsibility for co-operation with international organisations and specifically refers to the Council of Europe. There has been tacit agreement up to now that the European Community deals with a lot of things but that the Council of Europe has the lead position, as it were, in respect of culture. Does the hon. Lady feel that this article will change that balance?

Mrs. Clwyd: No. I am sure that the Council of Europe, UNESCO and other organisations will have a continuing role to play and that the one will not diminish the other in any way. I am sure that the hon. Member does not need further assurances on that matter: I have no doubt that that will be the case.

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): I should be most grateful if my hon. Friend would explain to me why the Labour party has taken the position that it has. Essentially, article 128 seems to be about encouraging national diversity. It is all about co-operation between member states and third-world countries. It is not about harmonisation. Why are we discussing this? Is it just because we have put down a probing amendment, or is it about extending the competence of the Community in this way? I should like to know.

Mrs. Clywd: I thought that I had made myself clear at the beginning. I said that it was an opportunity to have a debate on this subject and not to vote at the end of it.

The second point that I should like to make is about language, which is perhaps the most powerful cultural influence. That being so, the EC must seek ways of protecting and promoting languages, including those spoken by minorities. The Minister and I have one thing in common: we speak the oldest living language in Europe —Welsh. He may now speak Spanish better than Welsh, but I know that he can speak the Welsh language, which goes back to the sixth century. Unlike Anglo Saxon, we need no help in understanding language that was written in the sixth century. I shall use a few words, which I shall spell out in detail afterwards:

"Gwyr a aeth Gatraeth oedd ffraeth eu llu"

That is part of a sixth century poem in Welsh, which everybody who speaks Welsh understands. The Minister, no doubt, will want to repeat those words. Unfortunately——

4.30 pm

The Chairman: Order. Despite having a Welsh surname, I regret that the Chair does not know what that means. The House should know what it means.

Mrs. Clwyd: It is difficult to translate poetry, as every hon. Member will know. It is a battle-cry about men going into battle at Catterick camp in Yorkshire. It does not sound quite as good in English as it does in Welsh. If Conservative Members press me, I will happily recite the whole poem in Welsh.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Clwyd: I should like to complete the point before giving way.

Unfortunately, less than a quarter of Welsh people now speak the Welsh language, but I have no hesitation in prophesying that the language will never die. It has lived next to a very strong culture and, despite the centuries of living shoulder to shoulder with that culture, has managed to survive. I am sure that the new Welsh language Bill will ensure that it will survive and that the European Community will recognise the importance of other languages and cultures and help to sustain languages such as Welsh. Special attention must be paid to translation, publishing, book distribution, promotion, reading, inter-library co-operation and, of course, broadcasting.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: "a'r mwyaf o'r rhai hyn yw cariad".

I trust that the hon. Lady can translate that for hon. Members who cannot do so.

The Chairman: Order. I repeat that I cannot translate it. I had some difficulty passing O-level Latin, if that was Latin. It is important, and I hope that hon. Members will not abuse it, that we must know exactly what everybody is communicating. I must ask the hon. and learned Gentleman to be kind enough to translate it for the record.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: It is slightly biblical. It is to do with charity:

"faith, hope, charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity"— in Welsh.

Mrs. Clwyd: I understood the odd word, although the hon. and learned Gentleman may need some help with his pronunciation. One or two words were quite clear.

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills): The hon. Lady mentioned with great and justifiable pride the traditions of the Welsh language, but we are talking about the European dimension, and Hebrew is a much older language which has been in continuous use. Surely Hebrew is part of European culture and civilisation as well? It is the particularity of this—the direction of funds, the support of what and for whom, who controls it, and what are the democratically accountable elements—which determines part of this debate, and I hope that the hon. Lady will have regard, first, to Hebrew and, secondly, to who will democratically control these funds.

Mrs. Clwyd: The hon. Member may be interested to know that Hebrew and the method of teaching it very quickly to people have been the foundation for some of the rapid courses in teaching Welsh. I thank him for that observation.

In many ways, the process of the European Community and the European Parliament in deciding priorities and budget lines is more democratic than in the House. When I was a Member of the European Parliament, it was possible to vote a budget line by line—something that is not possible under the procedures of the House. The hon. Gentleman might like to give the European Community and Parliament some credit for that.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Is it not also true that, having voted it point by point, the European Parliament may frequently see the whole of the budget overturned in a very short time?

The Chairman: Order. We are not discussing the European budget; we are discussing the deletion of culture, and the reasons why it should or should not happen.

Mrs. Clwyd: I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) for making that point, and perhaps I can answer it another time.

The biggest problem facing the Community—and, thus far, the Community has done little to alleviate it—is the scourge of unemployment. It is the Community's biggest challenge. It is clear that the development of cultural industries across Europe could play an important role in both bringing down unemployment and enhancing civilised values. Here is a potential area of enormous growth, particularly where cultural industries link up with developments in information and communications technology. The Community has the ability to set up and maintain cultural networks and to create and strengthen cultural links.

The European Community is the ideal forum to create a European film industry, the creation of which would provide new and exciting prospects for Europe's film buffs. A successful European film industry would have important spin-offs for many art forms, as well as providing a boost for jobs. Britain has every reason to support such a venture because of the collapse of our own film industry. Both here and in respect of the cultural industries to which I have just referred, the EC should be prepared to give grants and loans for imaginative projects.

Mr. Key: I am sure that the hon. Lady would not wish to leave the story half-told. This country has the benefit of some of the greatest film makers in the world. She will acknowledge the way in which, despite the very tight public expenditure round, we have joined Eurimages, the European film agreement, which will have an impact on the British film industry.

Mrs. Clwyd: Despite the rosy picture that the Minister paints for us, I am afraid that not many people would share his view of the British film industry at the moment. Certainly film makers themselves would not do so.

The European Community should consider ways of making member states improve the quality of life by encouraging better standards of design in all areas, including public buildings and spaces. In Paris, Seville, Barcelona and elsewhere, design has been an important driving force behind inner-city regeneration. The EC should seek to ensure that national Governments and cities have coherent planning policies and access to good architects.

Sir Teddy Taylor: How could you do that?

Mrs. Clwyd: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will let me tell him. It would be helpful if the European Community could set up across Europe "percentage for art" schemes through which a small percentage of new building costs is used to enhance the immediate environment with sculpture and other works of art. The European Community could ensure a level playing field in that sphere.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Clwyd: I am sorry, but I must proceed. I have given way many times.

Similarly, the European Community might draw up regulations on resources for public art projects. The object of such schemes would be to improve the local environment, the design of housing estates, waiting areas in benefit offices and out-patient departments in hospitals.

[Mrs. Clwyd]

Britain should want to support such ideas. Last year, although the Government spent £3 billion on public buildings and works, they failed to use design and architecture to create a good environment. Perhaps the European Community has to set the standards.

Mr. Budgen: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Clwyd: I have given way many times. I understand that some hon. Members may want to prolong the debate, but I wish to conclude.

The European Community should certainly see one of its roles as that of preventing Government interference in the arts and guaranteeing rights of expression and the freedom of the press in Europe. British legislation is notoriously deficient in that respect and, as we all know, the recently published Calcutt report said little that was worth while on the subject. The European Community also needs to prevent national Governments interfering with, or censoring, satellite television.

In times of recession, Governments—especially the British Government—often behave in a particularly philistine fashion and look to the arts for cuts in public spending. Governments secure those cuts not only through the direct control of central Government spending, but often by placing limitations on spending by local authorities. Britain is in precisely that situation now.

One way out of what one might call the philistine's dilemma would be for the European Community to set minimum percentage targets for public spending—national and local—in member states and on cities and regions within member states. That would be one way of ensuring that Britain recognises the crucial importance of the arts to a civilised society and shows that recognition by substantially increasing the resources devoted to arts and culture.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Thank you for calling me, Mr. Morris. I had come to listen to part of the debate, but not to participate, before going to chair a meeting. I had not expected to be provoked to get to my feet. I have the greatest personal regard for the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) and I am delighted to welcome her to her new responsibilities—I believe that this is the first time she has spoken in the House since she took her new position—but she made an extraordinary speech, and we should put the record straight on one or two issues.

Although we never have any cause to be complacent, we have cause for quiet pride in the arts in Britain in the past 20 years or so. I do not want to weary the House with innumerable examples, but I shall mention just a few. Let us consider the number of new art galleries which have opened in London in the past decade—the Sainsbury wing at the National gallery, the Clore gallery at the Tate and the Sackler galleries at the Royal Academy.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Tristan Garel-Jones): Capitalists paid for them.

Mr. Cormack: As my right hon. Friend says, capitalists paid for them. I am not citing these examples to heap praise on the Government although I believe that the Government's record stands up fairly well. I am saying that we have cause for pride in this country in what has been achieved, just as we have cause to be proud of the fact that London is without doubt the theatre capital of the world. This very day there are far more theatres open here, with wonderful productions, than in any other capital city, not only in Europe but anywhere in the world.

Let me give a plug—if hon. Members want a wonderful, scintillating evening of marvellous British or English entertainment, let them go to the Globe theatre to see a stunning production of Oscar Wilde's "An Ideal Husband" starring Michael Denison, Dulcie Gray and Hannah Gordon. That is only one example of the richness, diversity and quality of art available.

The Chairman: Order. I have been listening intently to the hon. Gentleman, but he must relate his comments to the Community.

Mr. Cormack: I have every intention of doing so. You must forgive me, Mr. Morris, for being provoked by the unfortunate, snide and denigratory remarks of the hon. Member for Cynon Valley.

Mr. Jessel: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Cormack: I hope that my hon. Friend will not be too long.

Mr. Jessel: The hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) was, of course, disparaging London as against Paris, which gives a European dimension. Surely London is the musical capital of the world and Paris is not a patch on it. In London there is a great diversity of orchestral concerts and recitals. We have four or five great orchestras and, night after night, London is far superior to Paris.

4.45 pm

Mr. Cormack: In his inimitable style, my hon. Friend has made the very point that I was going to make in answer to your justifiable comments, Mr. Morris.

The hon. Member for Cynon Valley has considerable knowledge of Welsh Opera, but she was less than fair to our cultural richness. My hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) was justified in saying what he said. When we consider Britain in a European context, it is clear that we have every right to hold out heads high—and not only with regard to the performing arts. We have no cause for complacency, but we look after our great buildings far better than most other countries on the continent. Of course, there are things to be learned from other nations and it is right that we should do so. We should work together to enrich our common inheritance.

However, one has only to pass through the villages of France, where the upkeep of churches is vested in the state, to see romanesque church after romanesque church neglected because there is no local pride, feeling or contribution. Rome has already been mentioned in passing. It is a city to which we all look for so many of our common roots, but we can contrast the appalling neglect of some of mankind's greatest monuments with the way in which we in this country try to maintain our heritage. Sometimes it is only right for us not to be complacent or ridiculously proud, but we can take a quiet pride in some of the things that we have and in what we have done to ensure that we keep them.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): The hon. Gentleman will recollect that he made it possible for some of us to go to Czechoslovakia, which was to our great intellectual advantage. That leads to the issue of art theft from which the British art market—and possibly the German and French art markets—benefits but to the detriment of the churches and wood carvings of Bohemia. It is an urgent European problem, even more so in relation to Russian icons. Will the hon. Gentleman endorse the seriousness of the problem, which he, like me, has raised with the Government?

Mr. Cormack: I am glad to give the endorsement that the hon. Gentleman, whom I am glad to call my hon. Friend, seeks.

I strongly support not only our presence in the Community but the general terms of the treaty to which the Bill refers because it gives the Community the opportunity to enlarge. It is in the enlargement and greater enrichment of the Community, by bringing in not only the Scandinavian but the eastern and central European countries in the next decade, that we shall pay our greatest cultural and political service to Europe.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn rose——

Mr. Cormack: I shall just finish what I am saying in response to the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) who raised an extremely important issue.

A cultural heritage which is shared and treasured together is more likely to remain intact and to produce reciprocally acknowledged safeguards from the political institutions within the nation states than one which is diverse and scattered. I totally understand and utterly agree with the point that the hon. Gentleman makes.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: I simply do not see how the glories of European or cosmopolitan culture have anything to do with the Government. There has been cross-fertilisation for years—the French in Russia, the Russians in Poland, the Swedes in Poland, and the Poles in Sweden. It is absolute nonsense to have governmental interference with culture. As my hon. Friend is a co-author of the most hideous, hippopotamic carbuncle that is to be built in Bridge street—a building which will do everything to harm the record of British architecture and British art—he is hardly in a position to be pompous.

Mr. Cormack: I shall not take any lessons in pomposity from my hon. and learned Friend. Nor do I need any lessons in eccentric and ridiculous utterances. Whether one likes a building is entirely a matter of taste. I should, however, make the point that many people agree with me that, in selecting Michael Hopkins to design the new parliamentary building, the House of Commons made a very wise choice. Mr. Hopkins has produced designs for a building that promises to be one of the most distinguished of the second half of the 20th century—a century not renowned for its great buildings.

However, I shall not allow myself to be led astray any further. Although I have clashed with my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn) on matters of taste, I totally agree with him about institutional interference in the arts. There is no art that is not diminished and impoverished by governmental interference of the sort that my hon. and learned Friend has in mind. However, it is very important to recognise the contribution that the arts of the continent make to our European identity, and we neglect them at our peril.

I shall never forget an experience that I had in Romania shortly after the revolution there three years ago. I went to talk to a group of young Romanians on the subject of democracy, and it was one of the most deeply moving experiences of my life. I met a great many young people who had never had an opportunity to travel—the opportunity to experience Britain or France or Italy or the bad manners of my hon. and learned Friend in his eccentric garb.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: On a point of order, Mr. Morris.

The Chairman: I hope that this is a matter for the Chair. There seems to be a certain amount of revelry in the Committee.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: Is it proper for my hon. Friend, whose manners are always appalling and whose dress is worse, to comment on the dress of other hon. Members? I understood that that was something one just did not do. I am properly dressed, nationally dressed and tastefully dressed. The fact that he is a squit is no justification for such comments.

The Chairman: Hon. Members are taking this matter much too far. Let us get back to the debate on the Commission and the Community. There must be no further insults. I ask hon. Members throughout the Committee to remember that.

Mr. Cormack: I completely agree. In any case, any insult directed from that quarter I take as a compliment.

The young people I met in Romania had spent their whole lives under the most appalling of regimes, yet many of them spoke faultless English. When they were asked where their inspiration came from, almost all of them said that it had been derived from literature and music and through the maintenance of their part in a common European culture.

The Community has a role—much less intrusive than has been suggested by the hon. Member for Cynon Valley—to play in ensuring that the incomparable riches of European literature, music, drama and art are not only kept alive but promoted, and it is proper that Governments should inject funds to sustain them. I was provoked by the hon. Lady's critical comments about this country. We have reason to be proud. It is important that these points be made and acknowledged by those who care about such things.

Mr. Maclennan: The hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd), in introducing this debate, which has taken a highly entertaining turn—a turn hardly to be expected after her speech—said that she had some difficulty in recognising European culture when she saw it. She seemed to have some difficulty in recognising culture at all. It seems to me that she was curiously blind to the culture that has emanated from the new world, which has so greatly enriched the old world and, at least in so far as it uses the English language, is now probably among the more lively components of our culture. For instance, many of the great English language playwrights of the 20th century are from the United States. Arthur Miller is perhaps the greatest living writer of plays in the English language. The hon. Lady's remarks were cheap.

This debate seeks to focus on the role of the European Community and on the expanding part—even if the expansion is limited and gradual—that it is anticipated the

[Mr. Maclennan]

Community might properly play. There are many ways of responding to the question, "What is European culture?" In the minds of some, European culture may be the glory that was Greece, the grandeur that was Rome, and all that stems therefrom. It may be a common awareness of the cultural framework which, regardless of national boundaries within Europe, enables us to adopt cultural references. Tilting at windmills may be a Spanish metaphor drawn from Don Quixote, but it is one that springs to the lips of politicians in this country not infrequently. At times I was inclined to think that the hon. Member for Cynon Valley, in attacking the Government, was behaving rather like Don Quixote with regard to the subject of the arts.

Similarly, only the most purblind cultural nationalist seeks to appropriate to himself a particular genius within Europe. How many people beyond those who happen to live in the small country of Austria, where Mozart spent most of his life, claim to appreciate his work? It is not because Mozart happened to spend a number of months in London composing his early symphonies that we share the Europeanness of his music; rather, it is because we appreciate his music as an integral part of the heritage to which we all belong and with which we have grown up.

Likewise, it would be absurd for the German people to appropriate Schiller as peculiarly theirs as so much of his material was drawn from other histories, other sources. I am thinking of his horrific play "Maria Stuart", which depends upon the history of my country, Scotland, and which formed the basis of an Italian opera by Donizetti.

These cultural influences are now so interwoven that the kind of cultural nationalism which we have seen sometimes advocated by junior Ministers from the Department of Education in promoting the reading of particular books in the common curriculum seems to me to be extraordinarily misplaced at the end of the 20th century. To suggest that all children under the age of 12 in this country should become word perfect in the St. Crispin's day speech in "Henry V" seems to me to be a peculiarly narrow view of the dramatic purpose of Shakespeare's play, and to seek to appropriate Shakespeare to this country in a way that is somewhat laughable.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): I accept the hon. Gentleman's point, as a person not quite of his high culture, but surely there is also a danger of a kind of universal culture, a mish-mash. Is there not a danger that it all gets confused, like a kind of mid-Atlantic television; like Muzak, a kind of culture-zak, which is rootless and meaningless? If we are to avoid that, people have to be grounded in the art, literature, culture and music of their own country as a starting point for going out and absorbing the culture of the world.

Mr. Maclennan: I give way to none in seeking to promote the culture of my own country, but, if we have to start off with "Greensleeves" in our appreciation of music and elevate it in importance ahead of Mozart because it happens to be of great antiquity and a much loved piece of English music, we are getting things slightly out of proportion.

To revert to the question of what is European culture, I accept that, in describing some of the high points of European art as the common heritage of all European citizens, there may be some risk that we fall into the trap of promoting some sort of mish-mash. But I must say to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) that there is not a common framework of reference for ourselves and the Chinese, for example. There is undoubtedly a very highly developed culture in China, but it is largely foreign to people living in Europe. It may be that gradually that will break down and that gradually there will be a much greater awareness of these things, but that may take centuries; it will certainly not take less than many decades.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I am listening very carefully, but in this country in the 1700s very large numbers of artists were busy copying Chinese patterns, furniture and lacquer. It may certainly be true that the number of British people who read Confucius every day is limited, but the idea that somehow or other the gap between Britain and China is unbridgeable is not correct. We have shown the sincerest form of flattery, which is imitation, for some centuries.

Mr. Maclennan: Obviously, Europeans are aware of Chinese culture, and the Chinese were aware of European culture when they produced goods for export in the 18th century modelled on European designs for the English, and even the American, market. But there is not the same degree of comprehension of these discrete cultures as there is of the European culture. This is not to rank or rate cultures; it is simply to recognise that we grow up with the language of European culture, as we do not yet with other cultures, although no doubt, as communications improve and as the influence of our ethnic minorities grows within our own community and makes us more aware of some of these cultures which are not yet appreciated in the same way, this will change.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the way in which the English and the Scots acquired this European culture, in the course, particularly, of the 18th and 19th centuries, is extraordinary? We all know that it is only possible to acquire culture with the assistance of state grants. The way in which gentlemen went on the grand tour to try to acquire European culture was quite extraordinary. There was no Minister of Arts, no grants and no European policy for this. One might even say that it is impertinent of individuals to take upon themselves an activity which ought properly to be exclusively that of the state.

Mr. Maclennan: I was coming on to the central point of the interventionary speech of the hon. Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) about funding. This influence goes back a lot further than the 18th century. The university of Glasgow, the city in which I was brought up, was founded 500 years and more ago on the model of the university of Bologna. The patronage that made that possible was not that of the state; it was that of the Church and Bishop Turnbull.

There has always been patronage of the arts. In earlier centuries, it may not have been the state as currently organised, but it has certainly been as a result of the specific and deliberate fostering of what very often was a minority interest by those in authority. If one looks back to the Athens of Pericles, or the Florence of the Medici, one sees that those people were not only wealthy, they were also rulers. That, in effect, was the state funding of its day. The fact that we have somewhat different constitutional arrangements today in no way diminishes the importance of recognising the role of the state in fostering the arts.

The Community, in proposing to adopt article 128, in title 9, on culture, is taking quite modest steps forward in the development of this process. They are entirely desirable steps, for hitherto, although the European Community has been able to expend a modest amount of money on the arts—I believe some £5 million per annum, approximately—it has done so in the margins of other expenditure upon commerce, inter-state relations and promotion of the concept of the European identity, in a rather narrow, public relations manner. It has not been able to devote funds strictly to the fostering of the arts for their own value as such.

The provisions of the treaty which we are now debating —there is more than one provision linked together—enable the Community to develop with greater deliberation its cultural function and identity and to take into account its cultural needs in promoting other valued activity on a Community basis. I am thinking, for example, of the importance of taking into account cultural interests in the development of competition policy. It is important that it be recognised that the national heritage should be a consideration which may be taken into account in justifying expenditure which might otherwise be struck out under the provisions of article 92, but which is explicitly safeguarded by the proposed amendments to this treaty.

It seems to me that the European Community can help to promote the sense of citizenship, the virtue of citizenship, of this wider organisation by promoting the cultural identity of Europe and giving itself a competence which it has hitherto not enjoyed.

As I said, it is a modest step, partly because article 128 permits only unanimous action to be taken. It does not involve a great encroachment of national authority; it merely allows steps to be taken when there is agreement. I doubt whether that will prove to be an obstacle to the development of community funding and a common approach to the arts because such matters, as opposed to other areas of public policy, tend to be less controversial between nations. Therefore, I strongly welcome the changes made to the community law as they relate to culture. They recognise the common history, inheritance, and interest in the promotion of art in Europe.

Mr. Jessel: Some 35 years ago, the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) played I believe, a violin in the Oxford university ensemble club in which I played a double bass. That is the only time that I have been in harmony with him, as I have not agreed with a single word or action of his since.

This debate is about culture, which is a wide concept. It is about what people are. It is not simply about their language, religion, art or heritage; it is also about their loyalties and to whom they feel they belong.

Paragraph 1 in article 128 of the treaty says:

"The Community shall contribute to the flowering of the cultures of the Member State, while respecting their national and regional diversity and at the same time bringing the common cultural heritage to the fore."

I do not know what the "common cultural heritage" is, but I am sure that it should not be brought to the fore. I believe that it is the national and regional diversity which should be kept to the fore. So I disagree with the basic attitude which article 128 seeks to project. The hon. Gentleman said that article 128 was modest, but attitudes matter.

May I first refer to national cooking and cuisine, as that is an aspect of culture? I will be brief. The three greatest European cuisines are French, Turkish and Italian. French cooking is, of course, the glory of France and its identity perhaps taken with its language. It must not be blurred by some common European cultural heritage. It would be utter nonsense to expect the French to blur their cooking with fast foods, supermarket frozen foods, McDonalds and so on. We must uphold the national and regional diversity in France, Turkey, Italy, Scandinavia and the other sources of European identity as expressed in national cuisine.

Mr. Kim Howells (Pontypridd): Is the hon. Gentleman saying that perhaps the European Parliament or the national Government should ban McDonalds from entering their national heritage?

Mr. Jessel: Yes; I think that those countries might seek to encourage that, because they want to put to the fore the idea of a European cultural identity. They should not do that; they should foster national differences and put them first and foremost. That seems to be what life is all about.

We all need to feel that we are part of something bigger than we each are. Life consists of interlocking circles. We are all part of our country, political party, village, firm, religion or whatever. Those are all natural units to which it is a reasonable human instinct to want to belong. However, it is not a natural human instinct to want to belong to a continent or to feel some sort of European identity. Attempts to bring that about artificially are doomed to failure. I hope that they are doomed to failure especially in the gastronomic field.

5.15 pm

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): Is it possible to have different loyalties at different levels? Can people be loyal to a continentwide culture as well as to their own country? They can be loyal to the countries within the United Kingdom, their regions, towns and villages. Why do they have to be exclusive, one from the other?

Mr. Jessel: We all feel loyalty to more than one of those units or circles which comprise the life in which we all participate. Some of those units, such as the family and the nation, are more natural instincts than others. If one tries to foster a cultural identity for a continent which is not natural, it will not stick, and something will give.

Sir Russell Johnston: I have no objection to the hon. Gentleman feeling the loyalty which he has expressed so well, but I take exception to being told that I am in some way expressing something which he must define as unnatural if I feel a loyalty to Europe.

Mr. Jessel: It is unnatural. Hardly anyone feels it. If institutions and people try to foster an unnatural instinct, it will crash and will not work. All over the world, there are groupings of nations, federations, unions, communities and so on. We have seen federations collapse in the Soviet Union, in Yugoslavia and in Czechoslovakia. There is friction in Kashmir and in Quebec. In Europe, the Ottoman empire crashed. The Austro-Hungarian empire crashed. If one forces nations together against instinct, it will not stick; it will crash in violence and blood, and it will end in tears.

Mr. Maclennan: I know that the hon. Gentleman is making an extremely serious point about federations and so on, and he used gastronomic examples to illustrate his point. Does he accept that he is on a hiding to nothing if he forces British or English people to eat toad-in-the-hole in preference to poulet à l'estragon?

Mr. Jessel: Of course we all want to taste foreign cooking. I am proud of the fact that I am the chairman of the all-party Indo-British Parliamentary Group. I believe that there are more Indian restaurants in Britain than in India. That is a most remarkable thing, if it is true. I am delighted that there is an increasing consumption of Indian food in Britain, but that does not mean that we should govern India, or that the Indians should govern us.

The Chairman: Order. That subject does not come under this amendment. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will relate his point to the Community rather than to India.

Mr. Jessel: Absolutely, Mr. Morris. I accept your rebuke. You are right; I was trying not to dodge the question of the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland.

I turn to the question of the arts in Europe. After 17 years' service, I have just resigned from the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe, which is the 25-nation body on which you, Mr. Morris, have also served. You will be familiar with what I am saying. I was the rapporteur for the introduction of European Music Year 1985, which was the tercentenary of the births of Bach, Handel and Scarlatti who were all born in 1685. European Music Year, on which we did three years' work, was an instance of co-operation between the Council of Europe countries and the European Community. It would have been inconceivable to hold European Music Year without involving Austria—the country of Mozart—Norway—the country of Grieg—or Spain, which, as my right hon. Friend the Minister of State will know, was not then a member of the European Community.

At the outset of European Music Year, I arranged for the great Belgian violinist, the late Artur Grumiaux, to play an unaccompanied Bach partita in the hemicycle of the Palace of Europe. Incidentally, that building belongs to the Council of Europe and is rented part-time to the European Parliament, which sometimes pretends that it owns the building.

If there is a common cultural heritage within the wider Europe, it does not spring from the fact that it is European. The mainspring of the cultural tradition which is called European is either religion—mainly Christian, or it could be widened to Judaeo-Christian—or national patriotism and loyalty. The common heritage springs from those two factors. In no way does it spring from some European continental instinct.

Let us take the great movements in European art—for example, in painting. They include Italian religious paintings, Dutch interiors, the great Spanish school and English paintings such as those by Reynolds, Gainsborough, Constable and Stubbs. The latter are English. They are British. Their inspiration is English. In the context of the treaty and the debate, there is a bogus argument, with bogus logic. It is that England is in Europe; therefore, those English paintings are European paintings; therefore, they are part of a European cultural heritage; therefore, we shall bring a European cultural heritage to the fore. Yet there is no such thing. They are English paintings, and their inspiration is English.

Dr. Howells: Surely the hon. Gentleman realises that painting cannot be defined simply by its subject matter. The practice of oil painting spread from Europe. Our lack of awareness that technology, technique and ways of doing things are cross-frontier and universal has informed the whole debate so far. It is facile to describe such concepts as national. Paintings are as much about Europe as about Britain.

Mr. Jessel: Usually a painting is of a person, an event or a scene. The context is a country and a school of painting. The inspiration of a particular painting is generally much more national than European, even if techniques have travelled across boundaries. [AN HON. MEMBER: "That is total rubbish."] It is not rubbish. Let us take Italian opera, German orchestral and instrumental music or the British choral tradition—there are three choral societies in my constituency—or the work of Elgar, which is purely English and British. The "Pomp and Circumstance" marches or "Land of Hope and Glory" are clearly patriotic music which evokes patriotic feeling about Britain, not Europe.

British people want to keep institutions such as the last night of the Proms, which are a British, not a European, tradition. British people certainly want to keep our tremendous tradition of British military bands, which are the finest in the world and are trained at the Royal Military School of Music at Kneller Hall in Twickenham and are the envy of the world.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: As a painter, may I say that nothing that goes on in Europe is likely to alter my style of painting or influence it. I do not regard it as European but as Fairbairnian. Dutch paintings, for example, is as it is because the light in Holland is different from that in France, Germany, Italy, Spain or Portugal. That is why painters from those countries all paint differently. God help us if we all try to make them paint the same.

Mr. Jessel: Of course we must all accept that. No one would suggest that my hon. Friend is in any way the same as other people. Long may he remain that way. I hope that we shall continue to enjoy seeing his paintings in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes): Perhaps my hon. Friend could help me. Some time ago, I bought a painting by the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn). It is of an Italian harbour scene. Is it an Italian painting, a Scottish painting, a Fairbairnian painting or a European painting?

Mr. Jessel: Perhaps my hon. and learned Friend knew that my hon. Friend was a keen European and would be likely to buy the painting. [Interruption.]

The Chairman: Order. Do I understand that the hon. Gentleman has finished his speech, or is he giving way?

Mr. Jessel: I have not finished my speech. I thought that my right hon. Friend the Minister intended to intervene.

There are several aspects of European culture which we do not want here. One of them is pornographic films, as broadcast on cable television. They are broadcast in increasing quantity. People are worried about the effect on the well-being of their children. Nothing is being done to stop the broadcasting of such films. Everyone has seen and perhaps enjoyed rude things of one sort or another from time to time, but people do not want this stuff to come into their houses by cable television. The European Commission seems entirely lacking in determination to stop it. The Commission is not carrying out the will of the people of Britain in that matter.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Does my hon. Friend accept that even all Members of Parliament together can do nothing to stop Europorn coming into Britain, because of the European broadcasting directive, which was referred to briefly at two o'clock in the morning one day in 1989? That is a fact. Even if 650 Members of Parliament said that we wanted to stop European porn such as "Red Hot Dutch" coming into Britain and being sold in Harrow and elsewhere, there is nothing that we could do about it. It is not the fault of the Commission but that of the directive, which was approved by the Council of Ministers [Laughter.] It is not a matter for Foreign Office Ministers to laugh about. Some of us care deeply about porn being sold in Britain as a result of a European broadcasting directive.

Mr. Jessel: My hon. Friend is right. I am sure that my hon. Friends on the Front Bench heard what he said. I hope that they will say something about it when they reply.

Mr. Marlow: I realise that my hon. Friend is about to start on another part of his speech, which I am sure is important. Before he does so, may I ask him a question? He will be aware that the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd), who moved the amendment, said at the end of her speech that she hoped that, under article 128, the great panjandrums of Europe such as Mr. Delors and his friends would be able to set a target for spending on culture of a certain percentage of Government expenditure for all European countries, including Britain. Is it my hon. Friend's understanding that the article is pregnant with such potential atrocities?

Mr. Jessel: Yes. It is all part of the European Community institutions trying to tell us more and more what to do. It is all part of the concept of pooling the government of Britain with that of continental countries. The people of Britain do not want that in the arts, in culture or in any other field. Most of us have nothing against, for example, Spaniards or Italians, but the British people do not want to share in ruling Spain or Italy. They certainly do not want the Spaniards and the Italians to have a share in ruling us.

We want friendship and co-operation. In cultural matters there is already a tremendous amount going on by way of exchanges. Our great orchestras, singers, operas and ballets frequently travel on the continent. There is enormous international movement not only of the live arts but of exhibitions of the work of creative artists—so much so that some people have begun to worry.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow) rose——

Mr. Jessel: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I must conclude.

Paintings are moved so often that some people are worried that they may be damaged as they are flown around the continent in aeroplanes. Many exhibitions are paid for by the British Council. I am all in favour of bilateral sponsorship, and some exhibitions are sponsored by American and Japanese interests.

The system is going extremely well. It does not need to be tampered with. We do not need bits of paper from the European Commission. We should remember that sound and sensible American doctrine: "If it ain't bust, don't fix it." Let us concentrate on diversity and cut out all the nonsense about bringing a common cultural heritage to the fore. We do not want it, we do not need it, we ought to have nothing to do with it, and we ought to throw out this terrible treaty.

5.30 pm

Dr. Kim Howells: As someone who considers the definitions of what constitutes good, or high art, and bad, or low art, to be problematic at best and irrelevant most of the time, it grieves me to have to beg to differ with my esteemed colleague, my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd). I suspect that the lyrics of Cole Porter and Bob Dylan explored and reflected the experience of contemporary life with at least as much veracity and insight as the very best librettist of a 20th century opera, and probably a lot better. It is not helpful to talk about the influence of culture in that way, nor is it possible to describe what is a great culture and what is bad.

So-called high or great art has appropriated modes of dance and speech which were—and are—developed in popular dance halls and on the streets, which are not necessarily recognised as the seedbed of great art by the people who are paid excellent salaries to tell us what does or does not constitute great art. I hope that article 128 will not result in a proliferation of salaried positions throughout Europe for culture vultures who, I am afraid, expropriate far too much of the money that is made available to artists, writers and musicians in Europe, and which should end up in their pockets, rather than with quangos from Dublin to Berlin.

The interesting aspect of article 128 is that it may make possible co-operation in film production throughout Europe. This country has a great, but aging reputation in film. We have watched our film industry decline rapidly during the past 20 years. Although we must be careful not to romanticise the French and Italian film industries, we have a good deal to learn from them about the way in which we fund films. It is important to emphasise that the British film industry—I say British because I want to differentiate between English and Welsh films——

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): What about Scottish films?

Dr. Howells: I shall discuss Scottish films in a different way.

We must understand the relationship between film making in this country, which is mainly English-speaking, and in America, as that is important if we are to understand our relationship with Europe. There has been a great flowering of European film making, especially after the second world war, and a parallel decline in British film making. Perhaps that has as much to do with the direct competition that we face from English-speaking film makers in America as it has to do with any decline in cultural talent and creativity in this country. I believe that it has much more to do with that competition.

During the past five years, the Welsh language channel S4C has been one of the great cradles of film making, albeit on a modest scale, and large sums of money have been made available to it. I understand that they run to about £45 million a year at the moment. Knowing the Government, it is a mystery to some of us why that generosity continues. I am glad it does, because it is an interesting and worthwhile experiment, which shows that it is possible to fund film, or at least to create a seedbed of talent and hope that it will develop.

Mr. Key: That illustrates exactly what we mean by subsidiarity. The great benefit of article 128 in the treaty of Maastricht is precisely that it concentrates on what national Governments should do and does not seek to establish a grand European design. In the same breath, I must draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to what is happening in Scotland with the Gaelic language and the fact that, when talking about less-used European languages, it is important to understand exactly what we mean. We are not merely talking about languages spoken by a few score thousand people. The Danes are very sensitive about Danish being a less-used European language, as are the Germans in the context of publishing.

Dr. Howells: I thank the Minister for that intervention. I think that that is one of the easier examples of subsidiarity to understand. However, it must constantly be tested in this Parliament. We cannot take it for granted that next year's grant for Welsh or Scottish language film making will be automatic. I assume that it will not be, and that we shall have to fight that battle next year as we have done in the past.

Dr. Godman: May I point out to my hon. Friend that there is no hint of any application of the principle of subsidiarity in article 128?

Dr. Howells: Thank you. I understand that the article comes under the heading of those governed by subsidiarity —[HON. MEMBERS: "Why?"] It is in the first sentence.

On the funding of film making in Europe, I do not for a moment believe that the future lies with some sort of Euro-film culture. Some examples of joint film production in Europe are excellent, but I am afraid that some are the filmic equivalent of the Eurovision song contest. As a fan of cowboy films, I think some of the awful spaghetti westerns that have been made on the prairies of Spain and at Cinecitta in Rome are an example. However, we should not be put off by that—and nor should we see it as the model for the future.

The interesting aspect of article 128 is the possibility that it offers for the movement of capital and the joint funding of films. For whatever reason, there have been many heroic attempts to raise large amounts of money to make films in Britain. One thinks of the successes of people such as David Puttnam in doing so.

Film making is a phenomenally expensive industry, if the films are to compete in an international market. I understand that the latest Steven Spielberg film cost about $55 million, and that the lead character—a dinosaur—cost more than it cost to make the film Casablanca. We must come to terms with how we can raise that amount of money. Whether because of Government policy or the backwardness of banks and financiers and their unimaginative policies, the money has not been forthcoming and our best talents have had to move across the Atlantic to try to find it. I hope that the opportunities presented by article 128 will make the Government take notice of the possibilities, and take a lead in seeking funds.

Mrs. Dunwoody: My hon. Friend mentioned the provision by the Community of money for the making of Welsh language films. Small amounts may be specifically allowable for what are patronisingly called "less-used languages"; but if the British film industry made a determined attempt to secure the fiscal and other support that other European countries give to their film industries, we should immediately be told that that would distort the pattern of trade. It simply would not be acceptable.

Dr. Howells: I cannot agree. This may sound like heresy, coming from an Opposition Member, but I do not believe that the future of films depends on state subsidy. The state cannot fund the film industry, regardless of who governs the state concerned. We cannot ask the taxpayer to put up $50 million, or the sterling equivalent. The role of the state is to create the seedbed for film talent—and, so far as I can see, nothing in article 128 will preclude that happening in this or any other European country. Indeed, we may be able to learn from the European example.

None the less, my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) has raised an important point. What will happen, for example, if free competition across European frontiers requires the fair competition office in Brussels to investigate the £45 million given by the British Government to S4C, the Welsh language channel? Will it be seen as unfair competition, on the ground that it promotes the British film industry? I fear that this may spell trouble for many of our finest institutions which currently receive state funds.

I have hopes for article 128. I think that it may advance the film industry—not through the idea that we shall come up with a European image of film, which I consider hopeless nonsense, but perhaps through the idea that the individual creative talent which exists in each European region and nation can be helped by receiving funds.

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Dame Janet Fookes): I call the Minister of State.

Hon. Members: Why?

Mr. Garel-Jones: I hope that it will be convenient if I speak briefly—[Interruption.]

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. It is for the Chair to select speakers, and I have selected the Minister of State.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Thank you, Dame Janet. Like other hon. Members, I am extremely anxious to hear what my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) has to say.

The Committee will be grateful to the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) for making it clear that her purpose was to provide the Committee with an opportunity for debate. So far, we have engaged in an amusing and interesting debate, and we have enjoyed that;

I must tell the hon. Lady, however, that—charming colleague though she is outside the House—her speech was, I fear, disappointing to all of us. My hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) rightly described it as an extraordinary speech, snide and denigrating in tone; the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) said the same.

The hon. Lady treated us to a tour d'horizon, but I fear that her horizons proved rather narrow for me, at any rate —and, I believe, for the Committee. Hardly a commonplace did not receive a mention. The hon. Lady's remarks about United States culture and renaissance values, her attacks on the Government and Baroness Thatcher—[Interruption.]

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. I do not expect to hear a seated commentary.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Thank you, Dame Janet.

Those remarks by the hon. Member for Cynon Valley were, I think, a disappointment to the Committee. They were not up to the standards that we expected. Moreover, in your absence, Dame Janet, she came out with some quotations in Welsh and invited me to follow her down the same route. I shall resist the temptation, as heaven above knows where it might lead me.

5.45 pm

The hon. Lady crowned her speech with a very silly proposition: that the European Community should set minimum standards of expenditure—and later on, no doubt, minimum standards of culture. As I have said, she came out with a number of commonplaces; even Dr. Goebbels got a mention. I think that it was Dr. Goebbels who said, "When I hear the word culture, I reach for my revolver."—[HON. MEMBERS: "Goering."] I am bound to say that when I hear the hon. Member for Cynon Valley discussing this subject I tend to reach for my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks)—who, alas, is not present today. I think that he would have dealt with the hon. Lady's remarks much more briskly and comprehensively than I could.

The article, as drafted in the treaty, responds to our concerns and provides a fully satisfactory basis for the development of cultural activity. It puts the emphasis where it rightly belongs—on national initiatives. It talks, for example, of the Community's "supporting and supplementing"—not replacing—co-operation between member states, and of the need to respect "national and regional diversity". It is also outward-looking in recognising the need for both the Community and member states to co-operate with third countries, the Council of Europe and others; and, in what is inevitably a sensitive area, it offers the safeguard of unanimity and specifically excludes harmonisation.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for National Heritage has supported me throughout today's debate. As the creation of the new Department of National Heritage has underlined, the arts and heritage are of growing importance in many people's lives. That is true both in this country and in other member states. In practice, EC Culture Ministers have been meeting for several years, and the level of Commission activity has tended to increase.

It is an obvious advantage to have a proper legal basis for the co-ordination of this activity, which previously took place in a rather unfocused legislative context. Even better is to have a clear definition of what it is appropriate for the Community to do in the cultural field. Thankfully, article 128 eschews the grandiose, and identifies some sensible areas, which member states can usefully work together.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Will the Minister explain why it is necessary to clarify the legislative basis on which Ministers have worked together towards co-operation if—as the right hon. Gentleman has told us—those Ministers do not intend to implement legislation at senior level? Surely Ministers cannot co-operate cheerfully and then suddenly say that they want a legislative base without giving the House a clear indication that they will do something with that legislative base.

Mr. Garel-Jones: There are two answers to the hon. Lady's perfectly fair question. First, in the past four or five years we have become increasingly aware that, unless the areas in which Commission activity is permitted are specifically defined and limited, the Commission in its enthusiasm—which is sometimes well placed and sometimes misplaced—will seek to involve itself in areas where we had not envisaged its intervention. We have become increasingly exposed to that possibility since the passage of the Single European Act. Some articles in the treaty would permit such involvement—by unanimity, I am glad to say.

Secondly, as taxpayers' money is likely to be spent, even though the sums involved will not be huge, I think it right to define, limit and clarify the areas in which the Commission can act.

The extent of cultural co-operation and interchange in Europe is growing all the time. It is already a practical reality that we have experienced in Britain and shared with our European neighbours. One recent example in the United Kingdom was the European city of culture programme and hon. Members, particularly those representing Scottish constituencies, will remember that Glasgow played a quite outstanding role, which has been of continued benefit not only to the citizens of Glasgow but to Scotland as well.

Dr. Godman: What is the Government's current position on the Council of Europe charter on regional and minority languages? Are the Government closer to becoming a signatory to that charter, or do Ministers still have serious reservations about it?

Mr. Garel-Jones: Yes, it is under active consideration. We hope to be able to respond to that question shortly, although I cannot give the hon. Gentleman a precise answer now.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) raised a point about Bohemian wood carvings. Several of our diplomatic posts in eastern Europe have reported details of stolen articles of this kind. An exercise is being co-ordinated in co-operation with the Department of National Heritage with the objective of establishing a register of stolen articles, including Bohemian wood carvings, which can be circulated to auction houses in the United Kingdom.

My hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) made an interesting and charming speech. At the end of that speech he said something which would have touched a chord with members of all parts of the Committee——

Hon. Members: We cannot hear.

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. I remind the Minister that both for practical reasons and for reasons of courtesy it is better that he should point in the normal direction.

Mr. Garel-Jones: My hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham was expressing a sentiment that will be shared by hon. Members on both sides of the House. We all need to feel a sense of belonging to our own nation. That is important to us in the expression of our national identity. One of the anxieties that many hon. Members have felt is that, for a number of years, the Community has been moving towards seeking to persuade us that the sense of belonging that we feel for our nation can be, may be or should be replaced and substituted by a sense of belonging to the greater European ideal. In my judgment, the treaty in which the article that we are debating appears gives the lie to that and, to the extent that it ever was true, arrests the process and begins to reverse it.

Chancellor Helmut Kohl said in a speech in Oxford on 11 November:

"We have not laid the foundation stone with Maastricht for a European superstate which will reduce everything to the same level and blur the differences. Rather we have committed ourselves to a Europe constructed on the principle of unity in diversity."

I am confident that the Europe to which article 128, through the cultural dimension, will make a contribution, will be one in which my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham will feel at home and comfortable and in which his English identity is both respected and enhanced.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I am pleased to be following the Minister, as it seems to me that article 128 sums up precisely what is wrong with the treaty. It is really about time for the House of Commons to say plainly that the Community must stop imposing from above views that ought to grow from co-operation between nations. The article is a classic example of that.

The Minister told us that, because the Commission does not have a clearly defined role, whenever there is a difficulty it begins to expand into areas in which it has no business to operate. I can understand the Minister's wish to prevent those divisions from getting into administrative and legalistic problems, because they have no direct legal right to interfere in national affairs. But the reality is different.

The House of Commons gets into a frightful muddle when it talks about culture. We have heard one or two examples of that this afternoon. For example, the culture of my grandchildren, which to a certain extent involves the use of videos, books and paintings that are based on the use of computers and computer design, is not the culture from which I benefited many years ago, from teachers who had a far more formal way of teaching. I do not think that they necessarily gave me a more widely based culture—it was simply different.

We should be worried about accepting something that talks about a common culture and says that we should make money available for grandiose events that will look as if they are joint efforts, without asking precisely what that means.

My hon. Friend the Member for Pontypridd (Dr. Howells) was concerned about the diminishing British film industry. There are bilateral treaties, and over the past 30 years there have been attempts by the industry itself and by various cultural organisations to produce co-operative films, with varying degress of success, but the reality is that the Community allows enormous differences in national approaches, as it does on so many issues. Were we allowed to protect British films in the way in which the French protect their film industry, there would be some point in looking for a legalistic basis.

The French have always used every known barrier to protect French films, and they will continue to do so with impunity. They will think of a dozen different reasons. They will say that it is entirely a matter of protecting their language and culture, and that it is important to carry that culture to other nations. They use the money available for cultural budgets to go to Africa and other third-world countries to establish bases which are used, sometimes quite brutally, for the extension of trade—and good luck to them if they can get away with it.

If we tried to do the same thing, we should rapidly be told that there was no such protection available for English language films, because English is not a minority language. Not even in the House do we pretend that English is a minority language. From time to time, we might believe that we have the sole right to take control of it, but the truth is that, throughout the world, the film industry makes films in a language which is used commercially in a hundred different countries for a hundred different reasons.

The Community does not need such an article to get co-operation for cultural events. It is quite capable of that without any such definition. The Commission needs the article because it wants to extend its hegemony. That is the reality behind the clause, and that is my basic objection to it. Not all the affectionate or slightly esoteric commitments to the protection of the cultures of those using—that marvellous phrase that the Minister used—"less-used" languages will change the fact that the treaty is meant to "canalise", if we are making up words—[Interruption.] The Community makes up words all the time—its treaties could have been written by Lewis Carroll—so why cannot we all play the same game?

In any case, the Community is after a means of defining cultural pursuits and co-operation and the money available for culture. That is disastrous. The whole history of Europe shows that culture is the flowering of the arts created by individuals, not dictated by civil servants, by legislation or even by representative groups such as the House of Commons. Culture comes from inside people.

Recently I saw the best piece of live theatre that I have seen for many years, in St. David's cathedral. It was an nativity play about morality, produced just before Christmas by mentally handicapped pupils of a school in the vicinity—young people who believe implicitly in the magic they create and who used that wonderful cathedral to the full, because they understood the connection between what they were presenting and that age-old marvellous church in Wales. That could not have been produced on a co-operative European basis. It grew out of the love and understanding of those young people.

Some hon. Members believe that the House of Commons has had its day, that we are moving to a larger theatre: a European theatre. So why, they ask, should we worry about an extension of the Community's powers?

They say that this is a logical evolution, a normal development towards different political institutions. Not so.

Mr. Winnick: Is it not interesting that, although some of the more enthusiastic pro-Maastricht Members think that the House of Commons has had its day, very few of them want to go to the European Parliament, but very large numbers of Members of the European Parliament, the moment there is a vacancy in the House of Commons, put forward their names and work hard to get here?

Mrs. Dunwoody: I am disappointed that my hon. Friend should adopt such a cynical approach to our colleagues' aspirations in the other European institutions. It is remiss of him to think that some self-interest might be involved——

Mr. Budgen: In her absence, perhaps I might speak for my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie), who has aspirations to move on from this parochial gathering to a wider and nobler gathering in Europe. Perhaps she is an exception to the general rule.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I had hoped that the hon. Lady would be here in person tonight, because with her histrionic abilities, I am sure that she could define the difference between the theatre of the House of Commons and the theatre of the European Parliament.

To return to the article under discussion, some people think that it is possible to produce an entire programme, using taxpayers' money—taken from the taxpayers of the Community—to develop cultural and co-operative projects. The House is right to have deep reservations about this article. I thought that my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) made a warm and committed speech, but I am not sure whether she thought it a good thing that we should develop this European cultural co-operation, or whether, on the whole, she had reservations about it. I at least have strong feelings——

Dr. Kim Howells: Is my hon. Friend saying that culture, as defined by article 128, is so narrowly described as to preclude the idea that the children who took part in that cultural event in St. David's cathedral will probably be able to remain in and around it because we have some European money to help to build roads out to Pembrokeshire? We have also managed to get some European money to build roads up to the valleys.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): We are just getting our own money back.

Dr. Howells: That may well be so, but we should not assume that one lot of money is acceptable while another is not—or that the one is not related to culture and the other is. That is to take an extremely narrow view of what constitutes culture in Europe.

Mrs. Dunwoody: This is my day for being told off by my Welsh colleagues. As a humble woman, I accept that criticism with humility—but I must tell my hon. Friend that what he says is a load of baloney. Some road schemes in this country are announced on large notices emblazoned with blue and gold stars. Those schemes enjoy a tiny percentage of money from the Community and a very large percentage provided by the British taxpayer. If my hon. Friend is suggesting that we can develop cultural events only by obtaining money from the Community, I am not convinced. I should want to see a large budget, clearly defined and under the control of these, admittedly inadequate, Ministers before I was prepared to go along with such an idea.

One has only to read article 128 to realise the difficulties:

"The Community shall contribute to the flowering of the cultures of the Member States, while respecting their national and regional diversity and at the same time bringing the common cultural heritage to the fore".

What a load of rubbish.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Read us some more.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I could read more of it in considerable detail. There has always been a common commitment to the beautiful. It was William Morris who said that one should have nothing in one's house that was not either useful or beautiful—and I think he meant, preferably both.

Those of us who want the lives of every citizen of this country to be enriched have always wanted access for those citizens to the best of our literature, translated or otherwise—even translations from Celtic enrich those who read them. We want access to museums, to art galleries and to the best of all real art. But the great dearth of culture in the lives of many of those who serve will not be filled by any of this nonesense. Their culture grows out of their interests and their views, and who are we to gainsay them? This article does not deal with that problem, and it does nothing about the dearth of money—money that is needed to help to create the essential arts.

In my constituency, a small unit teaches teachers to enrich the lives of small children using computers in fabric design, picture design and writing music. I have seen the children in question freed from the pressures of having to draw up staves and create tunes by working them out in their heads. They can use the keyboards and computers to compose music. That is the sort of project that we should be pursuing. Nowhere in the Community does it happen, because it would be regarded as beneath those in the Commission who are full-time cultural employees, concerned only with their manipulative powers to control from Brussels.

That is what this is about. It has nothing to do with culture. It is concerned with the extension of the powers of the Community. As such, I would go along with my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley and her fellow occupants of the Opposition Front Bench if they voted on removing the provision.

I would take that view not because I am against culture —even though my ex-husband always used it as a word of denigration; even I know that one must have an expensive public school education before one can be rude about culture—but because I do not see that we are discussing an area in which the EC has any right, legitimate interest or vision of what it is doing. It should not interfere where it has no business to stray.

Mr. Budgen: It would be disgraceful if I spoke for long, because my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Walden), who was a distinguished Minister at the Department of Education, will undoubtedly have a unique contribution to make to the debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) is also anxious to speak, for he has a strong view about the expression of British identity which is endangered by the article that we are discussing.

[Mr. Budgen]

We are aware of the vigorously authoritarian attitude that is being pursued by the Government in bashing the Bill through the House. They will do their best, by the means available to them, to prevent my hon. Friends from expressing their views. I shall not do the business of the Whips by speaking for too long, thereby excluding my hon. Friends who have distinguished contributions to make to this important debate.

In a long and important contribution, the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) demonstrated what can be described as the progressive force of the Community. She says of article 128, "My goodness, this is a jolly good little article. This is a provision by which we in the Labour party can encourage the institutions of the Community to use their power to subvert the will of the British people, as for the time being expressed in electing a Conservative Government to power.

"We," says the hon. Lady, "would like to see rather more money spent on the arts. We should also like to see local authorities interfered with by a Labour Government in imposing various architectural standards and standards of expenditure. Sadly, we have not been elected by the British people to carry out those proposals, so let us see if we can get them enforced on the British people by a European side wind."

The hon. Lady then uses article 128 as a way of subverting our constitution, and she suggests ways by which it could be extended. As we know, certain people in the Commission would support her in those aspirations. In addition, the European Court, sometimes called a progressive institution, would be pleased to support the aspirations of the Commission in extending the power of the European institutions. So it is easy to see how article 128 could be used for the purposes which the hon. Member for Cynon Valley suggests. For those and other reasons, it is important that we hear the views of the Committee before a vote is taken on the subject.

It is easy for the Minister to look at a narrow interpretation of article 128 and say that the British Government are not likely to agree to it being extended by the Commission or by any of those in the EEC with federal aspirations. But the most dangerous feature of the way in which business is done in the Community is the trade-off. Consider, for example, the trade-off which allows a British Conservative Government to applaud even the extension of cohesion funds and to pretend that that extension fits easily with the philosophy of the Government, in so far as they have any philosophy.

I understand that the Government now pride themselves on having none. In the bad old days when we had a British Conservative Government with a philosophy, it used to be rather uncomfortable to return with proposals for rapidly increasing expenditure in the EEC. In the bad old days when Lady Thatcher was leading the Conservative party, she used to find it disagreeable to explain that she had agreed, as part of a trade-off, to increases in expenditure.

When it is said that we do not particularly want the soldiers of the Cheshire Regiment or, as it may become, the Staffordshire Regiment, unhappily risking their lives for European purposes in Bosnia; and when, as may be the case, this House begins to express its distaste for the European purposes of the Commission in the old Yugoslavia, it is likely that somebody will ask, "If you are going to take your troops away, do you think you could give us a bit more money for European culture?" So, rather than saying no to everything, the trade-off will be a slightly more progressive attitude towards article 128.

As I said, I shall be brief, because I am anxious that my hon. Friends are not excluded by the authoritarian attitude of the Whips from expressing their attitude towards the subject—[Interruption.] I hope that they will not only give their attitude but take action. Indeed, I am anxious that we hear the views of the whole House.

Article 128 is no insignificant matter, because it is to be considered a means of supporting and enhancing the identity of the European state. Why does any state subscribe money to the arts? In our modern democracies, money is sometimes given simply to buy support, and as my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) is so crude as to point out—[Interruption.] He is a very good man, whose views I summarise by saying that he points out that sometimes the funds subscribed by working-class taxpayers are used to buy middle-class support for expensive shows for which the middle class would rather themselves not pay entirely.

That is state expenditure of a modern, democratic sort. Much reference has been made to state expenditure on the arts in the past. It is pointed out that the Medici spent a great deal of money. That happened not because the Medici were demonstrating, as they spent their money on art, that they had a particularly warm feeling for their citizens and were saying, "We must never poison another human being."

Mr. Cormack: Perhaps my hon. Friend is referring to the Borgias.

Mr. Budgen: Let us not go in for another assassination: let us respect the dignity of our citizens. The Medicis decided to put some cash into culture to demonstrate the power, the authority and the identity of their state. That is what article 128 is about: it is designed to allow those who wish to enhance the identity of the European state to give money to promote that aim.

I listened with care to the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Dr. Howells). I wonder what my attitude would be if I were a Welsh nationalist and there was before Parliament a measure authorising expenditure on the making of the Union Jack. I would vote against it, because the Union Jack is a symbol of the authority and identity of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Budgen: I should like to finish this peroration, and shall deliver a second one when I have had time to draw breath.

Article 128 is designed to enhance the identity of the European state, and that is no more and no less than what every state has done throughout the ages. It has taken money from the taxpayer to enforce its power and enhance its identity.

Mr. Rowe: I find my hon. Friend's picture more encouraging than the reality, which appears to be that organisations such as the European Community or the Arts Council spend far too much money encouraging extremely divergent cultures and do their level best to revive minority cultures that would be better consigned to oblivion.

Mr. Budgen: In a democracy, Governments use cultural subsidies to buy the support of various groups. I shall give an example. Until recently, Wolverhampton council was for a long time controlled by the Labour party and used to buy the support of ethnic groups by offering subsidies to ethnic theatres. Of course, that is not much different from the Government offering to support the middle class and trying to buy their votes by giving enhanced grants to the Arts Council. That is an inescapable part of the modern democratic process, but it has been the practice throughout the centuries for the state to spend money on culture to enhance its authority. Of course, article 128 does not state the honest federalism of my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) but slips it in slowly and surreptitiously, carefully and hypocritically, and deals with

"bringing the common cultural heritage to the fore."

I do not know when European cultural policy will have a new boost. Perhaps it will be in 1996, when there is a mark 2 Maastricht treaty or when, eventually, the true federal nature of the European institutions will be unclothed a little more. Article 128 is just as much an expression of European identity as the provisions for European citizenship. Those of us who are British nationalists want to reject it all.

Mr. Randall: Essentially, the article is about co-operation between member states and with the third world to encourage diversity. That is a wonderful aim, which I wholly support, because culture transcends national boundaries. The article extends the Community's powers to cover culture, and that is welcome. The private sector, not just the Government, has an important role in funding the arts and culture. I was devastated by the way in which the funding of the Royal Shakespeare Company meant that some important productions had to be terminated. There was no scope for cutting costs, other than by reducing quality, and joint funding was essential.

The co-operative involvement of all Community countries as outlined in the article will benefit culture not only in this country but throughout the Community. Some such structure is needed because current co-operation is far too limited and needs to be extended. The arts and culture involve minority interests that cannot be funded by the market, because insufficient money is collected at the kiosks of theatres and other establishments. Therefore, there must be some subsidy.

Article 128 contains some worthwhile elements, and I am pleased that my party supports it. My hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) said that we would not vote against it, but one's voting intentions on the treaty as a whole do not show whether one supports or is against an article. That is why I intervened on my hon. Friend.

The co-operative improvement of knowledge of European culture and its conservation would be excellent. The notion of exchanges of artistic and literary creations would strengthen the arts and culture. The article would encourage national diversity: if it did not do that, but sought to create homogeneous cultures, I would have great reservations about it.

Dr. Godman: Article 128 would give the Commission far more competence on cultural matters. Is my hon. Friend relaxed about such a development?

6.30 pm

Mr. Randall: Yes, I am—for the main reason that, when it comes to decision-making, recommendations will be made but there will be a question of unanimity, so I believe that there is protection if one has a feeling of horror about the power of the Commission. That is a powerful argument.

We are not talking about harmonisation at all. We are not saying that each national Government has to have the same legislation on this and that we are going to create art and culture like sausage out of a sausages machine. I am convinced that the will will exist throughout the Community and in our own Government and Opposition to ensure that that richness in our society would not be swept away. I believe that, although it is easy to put over the cynical argument that this is the Commission with Delors marching through and tearing our paintings off the wall and stamping on them and carrying out all that kind of nonsense, that cynical argument does not stand up because of the importance of this whole thing.

We are talking of the whole character and personality of our country expressed through this medium. That is all I wanted to say. Article 128 is worth while if one looks at it in isolation, as we must do in Committee. It is comprehensive and encouraging. The notion of the countries of Europe co-operating in this way is something which I find exciting; I am convinced that it will enrich the culture of our society and of Europe in a shared way which is utterly exciting.

Mr. Richard Shepherd: This culture article—article 128—reads like an article in the constitution of the former Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. It enjoys all the same sort of ad hominem goodwill, such as:

"while respecting their national and regional diversity and at the same time bringing the common cultural heritage to the fore."

It has a series of aspirational claims. However I am grateful to the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) who led for the Opposition in characteristic form, showing the true colours of this debate. She moved an amendment to remove article 128 from the treaty, and I intend to speak in favour of that amendment. The hon. Lady suggested that she was probing, but I could not identify one probing comment in her remarks. She indicated, however, that she did not intend to oppose the article. I am disappointed about that, and I will give my reasons.

My hon. Friend the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) gave the essential concept of the nature of what is stated: art and culture are often used for the purposes of aggrandisement. I am very conscious of that aspect because in some of the instances that have been mooted and floated around the House—the great ruling families such as the Hapsburgs and the Medicis—it was to be an adornment for the state. That brings me to the point that I think has informed these debates the whole way through the examination of the Bill in Committee—that this is a constitution that we are considering. The right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) tried, under title I, to identify whether this did not have the elements of the state, of the executive, of their powers and competetences and so on. One acknowledges that this small article 128 is an instance which lays claim to a common policy.

The hon. Member for Cynon Valley noted that the article added a new legal competence to the Community, and said that additionally it was under a single institutional framework. Why is this necessary? The Minister of State, my right hon. Friend the Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones) was cautious under title I to say that this House need only legislate for that which is necessary. What is necessary about legislation within the United Kingdom to enforce the objectives of this article? What is wrong with working as we have always worked—intergovernmentally—to establish the objectives and ideals that we seek?

We can go through the words, but what is diversity of culture and "flowering of cultures"? What is European culture? I suggest that European culture is the sum total of all the constituent elements in it, no more and no less. When we say "culture", it includes all the elements of those things to which we respond. Opposition Members identify what is meant by the distinction that is often made in a popular sense: popular culture, high culture and middle-brow culture.

All these are competing elements, and many of the objects now identified as culture grew from the popular activities of the people of individual nations. Over the years, they fade or come into glory as they are: the insistent drum-beat, that everything now needs subsidisation or the transfer of funds from one area to another, is to keep what in being? I think of all the thousands of artefacts from ancient Greece that have been destroyed. Part of life is a remembrance of things past; part of it is the echo through the lines of culture that we have. What hon. Members have said is quite right: our culture is a common culture in one particular—that it draws from all the strengths and beacons of light, of intelligence, of spirit and soul that have illuminated the ages. Yet none of this has required a central European organisation to identify it.

Who is the best custodian of culture? If it will not flower from within ourselves or the people, surely it is the national Government who have the greatest regard. Has French culture failed to flourish because there is no European central commission initiating proposals for the survival of French culture? The proposition is ridiculous. France, vigilant as always to its honour, its integrity, and the regard in which it is held in the world, consigns a third of its public revenues to the maintenance of its cultural objectives. It recognises in culture that the prestige, the association and the grandeur which comes from that are part of its standing in the world as a whole.

It is because the French as a nation state within the European Community identify that, that others do so. We see in Germany the huge level of subsidies poured into state opera companies, and God bless them for it. They must direct their resources where they want and identify the elements of culture that are theirs.

The hon. Member for Cynon Valley opened by saying that she was in harmony with our Front Bench, thus emphasising that we are now living under a Con-Lab Government in respect of Maastricht and there is resentment clearly emanating from Labour Front-Bench Members that they are not sitting with their colleagues in this matter, on the Government Front Bench. That illustrates the tensions involved.

No one, not even the Minister of State, explained why the matter needed a single institutional framework, nor why it needed a legal competence. If I understood his rather dismissive argument, it was that the Community extends its competences anyway and that putting some new competence in and giving it a legal life would limit its natural instinct to expand into other areas. That is a most extraordinary argument and a very confused one. If we are saying that we are all at risk without giving greater competences to the Community, that it will have them anyway, and that by giving them greater competences we are limiting this one, that is a very curious argument. Yet that is the sort of low-level, shallow argument of lies and deceit to be forced on the nation to tide us through on this Bill.

There has been no candid examination of any clause that I have heard in terms of what it is intended to accomplish. Why does it require a single institutional framework? Why does it need adjudication by the European Court of Justice? How do we democratically effect the objectives? We have talked about subsidy. Opera is a particular identity of Italy. The Italian state and the regional governments pour sums into opera houses that we do not even begin to understand. Does that require subvention from the centre,

"acting unanimously on a proposal from the Commission"?

Notice the insidious way in which the Commission must propose, because the proposer holds the agenda and controls the directions to which the Community looks.

That assault on such things as our culture has caused the Danes to pause and hesitate, because linked with culture is another matter that we shall debate later—citizenship and all the linking elements of the state. The treaty is driving us towards a conclusion that, of the whole Community, only the British Government—in association, of course, with Labour Front-Bench spokesmen—wish to hide and conceal from the British people. Ours is the only Government in the Community who do not believe that the treaty is a centralising treaty. Every other leader has said, "Hallelujah—we are now marching towards a more central, single identity."

Mr. Garel-Jones rose——

Mr. Shepherd: I shall give way to my right hon. Friend, who would not give way to me.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I have given way to my hon. Friend on other occasions; I am sorry that I did not do so today. Does he think that the Dutch Government, whose unitary text was defeated, went back saying that this was a great success?

Mr. Shepherd: I said that every other Government believed that Maastricht is a centralising treaty.

Mr. Garel-Jones rose——

Mr. Shepherd: Let me finish my point. If my right hon. Friend the Minister of State had had the courtesy to listen to the points and arguments advanced by Members across the Committee he would have been able to respond to them. It is difficult to put an argument when the response has already been given. The Dutch Government did not get as federalist and centralising a measure as they would wish. Nevertheless, they recognised that the treaty is a centralising measure and told their people that.

Mr. Garel-Jones: When?

Mr. Shepherd: Several times—press reports have shown that.

Mr. Garel-Jones: My hon. Friend is making a series of assertions. The fact is that the Dutch Government were openly disappointed about the defeat of their text. I am not aware—if my hon. Friend is so confident, perhaps he can give an instance—that they have said that they regard Maastricht as a centralising treaty.

Mr. Shepherd: It is a consolidating measure. My right hon. Friend will have to accept my recollection from press reports. I assure him that assertions have been made across the Community that Maastricht is essentially a centralising treaty, that the elements of the state are coming into place and that competences are being extended. The parrot chant of the new Con-Lab Front Bench is that the treaty is held back by a concept of subsidiarity, but no legal judgment has given flesh to confidence, in a juridical sense, in the belief that that means anything.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor (Upminster): Has my hon. Friend noticed the insidious wording of paragraph 1 of article 128, which says:

"The Community shall contribute to the flowering of the cultures of the Member States while respecting their national and regional diversity and at the same time bringing the common cultural heritage to the fore."

Does my hon. Friend agree that, when there is conflict between the two, as there is bound to be, the Community will emphasise the common culture at the expense of the national culture?

Mr. Shepherd: My hon. Friend identifies one of the central concerns. I add the concern that a common anything is a homogenisation. The criticism of American culture made by many people on the continent of Europe is that it insidiously infects and diminishes European culture. The violence of American films and the crassness of American civilisation and culture are often cited. We all affect each other, but I fear that a central institutional framework will homogenise, reduce and diminish. Ministers have not argued why the French need protection for their diversity and the flowering of their own culture.

The second concept that has not been dealt with in the debate is

"Action by the Community shall be aimed at encouraging co-operation between Member States and, if necessary, supporting and supplementing their action in the following areas".

The first is

"improvement of the knowledge and dissemination of the culture and history of the European peoples."

Again, I do not know what that means or why each individual nation, which is responsible for the custody and safeguarding of its historic traditions, cannot argue its own perception.

What is a European history with a common perspective? The one glory of life, civilisation and culture is that we stand on different hillocks, perhaps looking at the same distant horizon, but because the angle of perception is different, our interpretation of the view is also different. That is an intimate part of the culture and diversities of the people of Europe. The institutional framework set out in the article contradicts the objective that it claims to seek.

6.45 pm

Mr. Marlow: My hon. Friend may be living under some misconceptions, which the article will help to put right. For example, he may believe that King Harold was a great English patriot trying to keep the French at bay and that Edward the Confessor was a traitor because he asked those dreadful Frenchmen to come here. The reality is that Edward the Confessor was a great European patriot, and what he did when he ceded his kingdom to William the Conqueror was a precursor for the Maastricht treaty. When the Commission takes over the writing of the European history that our children are taught in school, that new reality will be very much the truth.

Mr. Shepherd: I am grateful for that. I am always in awe of the perspective from Northamptonshire.

The dissemination of the culture and history of the culture of European people is a major debate on what constitutes history and what is history. Every hon. Member reads—other than the Home Secretary in connection with this treaty and public interest immunity certificates. Aragon was asked, "What is history?" His response was, "First you have to invent it." That is the argument that I am trying to put. We look from different perspectives and each of us has a particular recollection: that of the nation state, by language, unites a view. We fight over the interpretation of history, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education has shown. We are very particular in our understanding of what it is. My fear is the homogenisation of all these matters.

The last thing that I want to say is about

"artistic and literary creation, including in the audiovisual sector".

Let us remember what art and culture was about. It was a popular expression of who we are, but now we have to subsidise it. I recall a directive on the proportion of television programmes which could be devoted to matters emanating from the United States. The European Commission wanted to protect what it regarded as the European concept.

We genuinely have a difficulty: English is our language. Churchill's "History of the English-Speaking Peoples" reaches around the world. We will always have a difficulty in that the accessibility of ideas, thoughts and spirit is communicated in a tongue that we understand. The United States will always be a great influence on us—and we, hopefully, on it—because of the commonality of our language. Our language reaches Canada, Australia and New Zealand. At the heart of all cultural, historical perceptions and so on, stands the fact that, no matter how rich or poor or what colour people are, we are united by our language. We speak the intimacy of our thoughts and experiences each to the other in our language.

All this nonsense, which is an endeavour to destroy the character of communities, of countries and of languages —all this tries to strike at the one great deception of Europe: it is not equal as regards public opinion, knowledge or understanding because it is not common in language. What do we do about that? Do we do something about it through this measure or through educational measures seeking some sort of Esperanto? In what direction are we heading?

[Mr. Shepherd]

Glory be to our diversity. What was it, that wonderful thing?

"Glory be to God for dappled things."

We are a "dappled thing". Let us have glory for what we are and reject the nonsense of homogeneity in this treaty insidiously undermining our institutions and opening up a gulf between both Front Benches and the people. How can the people have respect for the House when we are marched through the Lobbies and forbidden to speak? We cannot even return to a question. Every application for closure is accepted. We have had no free speech on this measure.

What do all the dumb journalists in the Hallelujah Chorus up in the Gallery think they do with their absurd commentaries on the British process of making and unmaking laws? Not one stays to listen to the detail of debate. "Yesterday in Parliament" is now in the business of mere sketch-writing. I listened to it this morning and I did not know what were the matters being discussed in Parliament in respect of the greatest constitutional settlement of the past 200 years, taking away our ability to change what Commission officials—Eurocrats—determine is in the interests or nature of European civilisation, culture and history.

We are it, we are part of it, and our constituents are part of it. So long as we can hold Ministers accountable for their actions, we can change the laws under which we live. We can direct all the funds that we wish to any objective that the British people deem appropriate. But by these arrangements, sneakily put through by conniving Front Benches, the Con-Lab alliance on this matter intends to try to take away that right.

If I speak passionately on this, it is because I feel passionate about it. If I hear people ask why we have not got through the debate, as some foolish hon. Members do, I will tell them that this was the method by which other countries of Europe lost their freedom: good men sat on their hands. Good men—and women, too—said that it would not work, that our fingerprints must not be on the treaty, and all the rest of it. Yet here are the fingerprints, embedding themselves into our very vitals, demonstrating what is the spirit of it.

Across the continent of Europe, there have been moments when each of us has had to turn to the other for the survival of things in which we believe. We have seen atrocities, but so long as there are beacons for freedom, so long as there are Parliaments such as this which can express the views and will of the people, we can stand against the tyrannies which face the ordinary person in this world.

The Comptroller of Her Majesty's Household (Mr. David Lightbown) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Sydney Chapman and Mr. James Arbuthnot.

Amendment accordingly negatived.

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): We come now to amendment No. 6.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. We have just heard a speech by the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) about the importance of Parliament as a democratic assembly. It was with some irony that the closure was moved immediately afterwards. It certainly gave rise in some people's minds to the view that perhaps there was some sort of timetable agreed with the Chairmen and Chairwomen of the Committee. I am sure that that is not true——

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman is fully aware that that is not a matter for the Chair.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): On a point of order. I am seeking your advice, Mr. Lofthouse, on a matter relating to the amendment which we are about to consider. You will know that education and vocational training were never part of the original treaty of Rome, although the subject was mentioned slightly in the Single Act. However, we are aware that it now becomes very much part of what will be decided in this country, because it is very much part of the Maastricht treaty, which we are currently debating.

The House will be well aware of my interest in health matters, and I have to put this point to you because it affects the quality and standard of health in this country. Will we be obliged to accept diplomas, degrees and qualifications from European universities which are not of a standard equal to our own in this country, if we proceed with this Bill and ratify the treaty?

The First Deputy Chairman: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is quite aware that that cannot possibly be a matter for the Chair.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: The closure was moved at the end of the last debate at a disgracefully early time; it was less than three hours after the debate had started.

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman is criticising the Chair. If he wishes to do so, he must put down the appropriate motion.

Sir Teddy Taylor: On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. While appreciating the enormous difficulties and pressures that you face in present circumstances, I must draw to your attention the fact that amendment No. 131, which relates to a very important article on page 16 of the treaty, was not referred to in any way during the debate that we have just had.

If you take the trouble to choose an amendment, I wonder whether it is in order for the closure to be moved when that amendment, relating to article 18, title V, which I and some others think is a matter of considerable moment, is not referred to, directly or indirectly, in any way during the debate. Can you give any guidance to the Committee on whether it is in order for the closure to be considered when one of the amendments which you have selected has not been referred to?

The First Deputy Chairman: Of course it is in order, or it would not have been done. It is a matter for the judgment of the Chair.

Mr. Marlow: I seek to help the House, and I seek your assistance in doing so, Mr. Lofthouse. You are probably aware that, from about 6.35 onwards, there was a growing number, outside and inside the Chamber, of payroll Members. They seemed to be surging towards the Chamber at that stage.

We know how you respect the House and its procedures and are anxious to have proper debates. It has occurred to me and to many of my hon. Friends that the Government are desirous of getting two groups of amendments through before 10 o'clock, because they are fearful that, come 10 o'clock, if they want to move the 10 o'clock motion and the Labour party is here and the Irish Members are here, they might not get it. So there is concern——

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. I have heard sufficient to know that this is not a matter for the Chair. Is it not a common occurrence that the payroll gathers before divisions? It has always happened since I have been in the House, and the hon. Gentleman must be aware of this. That was not a point of order.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: On a further point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. Perhaps you can confirm that the Chair does not have to accept the closure when it is moved by the Whips—that there is a discretion in such matters.

The First Deputy Chairman: It is a matter of judgment for the Chair, and there it stands.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. I think that I heard you say a moment ago that it is normal practice for hon. Members to be present at the time of a Division. The thing that worries me is how any of those Tory Members, the lap dogs of the Common Market, and everybody else—[Interruption.]—and them as well—manage to know that you would accept a closure.

Of course, all hon. Members will turn up at 9.30 or whatever if it is a 10 o'clock vote. However, if it is an unexpected closure, when the Chair has decided that it is the appropriate moment, how on earth do all those lap dogs know? Since you were not in the Chair when it happened, Mr. Lofthouse, it may well be that there was a nod and a wink in a certain direction from the Whips. If so, it is time that the gang was stopped.

7.30 pm

The First Deputy Chairman: The Chair is not aware of where hon. Members are at any given time. The point of order is not a matter for the Chair. I think that I have taken the points of order far enough.

Mr. Roger Knapman (Stroud): On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. Recently, I went to the Library to ask how many amendments were grouped together during the passing of the Single European Act, and I was told that it was an average of three or four. This time, however, the number of amendments grouped together is nearly 10. Are you taking that point into account when you consider the length of debates and agree to accept a closure?

If we have an average of 10 amendments, compared to the usual three or four, it will be inevitable, as my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) has pointed out, that on some occasions, as in the previous debate, some amendments are selected but not mentioned at all. I wonder whether you will take that into account in the next two hours and 29 minutes.

The First Deputy Chairman: The Chair takes those matters into account when it makes its decision.

Mr. Marlow: On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse.

The First Deputy Chairman: Is it a different point of order from the previous one?

Mr. Marlow: Yes, it is a different point of order. You heard the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) express concern about the coincidence of the timing of the vote with the presence of Government Members. I will not say anything about that, because my point of order is totally different. We all have a great deal of respect for the Chair, and we are conscious that we should help the Chair and continue to show respect for it.

If the Government are seen to want to get two votes on two groups of amendments, there might be a concern among hon. Members that they were getting their way at the expense of Back Benchers. That is obviously the Government's intention, because we feel that they would like to start tomorrow on a clean sheet of social policy.

The First Deputy Chairman: I cannot see any point of order there. It appears that the hon. Gentleman is simply making a speech which borders on criticism of the Chair.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. In the conduct of business in Committee or in the House, when the Government wish to push such matters through, the normal procedure is to table a guillotine motion. This is no criticism of the Chair, because I accept that you, or whoever is in the Chair, must make a judgment based on the position when a motion of whatever sort is put to you.

However, is it not interesting that what we are seeing is beginning to look very much like a guillotine by motions being put to the Chair? I find that very worrying. I hope that you will take into account the perception and the impression which may be created outside if it does not stop. There is a guillotine working, although it was done without having had a debate on it.

The First Deputy Chairman: There has been no guillotine motion whatever. We will now move to the amendments.

Mr. Marlow: On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse.

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. I have taken the points of order far enough.

Mr. Marlow: I spy strangers.

Notice taken, that strangers were present.

Whereupon The FIRST DEPUTY CHAIRMAN, pursuant to Standing Order No. 143, put the Question, That strangers do withdraw.

Question negatived.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): I beg to move amendment No. 6, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert

'(except Articles 126 and 127 on page 32 of Cm 1934)'.

The First Deputy Chairman: It may be convenient to consider at the same time the following amendments: No 193, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 3(p)'.

No. 199, in page 1, line 9, after 'II' insert

'except Article 57(2) on page 13 of Cm 1934'.

No. 212, in page 1, line 9, after 'II' insert

'except Article 127(2) on page 32 of Cm 1934'.

No. 365, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert

'except Article 57 as referred to in Article G on page 13 of Command Paper number 1934'.

No. 52, in page 1, line 10, after '1992', insert 'but not Article 126 in Title II thereof'.

Mr. Lloyd: Despite a delayed start, I begin the debate on vocational training by simply saying that the new competence which would reside in the Community is something to which we attach considerable significance. That is why the Minister will understand that the amendment is a probing one. Perhaps I should not reveal the Opposition's hand too early but simply say that we do not wish to put it to a vote, whatever the intentions of others.

It is widely recognised throughout the Community that vocational training and education lie at the heart of the future, certainly of young people in Europe and more generally in terms of the economic future of the whole Community. I must begin by pointing out that, during the United Kingdom's recent presidency of the Council of Ministers, it is significant that the Government paid so little attention to vocational training that there was only one formal meeting of the Social Affairs Council during the six-month period, and that only one resolution was adopted which had any relevance whatever to vocational training.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I do not want to embarrass the hon. Gentleman, but he will be aware that it is the rule rather than the exception that there should be one Social Affairs Council. During the past five years, which is 10 presidencies, I think that I am right in saying that we have had more than one Social Affairs Council only twice during a presidency.

Mr. Lloyd: If we had a Government who took unemployment and employment issues seriously, it might have been appropriate to start the presidency with a full meeting of the Council of Ministers to discuss what most people in Europe recognise to be the dominant issue facing our economy. There is no argument that there could—and, indeed, should—have been more meetings.

The central point which I was establishing is that, during the six months of the presidency, only one resolution went through which dealt even vaguely with training and associated matters. That was a resolution on the transparency of qualifications.

The six-months presidency certainly did not demonstrate the Government's commitment to development of a Euro-competence in which adult training and education were involved. A European Community publication called "Skill Shortages: A Growing Problem in the Community" made it clear that the Community, the Commission and other institutions attach massive importance to the role of training. They argue:

"In general, the level of adult labour-market training activity tends to be higher in Member states where economic productivity is above the Community average and lower in countries with lower productivity."

Most importantly, they pointed out that there seems to be, effectively, a virtuous and vicious circle of economic development. Those countries which fail to train have low productivity and, having low productivity, fail to train. Those countries with high productivity have high levels of training and, consequently, continue to have high levels of productivity.

That is certainly the real history which we can observe between, for example, the United Kingdom and Germany. Over the years, the Germans have put considerable effort into both increasing productivity and investing in training, whereas in the past 13 years we have had a Government who deride training and want us to move towards a low-wage, low-productivity economy—one with all the worst features of the vicious circle which the European Commission described.

When, as recently as today in the House, the Secretary of State for Employment described training as a burden which the Opposition want to impose on employers, she was very much out of step with the dominant view throughout the rest of western Europe, which sees training as the hub of any attempt to get the economies of western Europe off the ground and into full gear. For those reasons, it is lamentable that we have a Government who are so negative about training.

It is instructive to compare and contrast the records of different countries in the Community. In Britain, the Government's own working party said in a document which fell into my hands that, far from having a training policy, they had a policy which was effectively about massaging unemployment statistics. It said:

"It was agreed that there had been a clear policy shift away from National Education and Training Targets and that Training for Work was largely an employment measure rather than a skills training programme."

Even the Government's friends recognise severe and real flaws in the Government's attitude to training.

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): Not only them.

Mr. Lloyd: As my hon. Friend says, not only them. Certainly those who have any knowledge or experience of training are disillusioned with the Government's efforts.

The Government's abolition of employment training and employment action, and their move towards the so-called training for work initiative represent a move away from skills training towards simply massaging unemployment figures. Those measures are simply a means of keeping the dole queues as small as possible in the statistical publications.

We know from recent parliamentary answers that the Government have systematically cut the finance available from central Government for training initiatives. Let us compare in constant terms the amount of money which the Government have planned to spend in 1993-94 with the estimated outturn for 1992-93. There has been a significant drop—more than 10 per cent.—in the training budget during that period.

Let us consider the number of participants in schemes such as employment training. The Government have cut the cost of those schemes which might suggest that more people could be accommodated. The reverse has happened. In 1989-90, 210,000 people were put through employment training schemes. The Government estimate that there will be as few as 150,000 people on the training for work scheme in 1993-94.

Those training schemes are designed for the long-term unemployed, yet unemployment has shot up dramatically and cruelly. The Government's response has been to cut the amount of money available for those schemes and to cut the number of places, so that fewer people have the opportunity to receive that type of training.

Mr. Cash: I do not particularly like making this point often, but I am astonished as I look across the Chamber to see that the hon. Gentleman is speaking to literally two other members of his party on a matter which affects policy on education and vocational training for the whole of the rest of Europe, as well as for the United Kingdom. I wonder whether he could encourage some of his hon. Friends to come along and at least listen to his pearls of wisdom.

Mr. Lloyd: You will understand, Mr. Lofthouse, that at this stage in the proceedings I would find it difficult to go out and perform the task that the hon. Gentleman invites me to perform. Even as I gaze at the Benches opposite, it is clear that, unfortunately, the debate has not attracted many listeners. That may be my fault. We shall see whether the numbers flood in later when the hon. Gentleman has an opportunity to speak.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the monumental and excessive windbaggery of the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) may have allowed word to get out from the Chamber that there is something marginally tedious about our proceedings on the Bill?

7.45 pm

Mr. Lloyd: The hon. Gentleman makes his point in admirable style. The issue of training is vital to the future of Britain. The number of Members present certainly does not reflect the importance of training to the nation.

Mr. Winterton: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way on a relevant point. It is nothing to do with windbaggery or whether many Members are present on the Opposition or even the Government Benches. Under the treaty of Rome, education and training were not within the remit of the Commission of the European Community. Under the Maastricht treaty, education and training become very much part of the remit of the Commission. One of the Commissioners has recently said that he wants to become involved in education and training policy. The Commission will use money to do that.

Does the hon. Gentleman, who is leading for the Opposition in this debate, believe that the European Commission is better able to direct funds for education and training in Britain than the Westminster Parliament through the Department of Education and the Department of Employment? If he does, where will the money come from unless we pay a much heavier account to the European Community and allocate much greater resources to it, depriving the United Kingdom Government of funds which they can currently spend, I hope, from a position of better knowledge than the EC?

Mr. Lloyd: The hon. Gentleman makes an important point. He is an opponent of long standing of most things that come out of Brussels, so at least he is consistent. However, his Government introduced the Single European Act and moved us towards the single market. Those of us who have had doubts about some areas of Europe's competence must also accept that there is no future for regions such as that which I represent if development of labour market activities does not take place in parallel with single market activities.

It is obvious to me that there is a paramount need for consistency in levels of training. I hope to demonstrate to the hon. Gentleman and to the House that the British Government, with their appalling record on training, stand in poor comparison with most of the rest of western Europe. To that extent, I would cheerfully exchange the levels of training which are provided in Britain for those, for example, in Germany or France. I look to the European Community to kick-start the British Government into doing things which they alone are unwilling to do. That is the answer to the nub of the question which the hon. Gentleman puts to me.

Mr. Winterton: I am grateful for the constructive response which the hon. Gentleman has made to the points that I put to him, but he referred to Germany. I am sure that he will admit that the system of education and training in Germany has nothing to do with the treaty of Rome or the European Community. Historically, Germany has had a different education and training system from ours. I like Germany's technical education, which has stood Germany in good stead, but surely that has nothing to do with the European Community. If we had wanted to copy Germany, we could have done so many years ago, long before the European Community came into being.

Mr. Lloyd: The relevance of Germany's educational philosophy to the European Community is probably about the same as that of the hon. Gentleman's remarks to the debate. I suspect that he makes them for a different purpose, but I shall treat his comments seriously, because, he raises a valid point.

In Germany, there is an education and training culture, something which I fear has slipped enormously in Britain in recent years. We must redevelop it. I do not have confidence in the Government to achieve that. It cannot be delayed. We are losing the training race almost daily. We must begin to make some efforts to reinvest in training. As I said, I look to the Commission to provide a kick-start in the process.

If hon. Members will forgive me, I shall make some progress in the substantive points that I wish to make in the relatively small amount of time that the Committee will make available this evening.

Mr. Winterton: Why? How do you know?

Mr. Cash: The hon. Gentleman knows something that we do not.

Mr. Marlow: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lloyd: No, if the hon. Gentleman will forgive me. I have given way several times.

Mr. Marlow: On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. As my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) said from a sedentary position, the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) seems to know something that we do not know. Do you know it? Is it that the debate will not take long tonight?

The First Deputy Chairman: I do not know anything about it and that is not a point of order for me.

Mr. Lloyd: If you do not know, Mr. Lofthouse, I can place it on the record that I am in even greater ignorance, although the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) may choose not to believe me.

By common consent, the Government have lost their way on training. There have been significant cuts in the numbers of trainees and the quantity of funding for Government-led schemes. Employment training is at the heart of the Government's training philosophy, but there has been a significant cut in the amount of finance, in constant terms, available to each trainee. For example, the real-terms value in 1992 constant pounds of the cost of an employment training course in 1989-90 was £6,504. By 1992-93, it had dropped to £6,074, which is a significant cut in real terms of about 10 per cent.

One of the real tragedies is that, while the Government have exhorted the private sector to train, they have listened with deaf ears because they have been beset with the problems caused by their very own recession. We know that the Department of Employment's Employment Gazette recently let the cat out of the bag with an analysis which showed that in Britain most people on employment and youth training schemes do not believe that they are receiving significant amounts of job-related training.

However, the amount of money made available by the private sector fell significantly, as did volumes of trainees. While it is true that things are a little better than they were in the early 1980s, the 3 million employees of working age in Britain who receive training are a far cry from the levels of training required for a labour force of about 20 million. We know that the Government and the private sector are failing the nation.

During the election, the Government made great play of the fact that the Opposition wanted to introduce a training levy, which would have kick-started the private sector into providing the sort of training that is needed. The Government said that that would be a burden on industry, would add to industrial costs and would wreck industry and shed jobs, but such an idea is viewed as ridiculous throughout the rest of Europe, where they prefer a virtuous cycle, in which high-quality training leads to high productivity and vice versa.

For example, in the year before last, more than 600,000 people used the vocational training places made available under Germany's dual system and 70 per cent. completed their courses. It is significant that 30 per cent. of the entrants were already educated to A-level standard.

The German concept of training, within the dual system, is seen to be important, as it establishes the training culture that allows such high productivity. German productivity is about 60 per cent. higher than in Britain, and wage levels are about 70 per cent. higher, and the two are interrelated. Britain has a low-wage, low-cost economy. Germany has a high-wage, high-productivity economy, which is in the interests of the German nation and its people.

The situation in France is different, but it is at least similar to that in Germany, in that, as long ago as the early 1970s, the French were struck by their lack of a training culture. I do not know whether I am allowed to mention Jacques Delors—the bête noir of many Conservative Members—who introduced a legal obligation for employers to participate in vocational training. When the scheme was introduced it required each employer to spend 0.9 per cent. of the wage bill on training. That figure has been increased to 1·2 per cent., but most employers spend considerably in excess of that amount, and some large companies spend up to 10 per cent. of the wages bill on training. In doing so, they are investing in the future of France and French industry.

Sir Richard Body (Holland with Boston): The hon. Gentleman has referred to Germany, and I do not doubt his figures, as I know them to be accurate, but does he agree that some European countries are not embarking on comparable training schemes, and that one of the dangers of the article is that money will go from northern Europe —and this country—to enable southern European countries to embark on ambitious vocational training schemes which will compare with our own? That will make those countries more competitive in the new industries that they are developing, which could cause great dangers to our economy, especially if the Community continues to have a low-growth economy.

Mr. Lloyd: The reality is that all Europe will be dragged down by the concept of a low-wage, low-skill economy, which periodically chooses to shed labour, as has happened throughout most of western Europe—in the Community countries and beyond—in recent years. There is no future for the Community as a low-wage economy, and the whole Community must accept that. Social tensions have already been caused by mass unemployment in France, Germany and Italy. Unemployment has caused problems in Britain—for example, in my constituency, where a young boy was shot and killed recently.

I cannot accept a scenario in Britain or in the Community in which we accept the concept of a potentially redundant army of labour, which can be brought in or dispensed with at will—a scenario in which pockets of long-term unemployment become virtually permanent, and in which no hope is given because the Government have provided Mickey Mouse training schemes. We must develop a wider approach. I look to the Community to develop a coherent training philosophy, so that it becomes a way of life throughout Europe.

The hon. Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body) asked whether I did not fear that we would end up having to prop up standards in Portugal. It may surprise him to learn that Portugal is already ahead of Britain in many aspects of training. Britain is third from bottom in the number of 16 to 18-year-olds who participate in education, and Portugal is one of the countries ahead of us. The days when Britain could look loftily down on the Mediterranean countries as despised nations are gone. The position has shifted during my lifetime, and perhaps a different generation has to account for that. The simple reality is that the Portuguese will not look to Britain for lessons on training.

The amount that various European countries spend on training is also significant. Germany is not the only country to spend more than Britain, as Ireland also does do. Ireland has long been regarded as an alternative labour market for the British economy. I come from a part of Britain where Irish people have lived for many years, and I know that they have been viewed as an alternative labour force in boom times, and that they have been expendable during recessions. It is especially significant that Ireland is spending more than Britain on domestic training, even though it has tremendous problems of labour emigration.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): Is the hon. Gentleman not aware that one makes low-skilled people more productive by investing more capital in equipment and machinery, rather than by trying to give them additional training? Throughout the Pacific rim, where our main competitors come from, wages and skill levels are relatively low, but those countries are rapidly improving.

[Mrs. Teresa Gorman]

That is being done within the work process, without complicated Government training schemes, and we should aim to do the same here—never mind about Europe.

That is the way in which skills are passed on—by building on the shoulders of the former generation. The plans envisaged in the Maastricht treaty simply will not work. We cannot separate ourselves from that other part of the world, which contains 90 per cent. of the population, while Europe only has one tenth.

Mr. Lloyd: If that is the hon. Lady's view of the world, I find it almost immeasurably sad. Not only is she technically wrong; the flaws in her argument are precisely the kind that lead to the introduction of stupid policies such as those that the country has experienced for the past 13 years.

The hon. Lady suggested that countries on the Pacific rim considered education and training unimportant. Countries such as Taiwan and Singapore—which in my lifetime have been seen as the low-wage, low-skill nations described by the hon. Lady—are now investing a fantastic amount of national effort in the education and training of their young people: they are doing far more than this country in that respect.

The idea that such countries accept peripheralisation is born of an era that is rapidly disappearing. Suppose we told the Japanese that they should return to the days when they competed on the basis of volume rather than quality! The hon. Lady also mentioned the Koreans; they too are spending a considerable amount on training. She may be surprised if she looks at the comparative figures.

The really sad aspect, however is this. The fact that the hon. Lady rests her case on bogus evidence suggests that she presses Ministers to provide bad training in this country. That is where the tragedy lies, and that is the reason for the anti-education, anti-training culture that has existed here for so many years. I believe that the Minister knows something about language training. In schools driven by the national curriculum—my children attend such schools—pupils are forced at the age of 13 to confine themselves to the study of a single foreign language, because of the needs of the curriculum. It is ridiculous, and atrocious, that they should be denied access to foreign languages. We are handicapping our young people: in France and Germany, for instance, that simply could not happen nowadays. The current state of affairs is almost uniformly barren; the Government's record bears no comparison with that of other western European countries.

As I told the Minister earlier, these are probing amendments, but we want him to respond in detail to our questions about why Britain's vocational training record is so bad. Under the treaty, vocational training and education will be governed by the terms of qualified majority voting; Britain—the anti-intellectual, anti-education, anti-training country that it has become—will no longer be able to hold to ransom not only the rest of Europe, but the British people themselves.

For those reasons, many people welcome this part of the treaty.

Sir Richard Body: I hope that the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) will not mind my saying that I, for one—and, I am sure, every other Conservative Member—found his speech disappointing. I do not mean that personally; no doubt the hon. Gentleman was entirely sincere. I had hoped, however, that he would probe this part of the treaty more fully and carefully, given the immense implications that it could have for millions of people in the United Kingdom.

The hon. Gentleman quoted a number of statistics. As I said earlier, I do not doubt those statistics, but the hon. Gentleman would surely agree that they came from the public sector. They excluded the many schemes in this country—and, indeed, in the countries listed by the hon. Gentleman—which are privately funded by business enterprises. Those of us with some experience of such schemes would say that, more often than not, they are more effective and do more to strengthen our economy than publicly funded schemes.

My hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) referred to the Pacific basin. In numerous countries in that area which are now booming, effective training in the private sector provides the main body of recruitment. Only a week or two ago, I met a number of business men in my constituency who said that they deplored Government-funded schemes and that if they could only have half as much money for training, they would ensure that it was more cost-effective and more in line with the needs of industry. I entirely agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay: we should support private-sector schemes rather than those funded by the Government.

This article will enable the Community to spend a great deal of money which is, in the main, obtained from the northern European countries—the principal contributors to European funds. We are well aware how some southern European countries—especially Spain—want the money to be spent. We know what Mr. Gonzales has been saying about cohesion funds; we know that he will be difficult, over and over again.

Mr. Marlow: Yet again, my hon. Friend has drawn the House's attention to the way in which all these bits and pieces combine to produce another slush fund, which the Commission will be able to use. All right—the Government are not heavily committed, but money will be available—and majority voting will be possible. The fund will not deal with the content of educational programmes, but to an extent it will enable the manipulation of such programmes in a European direction, which some may want and others may not. It will also constitute a slush fund to be used in what Europeans call the regions—Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland. We know what they want to do with the regions; they want to divide and rule. Will my hon. Friend deal with some of those fundamental issues?

Sir Richard Body: I will indeed. My hon. Friend, like me, represents a corner of England. I use the word "England" deliberately: those of us who represent English constituencies are aware that we do not get much out of the slush funds.

In an earlier debate, it was pointed out that cultural expenditure would be used for enticement purposes—to enhance the popularity of Wales, or other parts of the Community. There is plenty of evidence that a good deal has been spent in Wales—and whenever money is spent there, the famous flags with stars on a blue background is there to show that the money came from the European Community, although only a tiny fraction may have come from that source.

Mr. Cryer: Under article 126,

"Community action shall be aimed at . . . developing the European dimension in education".

That really means the European Community dimension. Taxpayers' money is being used to mount a propaganda drive to promote the claimed virtues of the Community. The adoption of the word "European", which belongs to a continent rather than to a political or economic organisation, illustrates the arrogance of the organisation which is promoting its ideas. This will be not education, but propaganda.

Sir Richard Body: That applies to all 12 countries—to western Europe as a whole, and it is the overriding argument against the Maastricht treaty: the treaty will make it much more difficult for the Scandinavian countries, the alpine countries, the countries of eastern Europe—and, in due course, those further east in the old Soviet Union—to be part of a European Community or Commonwealth. My dream is a European Community which allows all Europe to take part in common policies which are in the interests of individual countries.

Mr. Marlow: I apologise for intervening, but this is probably one of our more important debates on the treaty. The hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) and my hon. Friend spoke about the money that will be in the hands of the Commission and how it could be used.

Let me draw my hon. Friend's attention to a powerful revelation that we had today. The hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) is no fool. She is a very intelligent lady. She referred to things that have been done in her constituency with Community money. As we know, she is a fervent European. One of the reasons why she is in favour of Europe is that she perceives that these good things have dropped out of heaven from the European Community as if the European Community has a factory where it manufactures cash and with its generosity provides cash to her constituents. If we accept the article as it is at the moment, rather than take it out, there will be more money for more Eurocrats to spend in more constituencies so that more people can be seduced by the slush funds.

Sir Richard Body: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. We have almost forgotten green shield stamps. The money that goes back to Wales can be likened to green shield stamps. The people of Britain, including the people of Wales, contribute a great deal more than what is coming back. I am sorry that the hon. Lady, who is not in her place, has allowed herself to be deceived by payments out of what my hon. Friend calls the slush funds.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): Slush funds?

Sir Richard Body: I am delighted that my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) is with us. He has been travelling to Strasbourg and he knows nothing whatever about slush funds. He is always totally innocent of anything of that nature, as indeed are most of those involved in Europe. It is only a minority who dip their fingers into slush funds.

We are not criticising European Parliamentarians. My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) was speaking about the opportunities which would be created by a further slush fund. We have debated the cultural slush fund and now we are discussing further funds to be allocated by majority voting, as the Council of Ministers may prescribe on the recommendation of the Commission as the article specifies.

Mr. Harris: On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. I am very disturbed to find on the Bench here an envelope which says, "Can you keep going until 10 pm? If so, they surely cannot close." You were in the Chair last night when there were allegations of collusion. Surely there cannot be collusion between my hon. Friends. I cannot begin to think who might have written this diabolical note——

Mr. James Cran (Beverley): Let me see the handwriting.

Mr. Harris: I do not know about that. It seems to me that there are some guilty people. It cannot be right that hon. Members are being egged on to filibuster to keep the debate going until 10 o'clock at night. Can you give your ruling on that?

The First Deputy Chairman: It is not a matter for the Chair what notes are passed.

Mr. Marlow: Further to that point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. I think that someone suggested that the only possible provenance of that dreadful piece of paper could be someone from the Whips Office as all my hon. Friends who take a similar view——

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. I have just given a ruling that it is not a matter for the Chair what notes are passed. Sir Richard Body.

Sir Richard Body rose——

Mr. Bill Walker: I thank my hon. Friend for giving way. I understand that we are attempting to implement article 126 this evening, but we have just given Scottish universities a fund to look after when that used to be a United Kingdom responsibility. As we have guarded our separate education system in Scotland, is it not nonsense to be faced with a proposal such as article 126?

8.15 pm

Sir Richard Body: I am sure that my hon. Friend realises that Scotland will be homogenised by what we are discussing tonight. As a mere Englishman, I concede that Scottish education is of the highest standard—much higher than that in England. Whether it will continue to be so is another matter. I hope that my hon. Friend will have the opportunity to put in a word for Scottish education, to prevent it from being contaminated—if that is not too unkind a word—by anything which may emerge out of Brussels.

Mr. Roy Beggs (Antrim, East): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that we in Northern Ireland should pay particular attention to what is happening, as the more money that goes into the slush fund directly from the United Kingdom to southern Ireland threatens the development of our own education and training services in Northern Ireland?

Sir Richard Body: The hon. Gentleman may well be right that there are moves that he knows only too well, if I may coin an awful word, to desectorise Northern Ireland education and require pupils to go to the same schools, whatever their background. It may well be that the European Community will use what they call incentive money to give money to such schools. That may or may not be a good proposal, but it is surely for Great Britain and particularly for the people of Northern Ireland to decide whether they want their education policy to take that direction. It should not be a matter for Brussels and, above all, it should not be a matter for majority vote in the Council of Ministers.

[Sir Richard Body]

Mr. Marlow: The hon. Member for Antrim, East (Mr. Beggs) made a wise intervention, but there may be people in Scotland, Wales or Northern Ireland who believe that they would do better through the Council regions and through the slush fund money for education. However, the whole system is based on the fact that we make a net contribution to the Community budget of £2,500 million a year which by grace of this treaty will increase to £3,000 million a year. If that were not passed to Europe as part of the mega-slush fund, we would have more of our own money to spend in Northern Ireland, Wales, and Scotland on culture and education in all parts of our country, but because of the structure and status that we have at the moment it goes to Europe, it goes to Brussels and it gets the stamp of Mr. Delors: it gets a European flag and we all have to bless the great and the good in Brussels.

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. Some of the interventions are rather lengthy speeches. Sir Richard Body.

Sir Richard Body: It is much worse than my hon. Friend describes when it comes to vocational training. This where the hon. Member for Stretford is mistaken. We shall be required to put a large sum of money into Community funds to enable vocational training to take place. We can try to ensure that there is—I hate to use the tired old phrase—a level playing field throughout the Community and equal opportunities for such training. Although the hon. Member for Stretford disputed this, we know that vocational training is not so advanced in southern Europe as in northern Europe, so there is bound to be a diversion of funds from the north to the south, to Portugal, Spain, Italy and Greece.

Mr. Beggs: And southern Ireland.

Sir Richard Body: Indeed, although plenty of money is already going there—whether it can collar any more under the scheme, I do not know. At all events, there will be a massive transfer of funds to southern Europe from the taxpayers of northern Europe, to give the inhabitants of the south vocational schemes as good as those in the north.

Mr. Budgen: One of the most exciting and useful aspects of all this is the way in which the Community represents a gathering of friends and colleagues—of Heads of State. It is such a pleasant thing to see the friendship between politicians as they extract money from their taxpayers and hand it over to their friends, the other politicians, so that the latter may bribe their respective electorates. This is always described in each country as a great triumph for its national self-interest. It would be churlish if we did not recognise the process and express our admiration for it.

Sir Richard Body: My hon. Friend is right. We must admire it, but there comes a time when we should question it.

Mr. Budgen: If my hon. Friend starts questioning it, he will soon find himself in the kind of difficulties that I faced recently, when the Whips Office started ringing up my chairman and suggested that it was not the role of a Back Bencher to question anything that the Government were doing or to cause as much trouble as possible. I warn my hon. Friend against that line of action. We are, after all, here to rubber-stamp the Government's actions—and the most important thing that we can do is to express our admiration for everything that the Government have done.

I fear that my hon. Friend will come to regret his impertinence. He should bear in mind the authoritarian behaviour of the Whips, as shown by their moving the closure and preventing many of our hon. Friends from expressing their admiration for the Government. Most of us feel an extreme affection for my hon. Friend and hope that he will not jeopardise his career by being so stupid as to express criticism of the treaty or of the Government. To do that would be to undermine loyalty to the Government—a crime of which I am sure he would not want to be found guilty.

Sir Richard Body: I will try to take that advice. The only ambition I have ever had in this House was to work in the office of the Patronage Secretary. I am old-fashioned enough still to call the Chief Whip that. I imagined that I would learn a lot there. I see on the Front Bench the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Further and Higher Education, my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell), who was once in the Patronage Secretary's office and who had me to deal with among his flock. I am sure that he will confirm that I never questioned anything and sought always to do his bidding.

If the hon. Member for Stretford was truly expressing the policy of the Labour party and if, as a result, unemployment rises, he and the rest of his colleagues will have a great deal to answer for at the next election. We cannot be certain that the European Community will enjoy a high growth rate from now on. The smaller countries of Europe outside the European Community have more favourable growth rates at the moment. Germany is in difficulties with a declining growth rate. The German Government are under intense pressure over their revenue and monetary policies——

Mrs. Gorman: I should very much welcome my hon. Friend's wisdom and advice, as I know that he is a great repository of knowledge. Is it not true that in Germany young people are trained on the job? At 16 they take up training courses in firms—bakers, butchers or plumbers—where they are taught the skills by those who have them and who can pass them on without the need for any slush funds or Government intervention. Is it not also true that those young people, knowing the value of their training, do not expect to be paid as much as adults while being trained? They are paid the sort of money that the Labour party would describe as appropriate to sweated labour or pin money. In fact, the process is part of a tradition that my hon. Friend and I would like restored to this country so that we can avoid the sort of mega-schemes envisaged under Maastricht, which would remove the training function from the people who know what needs to be taught.

Sir Richard Body: Of course my hon. Friend must be right. As she was speaking, I remembered the old adage that those who can, do, and those who cannot, teach. I fear that some professional full-time vocational training teachers are those who have not done well in the occupation that they originally chose. That certainly applies to the building and engineering industries. Those who are good at those jobs go into firms and prosper; those who are not so good find themselves out of work and having to take up employment providing some form of vocational training.

Mr. Marlow: The beginning of this article speaks of the Community contributing to the development of quality education. If the Community is to contribute to the development of education, even though it does not have the right to change laws in this area by means of directives, it is implied that the Community will be involved in everything at an early stage—for instance, in the geography and history syllabuses. The involvement will be indirect, but it will be effected by means of incentives, slush funds, and so on. Is my hon. Friend worried about that?

The article also mentions quality. My hon. Friend is a far greater expert on the English language than I am. What is meant by quality?

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. I have recently drawn the attention of the House to the length of interventions. Experienced hon. Members should not need to keep being reminded by the Chair about this. They are making speeches, not interventions, and I shall use my office to enable the debate to take place within the rules of the House. I will not allow the near-abuse of our procedures.

Sir Richard Body: I will, if I may, follow up what my hon. Friend said about quality education. I am troubled by that term. My mind goes back to the time many years ago when I began breeding pigs and contacted various butchers. I remember one outlet kept talking about quality meat. I realised that the person involved was not really looking for quality meat, but for meat that was cheap and nasty. I have no doubt that the education of which we are speaking will not be cheap, even though it may be nasty.

8.30 pm

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: My hon. Friend is talking about quality meat. As we are talking about education, will he confirm that the word "quality" is a noun and not an adjective, so there cannot be anything called quality education? It is difficult to see how one can have a common view of what Germany did to Poland, Germany did to France, or Russia did to Poland as a common quality educational instruction.

Sir Richard Body: As ever, my hon. and learned Friend is right. It is disturbing to find the word "quality" in any treaty and I suspect that this is its first appearance. To apply it to education is inappropriate and I would not rely on any Commissioners or group of officials in Brussels to decide quality in our terms.

Mr. Budgen: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's reflections on a difficult adjective.

Mr. Marlow: My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn) said that it was a noun.

Mr. Budgen: I apologise—of course it is a noun. If I were subject to overall supervisory care by some European gauleiter, I should probably have a more normal way of speaking, though it might be less interesting.

I am pleased to see that the Chairman has returned, as I wish to support the First Deputy Chairman in his observations to my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) to the effect that a large number of Conservative Members wished to take part in the debate. My hon. Friend——

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. The hon. Member has been on his feet since I entered the Chamber, which means that he has made an excessively long intervention. He is clearly preventing other hon. Members from making their speeches.

Mr. Budgen: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I was merely endeavouring to put a point to my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body). So far as I could see, you had only just come into the Chamber, and I respectfully suggest that I detected——

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Budgen: —a degree of prejudice.

The Chairman: Order. I note that the hon. Member was called earlier. I produced the list earlier in the day and put him on it, so I do not know what sort of prejudice he thinks may exist. I remind him and all hon. Members that interventions should be short. I came through the doors into the Chamber well over a minute ago, and the hon. Member was already in full flight. I suspect that he has been a member of other Committees. He should know that interventions must be short and to the point.

Sir Richard Body: I shall endeavour to keep my remarks short, but I remind the Committee that I have been endeavouring to speak for some time and that this is the first time that I have spoken in this Parliament. One endeavours to get in and it sometimes happens that, having got in, one feels disinclined to sit down again.

Mrs. Gorman: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I seek clarification. Are you aware that in a debate in which, say, only one or two Conservative Members are called, it is imperative that we try to make our points through rather more lengthy interventions than we would otherwise make, as otherwise we would never speak at all?

The Chairman: The hon. Lady might argue that an intervention is as long as it is short. I must obey the rules of the House. I do not create them. They have been created by the House over the centuries. "Erskine May" says that an intervention should be short and to a single point, so that the hon. Member who is intervened upon can respond. I have been listening to all the interventions for the last hour. Few of them have been short or to the point.

Mr. Bill Walker: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I seek your guidance. Would you give an indication of the meaning of "short"?

The Chairman: It is my judgment.

Sir Richard Body: I appreciate that interventions must be short, and clearly, a short intervention makes it easier for the person intervened upon to deal with the intervention. But I remind you, Mr. Morris, that there have been a number of closure motions.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Member is an experienced parliamentarian. I learned and listened at his feet in these cloisters. He knows that the subject of closure motions is not part of the amendments before the Committee. Will he please return to the subject under discussion?

Sir Richard Body: Indeed, and I return to what the hon. Member for Stretford said about vocational schemes.

Mr. Marlow: I promise that this will be a short intervention. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn) pointed out that "quality" was a noun and not an adjective. The text of the article refers to "quality education." There is no such thing as quality in that it is good or bad or high or low quality. What are we supposed to deduce from an article in a treaty which is ungrammatical and undefined? How are we to evaluate the treaty in those circumstances?

Sir Richard Body: That is an important point and I hope that when the Minister replies—which I hope will not be immediately I resume my seat, although I fear, on past performance, that that may be the case—he will deal with it. Presumably at Maastricht the word was considered carefully by whoever was then representing Her Majesty's Government. That person no doubt queried the necessity for using the word "quality" and was satisfied, after receiving certain assurances, that it had a particular meaning and purpose.

If education is not about quality, it should not be education at all, so the word is surplus. Even so, having been inserted in that way, it raises a degree of suspicion. We must be told why it has been inserted in the provision.

The hon. Member for Stretford denigrated the Government's record in matters of vocational training. His speech almost mirrored that of the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd), who equally denigrated the Government's record.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: I am sure that my hon. Friend is aware of what he is saying. I think he meant to say "qualitated" rather than "denigrated."

Sir Richard Body: I used the word "denigrated" and I suppose that if one really probed the meaning of it, it might have some racial undertone. I did not mean it in that way. I hope I am not being unfair in saying that the hon. Gentleman denigrated the Government's record. He was sharply critical of the Government's programme of vocational training. He alleged that Britain was spending much less than Germany and other countries on it and he called for more to be spent. No doubt the Minister will supply some figures.

I do not think that the figures supplied by the Opposition spokesman included money spent in this country by the private sector. That money has been increasing and should be included. It may be almost impossible to quantify because much training is undertaken by small firms, but it should be possible to provide a guestimate. If that were put into the equation, it would be seen that total spending on vocational training in this country compares well with the amount spent by our Community competitors.

Mr. Marlow: My hon. Friend speaks about the potential threat to the private sector of what is almost a Community incentive policy for education. I hope to raise that in my speech. Paragraph 2 of article 126 refers to "developing the European dimension in education,". Does that mean that there will be a European dimension to history and geography? What impact would there be on the understanding of British history and British geography if the Commissioners got to work through the slush fund?

Sir Richard Body: My hon. Friend raises two issues, the first of which is the threat to existing vocational training schemes. If the Community embarks on major schemes for such training which are more or less uniform throughout the Community, there will be two results. First, the Government will be less than enthusiastic about spending money on vocational training because they will be able to obtain funds from the Community. I know how the Treasury operates, and I know that the Chief Secretary or one of his assistants will reduce his vocational training estimate for the Department of Employment. In that respect the availability of Community money will be a disadvantage. The other threat is much more real. More money from the Community will lead to firms in this country deciding not to spend money on schemes they prefer when, with a bit of a push, they can get money from the Community.

Mr. Cryer: Firms proposing to do that should be warned that Common Market funds can be arbitrarily cut. When I was the EC member for Sheffield, a firm called Tyzack employed some apprentices who were partly supported by money from the EC social fund. The EC Commissioner demanded that they should be given computer training different from the computer training that they were receiving. Since such training could not be provided, the money was stopped. The reason for the dodge was that Italy had complained to the Italian Commissioner that the United Kingdom had been receiving too much money and that the distribution was unfair. That is precisely what happened in the case of a perfectly good training scheme. However, the apprentices were kept on and continued to train because Sheffield council paid Tyzack to keep them employed.

Sir Richard Body: I hope that the Minister has noted that and will deal with it, because it is the sort of thing that might happen if the power moves from here to Brussels. At least at the moment we can seek funds. We may not always be successful in dealing with European matters and the machinations of the Patronage Secretary's office, but at least we can raise issues in Adjourning debates. I suspect that, when the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) was in the European Parliament, he had fewer opportunities to articulate his case than he has here. The hon. Gentleman's reference to Sheffield brings to mind another training scheme.

I am interested in promoting schemes for certain kinds of farming. One of our universities has a great reputation in agriculture, but it was unable to get money for a particular kind of farming in this country. A deputation went to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food for funding but was unable to get it. However, Sheffield polytechnic approached Brussels and I understand that it was successful in obtaining money.

The Chairman: Order. Is the hon. Gentleman speaking about vocational training?

Sir Richard Body: Yes. Farming is indeed a vocation. It is a most unprofitable occupation, as my hon. Friends will confirm.

8.45 pm

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman will have to do a little better than that. Everything is a vocation. Was the specific grant for vocational training? If it was not, perhaps the hon. Gentleman could use a different example.

Sir Richard Body: I think that I am on a good point, and it came to mind when the hon. Member for Bradford, South intervened. With due respect to Sheffield polytechnic, it had no expertise in this area and sought advice from me about where to obtain it, but it did that after obtaining an assurance from Brussels about money. Before allocating money for something of this kind, one would have thought that Brussels would seek out——

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman speaks about "something of this kind", but that is not vocational training. I am here to serve the Committee. The amendments are fairly tightly drawn and we are debating vocational training. In his heart, the hon. Gentleman knows whether the advice that he offered related to vocational training. If it did, his remarks are in order: if it did not, he should not continue that line of argument.

Sir Richard Body: I shall move on, but I should have thought that training in a particular form of farming was vocational.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: I should like to ask my hon. Friend about the mention in the treaty of what is called the "European dimension in education". What will be the European dimension in education of the Franco-Prussian war, the invasion of France by Germany, Poland's experience over 400 years, the concentration camps and the second world war?

The Chairman: Order.

Sir Richard Body: My hon. and learned Friend poses a fundamental question. I should prefer the whole issue to be left to the Council of Europe, but I shall not digress. If Monnet could hear our debate, he would be intrigued. Directly in reply to what my hon. Friend has said, in 1988 at a gathering to commemorate the work of Mr. Monnet as founder of the Community—I suppose that we would not be having this debate were it not for Monnet—Mr. Régis Debray, the former French prime minister, said that shortly before Mr. Monnet died he said that, had he been starting again, he would have sought to found the Community not on economics but on culture and education.

I think that that probably answers the question posed by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir Nicholas Fairbairn) because Mr. Monnet was all for—I do not want to use this ugly word—homogenising. He believed, in all good faith and with total sincerity, that the conflicts of Europe would never come to an end unless we were tending to think alike and to share the same values and therefore to share the same culture and to be educated in much the same way.

Mr. Monnet would have been appalled at the kind of history lessons that I and perhaps my hon. and learned Friend had when we heard about Waterloo, Trafalgar and matters of that kind. He would have preferred education to be European education, written objectively and treated impartially in the classroom. That meeting to commemorate the work of Monnet was very significant. Monnet might well have been right to give that opinion in those last few weeks of his life if he was seeking to create a superstate out of western Europe.

Of course we are going to have a European dimension for history, literature, and perhaps geography and other subjects, if we allow this part of the treaty to proceed and to be part of a common education policy. I dare say that my hon. Friend the Minister, when he replies, will say that there is no such intention because there is to be subsidiarity. I can almost see him making that speech now. My hon. Friend will realise already that this article uses the term "majority voting".

Mr. Iain Duncan-Smith (Chingford): In article 126, in subparagraph 4, invoking 189b, and in article 127, under subparagraph 4, invoking 189c, both give the Commission a strong position to bring forward to the Council a rule on quantitative majority voting. Would my hon. Friend like to comment on the importance of that in relation to these matters?

Sir Richard Body: I should have thought that anyone concerned about educational standards would be concerned about that—including, of course, the Minister when he replies. We have been arguing for the last few years about a national curriculum and about standards, and arousing the ire of many schoolteachers on the subject. There is a hornets' nest in certain schools. Yet having gone through all that, we are putting our head into a noose and making our Minister, when he goes to the Council of Ministers, very vulnerable.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: Is one to understand that the European dimension will be to say that the first and second world wars and the battle of Waterloo were draws? May I ask my hon. Friend to interpret the treaty which speaks of the increasing dimension of distance education? I have not had much education and I am very close to my hon. Friend in all ways, but I do not understand why a noun is again being used instead of an adjective in an educational paragraph. What is distance education? Does it mean that the teacher is so scared of his pupils that he lives in the Isle of Wight and has to shout?

The Chairman: Order. The hon. and learned Gentleman is perfectly in order in asking what is distance education, but he must allow the hon. Gentleman who has the Floor to respond.

Sir Richard Body: My hon. and learned Friend should not be surprised by the drafting of this. Has it not been drafted by one of his fellow poets? Hardly a phrase, certainly not a whole sentence, nor any part of the treaty, can be described as being in decent literary English.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Further and Higher Education(Mr. Tim Boswell): Perhaps I can assist the House by saying that my understanding of distance education and distance learning, allowing for the point made by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn) and his aversion to the use of nouns as adjectives, is that it is learning or education done at a distance, rather than being conveyed on a personal basis across the classroom. It is teaching which may be delivered, or learning received, by means of a number of modern techniques, audio-visual cassettes, written material sent through the post, which is particularly characterised in this country by the Open university and done very well.

Sir Richard Body: I always keep my distance from anyone who is teaching, for very good reasons. I am grateful to my hon. Friend and I had assumed that that was the meaning of this. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross has touched on an important point about this European dimension. I can see, as the whole House can surely see now, that we shall have large parts of our history books and syllabuses reconsidered with incentive money. That is the term used. It was hinted at in particular by the Commissioner for education when he went to Madrid. I think that it was last November when he talked about how important it was to have a common system of education for Europe and said that the Maastricht treaty would enable that to come about, so I am sure that the fear expressed by my hon. and learned Friend is right.

Mr. Marlow: I have many weaknesses and one of them is that I am a great patriot and populist and I am keen on England and English history. There are great victories in English history like Crecy, Agincourt, Poitiers which we talked about at school. If one looks at a French map one will not find those battlefields. Is it likely that under the provisions of this article future generations of our children, when they look at history maps in English history lessons, or European history lessons as they will be, will not find Crecy, Agincourt and Poitiers? They will not be on the map or be talked about. They will not be anything. There may be other aspects of English history where the same things may happen.

Sir Richard Body: No doubt that will be the case. Many people, including some hon. Members, look forward to the day when our schools no longer teach such subjects and when our history is "more objective", as they say. Many in the teaching profession look forward to that day.

Mr. Cryer: Does not this exchange show the sloppy drafting of the treaty? The European dimension can mean little or it can mean a lot. Unlike the drafting of Government legislation and delegated legislation, there is no area that defines the words that are used—hence the term European, which I assume refers to the Community but could equally apply to the whole of Europe. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that that is dangerous language to accept in a binding treaty, because once it has been established it is as long as a piece of string to anybody who wants to interpret it?

Sir Richard Body: The hon. Gentleman is right to use the word "dangerous". I use the word "arrogant". It is appalling arrogance to attribute to 12 countries the description "Europe", but that appears over and again in the Maastricht treaty. One or two of my hon. Friends are enthusiastic about the treaty, although I am delighted to see my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman) beside me, who is pretty pragmatically enthusiastic about it all.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Intelligently.

Sir Richard Body: Intelligently, yes.

9 pm

Mr. Bill Walker: My hon. Friend will be aware that it is customary in Scotland to teach Scottish history up to 1707 and United Kingdom history thereafter. The content of history books depends much on whether battles were won or lost.

Sir Richard Body: Indeed. We in England should learn our English, United Kingdom and European history. I was taught European history half a century ago by somebody who inspired me to take an interest in the subject, and that interest has never left me. I get rather fed up with being denounced as anti-European, because I enjoy reading about Europe and European history and have been interested in the subject for a long time.

That is one of the reasons why I am so hostile to the idea of the European Community. European history shows over and again that such ventures always end in tears. There has been no exception to that.

Mr. James Molyneaux (Lagan Valley): Will the hon. Gentleman concede that the reference to European is not confined only to article 126 but appears on the face of the Command Paper? We are debating the treaty on European union. Is that the rich man's club of 12 or does it take in Czechoslovakia, Poland, Romania and even Russia?

Sir Richard Body: Indeed. The right hon. Gentleman —my right hon. Friend, if I may so describe him—is right and I endorse his comments wholeheartedly. The European dimension will exclude matters of geography, history or anything to do with, for example, Bohemia, which was mentioned earlier, or Russia. Russia is part of Europe. I believe that Tschaikovsky was European. Chekhov's plays and Tolstoy's novels are European. The treaty provides for education in an European dimension, but I wonder whether literature will include Tolstoy or only those authors who came from one part of Europe —that covered by the EC.

Mr. Cryer: And given EC subsidies.

Sir Richard Body: Indeed.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: We are discussing the nonsense of describing the EC as Europe as if the rest of Europe did not exist. What shall we call this ridiculous Community when Turkey is included, 98 per cent. of which is in Asia?

Sir Richard Body: Turkey has long had an application to join the European Community, and some years ago I went to Ankara and heard their enthusiasm to join. I pointed out one or two difficulties that they might encounter, but I have since discovered that Turkey is very unlikely to be admitted, and for one very good reason of which my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn) will be aware, that Germany is almost certain to veto it because—I must not speak too harshly of the Germans—they are reluctant to have any more Turks coming into their country, and perhaps they may be right to be reluctant, given the troubles in eastern Germany.

Mr. Marlow: My hon. Friend touched on the issue of distance education, but I do not think that he gave it as much attention as it perhaps merits. In one of our earlier debates here, one of our hon. Friends talked about satellite broadcasts of a programme called "Red Hot Danish Love". I understand that, to a certain extent, it was educational——

The Chairman: Order. That does not come under this article.

Sir Richard Body: I am disappointed, Mr. Morris. I thought that we might hear more about this "Red Hot Danish . . . "—I forget the last word. I implore my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster to close her ears. Perhaps we should not go along that road. I think I ought to get back——

The Chairman: Order. I have some difficulty in working out where the hon. Gentleman is going. Will he address either of the two particular articles that we have before us, neither of which has anything to do with enlargement or any of the other areas that he has drifted into?

Sir Richard Body: I am very anxious to get back to the amendment that has been moved by the hon. Member for Stretford, because his speech was riddled with fallacies. In particular, he and his party should reconsider their attitude of support for Community-funded vocational training.

It is common knowledge that Mr. Gonzalez, the Prime Minister of Spain, has insisted on large sums by way of cohesion money. He threatened to veto the Maastricht treaty unless the money was advanced to Spain. This heading will, in my view, enable large sums of money to go to Spain, and it will be necessary—because Spain, and Portugal, I will allege, despite what the hon. Gentleman said, Italy and Greece, are all far behind us when it comes to vocational training. This article will enable money to be diverted from our resources to southern Europe. It is inevitable because, if we are to have fair competition throughout western Europe in the single market, we must have systems of vocational training that are more or less in line, and at present they are not. No one can say that they are in line at the moment.

Mr. Marlow: My hon. Friend is talking about vocational training, but he knows that among the amendments we are also discussing education, and he will be aware that, when article 126 says that "Community action shall be aimed at . . . developing exchanges of information and experience on issues common to the education system of the Member States", it means people visiting each other, going backwards and forwards; money; Europe; slush fund. It could be very seductive, and it could be abused.

I would be very interested to hear my hon. Friend's views as to whether this is an appropriate use of European taxpayers' money, how it could and should be used and what constraints and controls he would put on it.

Sir Richard Body: I am sure that it will be abused. Indeed, the Court of Auditors has made it plain year after year that national Governments were ineffective in policing how Community money is spent in their own countries. I shall not mention the common agricultural policy because I should be ruled out of order but £5,000 million has gone astray. Our Government have been criticised by the Court of Auditors, although I am sure they behave much better than some other Governments in spending that money. There is no encouragement for Governments to ensure that Community money is properly, effectively and honestly spent.

Mr. Bill Walker: Article 126 states that Community action shall be aimed at "encouraging the development of youth exchanges".

Few of us would disagree with that, but what is meant by "exchanges of socio-educational instructors"? Would my hon. Friend care to comment?

Sir Richard Body: That merely confirms what I said earlier—a poet such as my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) could not have drafted a single sentence of the treaty.

Socio-economic policies——

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: The words are "socio-educational".

Sir Richard Body: I am delighted that my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster has spotted that. As ever, she is taking an acute interest in the subject and perhaps she will contribute to the debate later if she is lucky enough to catch your eye, Mr. Morris.

I was trying to give a warning, although it is perhaps not for me to do so.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: You have not said what they are——

Sir Richard Body: I was diverted. Mr. Morris, you will——

The Chairman: Order. The Chair is having great difficulty hearing the hon. Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body), who appears to be having a conversation with the hon. Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman). Will he please deal with one of the two articles so that I can follow exactly what he is saying?

Sir Richard Body: Indeed I shall, but my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster is always tempting me. I shall seek to avoid her blandishments and raise my voice to speak directly to you, Mr. Morris, as I know I should. I hope that my hon. Friend will forgive me if I step back a little from her.

Mrs. Gorman: Before my hon. Friend leaves the issue of training and the use of slush funds, I should be interested to hear his comments on the attitude revealed in article 57 and amendment No. 199. The article is sinister because it refers to the laying down of "directives for the co-ordination . . . by law, regulation or administrative action in Member States" in relation to the activities of self-employed persons. It is sinister because the essence of many forms of self-employment is that people can drift into them, especially when they have lost other work. If there are to be directives, laws and regulations——

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Lady's point is relevant. She has asked a question and perhaps she will now allow the hon. Member for Holland with Boston to answer.

Sir Richard Body: I agree wholeheartedly with the point of my hon. Friend's intervention. I was self-employed before I came to the House—many of us were. A self-employed person should be sufficiently endowed to be able to decide for himself or herself what type of vocational training is suitable. It is amazing that the European Community or those who drafted the treaty should go so far as to suggest that the self-employed should take part in such schemes—it should be entirely a matter for them.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Does my hon. Friend accept that article 57 does not offer opportunities for everyone? The second sentence of paragraph 2 of article 57 refers to "training and conditions of access for natural persons." My hon. Friend seems to have studied this matter carefully. As we know from last night, however, the Minister does not answer questions but simply reads prepared speeches. That is unfortunate, but perhaps my hon. Friend can help me. Bearing in mind the reference to "natural persons", can he tell me what unnatural persons are? Or perhaps some Opposition Member can enlighten us.

This is a very serious point. The Bill with which we are dealing is to become the law of the land. Training and access are to be provided for natural persons but not, apparently, for unnatural persons. What on earth is a natural person? May we have an assurance——

The Chairman: The hon. Gentleman must not keep asking the same question. He has asked what a natural person is. Perhaps he will allow his hon. Friend to respond.

9.15 pm

Sir Richard Body: My hon. Friend is, of course, right. This just goes to show how difficult it is to translate these documents into some kind of English. At one time I did a little lecturing in company law. We used to talk about "persons". A person can be a corporate entity. For example, I believe that, in law, ICI is a person.

Sir Teddy Taylor: But a natural person?

Sir Richard Body: My hon. Friend and I are natural persons. I shall not point to anyone who might be described as anything other than a natural person; indeed, all of us here are natural persons. In law, ICI, Unilever, Shell and all other such organisations are persons, but not natural persons.

Sir Teddy Taylor: I have great respect for my hon. Friend, who is one of the wisest people in the House, but I have to point out that he is stating what he thinks the position to be. Is there a definition anywhere? Constituents of mine will probably have to obey these laws. When it comes to training and access, I shall have to ask, "Are you a natural person?" My hon. Friend says that he thinks that he and I are natural persons. Where is the definition? This is not fun; it is a serious matter. All those who say that this Bill should be rushed through should realise that what it contains would become the law of the land. I demand that before we leave this matter we be told, by my hon. Friend or by somebody else, what the blazes a natural person is.

Sir Richard Body: My hon. Friend should not be quite so naive as to believe that the people who drafted this treaty, as well as those who will put it into effect, have very much interest in the people of Southend. The treaty contains many examples of the way in which it will be very difficult for ordinary people, particularly those who are self-employed, to understand the laws that govern their lives, disobedience of which may result in punishment.

Mr. Cash: Perhaps tucked away in this convoluted treaty is a reference to a Euro-person. In the light of previous debates, I believe that we are moving rapidly to the notion of a European culture in which a person will be seen as natural in the European context. This is very disturbing. Does my hon. Friend know of a recent conference in Madrid that was partially funded by the European Commission? We are told that at that conference a certain Dr. Lenarduzzi of the Commission said that the Commission had been seeking to influence education——

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows his way round the treaty better than most hon. Members. I am finding it difficult to relate his remarks to article 126 or 127. Or can it be that, as the hon. Gentleman has just appeared in the Chamber, he has lost track of where we are?

Mr. Cash: I had just reached the point about education policy and training. Dr. Lenarduzzi said that for a very long time the Commission had sought to influence education policy, especially through selective financial support. He admitted that under the treaty of Rome there was no remit to do this, and that therefore these provisions were being used to legitimise something that was known to be not within the vires of the existing treaty.

Sir Richard Body: I did touch upon what that gentleman said, because he is a Commissioner and he was speaking about the powers of the Commission as at present and how he sought to extend them. Reading the extracts from the speech that I have seen, he seemed to revel in the prospect of the enhanced powers that he would have as a Commissioner in deciding matters of education and vocational training.

This illustrates again, and very vividly, that as Commissioner he will be in charge, and he sees more power going to him. [Interruption.] My hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster, as we all know, is an intelligent European and has credentials in this field. But she feels some dismay that this Commissioner was boasting—I do not think that that is an unfair word—that he would have so much more power.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: There was a reference to ultra vires persons; I was saying that these are intra vires persons, since legal language is being used.

Sir Richard Body: My hon. Friend shares with me the distinction, although I am not sure that it is a distinction, of having both been a barrister and a farmer. I know that she is well aware of the law on this subject. The Commissioner in question was hinting that he, as Commissioner for education, was exceeding his powers and therefore acting ultra vires, to use my hon. Friend's expression, when in future they will be intra vires and he will have the power to do things that he cannot do at the moment.

That is why some of us feel very concerned about this article, and indeed other articles, and why we believe that the people of this country should be alerted to how powers are moving away from here to Brussels, to be exercised by someone who boasts as does the Commissioner whose name I fear that I cannot pronounce.

Mr. Bill Walker: I am sorry to trouble my hon. Friend again, but does he really think that the socio-educational instructor is a natural person? He can be a schoolteacher or a youth leader, but, whoever he is, do we really need a treaty in law to define what he is? If we intend to encourage the movement of people, can we not do so on a basis that makes good sense, and in good English?

Sir Richard Body: Indeed, my hon. Friend is right, and I endorse those views entirely. To some extent there may be a need for international co-operation in matters of education and, if there is, I would think that the Council of Europe was well equipped to do what is necessary. Indeed, it would be able to speak for virtually all Europe, other than parts of what was the Soviet Union. As I understand it—you will correct me if I am wrong, Mr. Morris, as a former member of the Council of Europe—it already has a cultural and educational dimension.

Mr. Beggs: The hon. Gentleman will be aware of the excellent educational arrangements that we have in Northern Ireland. We respect the rights of those who wish to send their children to church schools, we have an excellent state system, grammar and secondary schools, and we have an integrated system. If this treaty is to proceed headlong, is there a risk that there will not be recognition of the rights of those who wish to make choices in Northern Ireland? In one section of article 126 we see that Community action shall be aimed at "promoting co-operation between educational establishments".

But then, further down, it also says that the Council,

"acting by a qualified majority on a proposal from the Commission, shall adopt recommendations."

Is it conceivable that it might ultimately be said that in Northern Ireland there should be only integrated education? Will we be directed ultimately from Brussels as to what is best for our young people?

Sir Richard Body: That is how I understand it. I wonder what my hon. Friend the Secretary of State will say in response. The matter is one of many to which we should have a response. Northern Ireland has high standards. It is the part of the United Kingdom which has more university places per head of population.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Because of the grammar schools.

Sir Richard Body: I am not sure about that. Lincolnshire has kept grammar schools, but it does not yet have a university. We hope to have one. I must not digress to talk about a university in Lincolnshire except to say that we hope to have one by the turn of the century, subject to what the Minister of State says about it. I do not think that there is a causal relationship.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: I was not suggesting a causal relationship between grammar schools and a local university. I was suggesting a causal relationship between the excellence which a grammar school education gives and the capacity of its students to get to university. It does not need to be in Lincoln; it could be in Lancaster, where we have an exceptionally good grammar school.

The Chairman: Clearly, it is not in Brussels and is not relevant to the article, interesting though it is.

Sir Richard Body: I am sorely tempted to describe my visit to Lancaster university, but I will not. There should be concern in Northern Ireland about the Commissioners having the power to propose education schemes, as, indeed, in Scotland where there is and has been for generations a much higher standard than has prevailed in most of England.

Under the article, it is plain that the Commissioners will have the power to propose education schemes to include Northern Ireland. Such schemes would be to the detriment of Northern Ireland at present. At the Council of Ministers, if we have United Kingdom representatives who wish to object to that, I hope that they will.

The hon. Member for Antrim, East (Mr. Beggs) may agree that representatives from the United Kingdom who are attending the Council of Ministers may not always have the interests of the United Kingdom uppermost in their minds. One can be sure that the interests of Northern Ireland might have to be lowered in preference to the interests of some other parts of the United Kingdom or the United Kingdom as a whole. Certainly, we should be concerned that the Commissioners may propose education schemes which could include Northern Ireland. I hope that my hon. Friend the Secretary of State will deal with that point categorically.

Under this article, the Commission will have the power to allocate money or propose the allocation of money by way of incentives to a national Government to adopt schemes which the Commissioners have introduced. That is a dangerous practice. The danger is heightened by the fact that a majority will vote on the issue. When it comes to majority voting, my hon. Friend will agree that Northern Ireland will not have a good chance. As someone with Ulster blood in his veins, I regret that.

The hon. Member for Stretford was making a grave mistake on behalf of his party. I hope that the Back Benchers behind him will see the danger in his argument that vocational training schemes should be devised in Brussels. If vocational training schemes are devised in Brussels, we can be sure that the amount of money available will be limited.

If the amount of money available is to be parcelled up equally, those who represent Spain, Portugal, Italy and Greece will insist on more money than the northern European countries. They will say, "It is not fair. We are behind northern Europe in vocational training so we cannot compete fairly in the single market." One can hear the Spaniards saying, "We already have 10 per cent. out of work. We shall have even more if we have to face competition from northern Europe. We must have vocational training as good as that which pertains in northern Europe."

9.30 pm

Mr. Molyneaux: I apologise for intervening a second time in the hon. Gentleman's admirable speech. Does he agree that it will be a question not of bringing southern European countries up to our standards but of levelling us down to a common lower standard?

Sir Richard Body: My right hon. Friend has almost plucked the words from my mouth. I was going on to say that. The amount of money will be limited. We cannot assume that large sums of money will be available for vocational training. The budget will be limited.

If the European Commission says, to use that tired phrase, that there must be a level playing field and that vocational training schemes must be more or less the same throughout the Community, we can be sure that standards in southern Europe and southern Ireland will have to be raised. If the budget is limited, less money will be available for comparable schemes in northern Europe. Therefore, we shall be placed at a disadvantage. That is crucial if we are to seek, as we should, to get rid of the wretched horror of mass unemployment. I see nothing but dangers ahead.

In the main wages are lower in southern Europe. People can afford to accept lower wages because heating, clothing and other costs tend to be lower than in northern Europe.

Mrs. Gorman: Will my hon. Friend give us his views on the fact that, under articles 126 and 127—those which are covered by the amendments that we are discussing tonight—the Commission's proposals will be subject to qualified majority voting? Therefore, the standards which apply in other parts of Europe, which may well be much lower than the fine quality education standards that we have described in our own territories—Scotland, Ireland and many parts of Wales and England—may supersede our standards. The decision will be taken by majority voting. We shall be only one twelfth of the voting body.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman has already given us his views on majority voting, so I am sure that he will not be tempted down that route.

Sir Richard Body: I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to deal with the point in his reply. It is important. With all due respect, my experience has been—I hope that he will not contradict me; I shall be sorry if he does—that Ministers do not always reply to some of the points that are made in the debate. I hope that they will deal with the matter. After all, majority voting is a serious matter. It means that, if one country or perhaps two or three countries stand out with interests different from those of others, their interests would be overridden. I can see precisely that happening on vocational training.

Anyone who has attended a meeting of the Council of Ministers in recent years will confirm that the Spanish Minister in particular is for ever being extremely difficult about any concessions that might be in our interest but which might conflict with those of southern Europe. He needs only to obtain the support of France and possibly another country to win the day and override our interests.

Mr. Marlow: As my hon. Friend has studied the matter carefully, I expect that he will have read the article in Education on 18 September by Mr. Ken Hopkins, a former chief education officer in Mid Glamorgan, in which he mentions a previously not well-recognised concession made by our Prime Minister saying:

"Mr. Major's apparently minor concession at Maastricht thus has significant implications for the education service in the UK. The previous heavy vocational emphasis to the Commission's programmes will be lifted."

Whereas the only impact that the bureaucrats had on our education system in the United Kingdon was through vocational training, it now extends throughout the whole realm of education.

Sir Richard Body: Yes, I have had the advantage of seeing that article.

The Chairman: Order. This is not the appropriate time for the hon. Gentleman to read the article. He should have come prepared.

Sir Richard Body: I am not seeking to read it: I would not do so. That article was not written casually. It is in the journal for education and was written by someone with considerable experience of education and education policy. The article expresses grave concern about article 57 because the author believes that our educational system is satisfactory. Although that may not altogether please Opposition Members, I hope that at least on the Conservative side of the House that view will be supported.

He queries whether we can maintain that standard and whether we would have to change. In the article he says that if we are to change our education system we should decide to make the change. We should not surrender our interests and allow our education standards to be determined through qualified voting procedures by people whose interests might not be the same as ours. That is a powerful argument and I commend it to every hon. Member.

Mr. Cran: What a wonderful speech my hon. Friend has made, which is why I have not intervened so far. Could he turn his mind to article 126, which seeks the academic recognition of diplomas and periods of study throughout Europe? Would he like to comment on the fact that many academics and graduates at my local university in Hull are extremely worried about that? They take the view that the academic standards achieved in British universities—especially at the university of Hull—are higher than those achieved at some universities in other parts of Europe. Does he agree that that concern is real and if so, why is it not recognised by the Government?

Sir Richard Body: Hull university has a distinguished professor of government. I sit on an editorial board beside him and can vouch for the good advice that he always gives. He is well known to many Members of the House, has written several books about the House and dearly loves it, but—if he does not mind me saying so—he has strong views about the way that it seeks to be cavalier about the way that its powers are slipping away.

Mr. John D. Taylor (Strangford): Surely the hon. Gentleman recognises that the Maastricht treaty gives educational advantages to some member countries of the European Community? That is the whole purpose of the Maastricht agreement. Is he aware that the new Government which has just been formed in the Republic of Ireland—a coalition of Fianna Fail and the Irish Labour party—issued a joint policy statement, before the Government was confirmed by the southern Irish Parliament?

That statement announced that, for the first time, grants would be available to provide free third-level university education. The grants would be financed by the cohesion fund that the Maastricht agreement would create, and paid for by British and German taxpayers. That is how the parties presented their Government policy.

Sir Richard Body: Indeed, that must follow. After all, Ireland receives from Community funds six times more than she puts in. Ireland is a major beneficiary—as, allegedly, are her farmers. I must not digress, but we know only too well how the money has disappeared; it is not really enhancing the farmers' standard of living. It is a great pity that they do not understand what is going on.

Sir Teddy Taylor: It is not just the Government of the Republic of Ireland who are aware of the big difference and the approaching changes; the Commission are aware of that too. Perhaps my hon. Friend can find a way of letting the Government read the Commission's recently published report on Lingua, which was featured in Education magazine on 28 August 1992. The report revealed that, during that year, 200 teachers in the United Kingdom had undergone in-service training in a foreign language, compared with 71 in Spain, 66 in France and 48 in Germany.

Even in regard to the number of students going on the foreign exchanges that the treaty will formalise, encourage and finance, Britain's record was about four times higher than that of France. If money is to be provided to equalise the position, Britain will lose out: it will pay more, while gaining no advantage for its people. Less money will be available to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the provision of necessary facilities.

The Chairman: Order. Let me remind the House that, as we are still to debate the cohesion funds, it would not be appropriate for the hon. Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body) to develop that argument now. Let us return to the two articles covered by the amendment—as I know the hon. Gentleman was about to do.

Sir Richard Body: I believe that the information given by my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) is germane. It relates to how the article that we are discussing could affect our standards. It asserts that our standards are, on the whole, very good, and quotes statistics to establish that. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister will endorse that, rather than adopting the line of the hon. Member for Stretford and allowing it to be said that our educational standards are lower than those generally prevailing on the continent.

What the hon. Member for Stretford said is likely to be mirrored again and again in southern Europe. I hope that the Committee is as grateful as I am for this warning of what will happen in Spain, Portugal, Italy and Greece. The Commission will be bound to try to enforce similar standards for vocational training, and that will mean either that our standards will be lowered, or that the taxpayers of northern Europe—primarily those in Germany and the United Kingdom—will have to contribute much more than is currently envisaged.

If that does not happen, our employees will be put at a disadvantage. They will not have the standard of education that they have now. When the Opposition say that our standards are poor, they must realise that those standards will be worse if we go ahead and allow the Commission to lay down standards and impose a uniform pattern across western Europe.

Mr. Cran: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's answer on article 126. Will he address his mind, albeit temporarily, to article 57? He will be well aware of the facts and I do not ask him to read it, but I shall try to tell him succinctly that that extraordinary article requires the Council to issue directives on the mutual recognition of diplomas, certificates and other evidence of formal qualification. Does he not agree that it is already Government policy that there are far too many directives coming out of Europe? Can he guess why the Government are asking for more directives, albeit on this subject? Do we not want fewer directives?

9.45 pm

Sir Richard Body: I owe my hon. Friend an apology for not answering that question previously. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will deal with it in his reply to the debate. We are gathering quite a catalogue of questions and I suspect that only a very few of them will be answered when the time comes.

Mr. Cryer: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that part of the spate of delegated legislation that the Government are producing is based on introducing statutory instruments to implement directives? Does he agree that 1992 saw an unprecedented number of statutory instruments, orders and regulations? There were more than 3,000—a number never before achieved by any Parliament or Government in history. As the hon. Member for Beverely (Mr. Cran) said, one wonders why the Government are going after a treaty that will produce still more directives.

Sir Richard Body: I once judged a country's degree of socialism, or the socialist instinct of its Government by the number of regulations upon its people as each one tells at least someone what they shall have or what they shall do. The hon. Member has raised a very strong point. We are deluged by statutory regulations and it is a matter of very great concern to the business community.

Large companies all have one or two people whose job it is to examine the regulations and ensure that the company is keeping the law, but they are a severe burden on small businesses. I can think of businesses in my constituency, and I am sure that every right hon. and hon. Member can say the same, that they are desperate about some of the legislation being produced. They almost always complain about secondary legislation; it is very seldom primary legislation.

Mrs. Gorman: Before my hon. Friend leaves the point about training in business and professions, will he turn to amendment No. 199, which deals with article 57? Paragraph 3 deals with training and qualifications and co-ordinating of the medical and pharmaceutical professions and the progressive abolition of restrictions between countries in those professions. I am sure that my hon. Friend has great knowledge of the subject. Does he agree that it is extremely dangerous for us to remove such separations, as we expect very high standards which are not necessarily followed throughout the market? Can he give us the benefit of his experience?

Sir Richard Body: That is true of several professions. The standards of veterinary training in Spain and Portugal are way below ours, although I regret to say that, because I am fond of Portugal. We founded the profession, and the standards set by the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons and other centres of learning here have been of the very highest. Those who wish to enter training for the profession need A grades at A-level. There are other such examples, and no doubt my hon. Friends can think of them.

[Sir Richard Body]

There is no doubt that we will be disadvantaged if we agree to this article, which is bound to lower our professional standards.

Mr. Cran: I am sorry to be tiresome, but I should like to ask my hon. Friend to return to article 57. I do not want my hon. Friend to read it because he has a great deal else on his mind——

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman is now attempting to read the article for the third time. He should do hon. Members the courtesy of recognising that they have followed the debate and they know what is in the article.

Mr. Cran: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I have not taken up much of the time of the Committee and I put it to you that I was going to present an entirely new aspect of article 57——

The Chairman: Order. It is of little relevance how often an hon. Member may have spoken. Some hon. Members who have spoken many times have spoken in order. Others who have spoken only once may have been out of order. On this occasion the hon. Gentleman is out of order.

Mr. Cran: Further to that point of order, Mr. Morris. The point that I was going to put to my hon. Friend was entirely different from the one that I put to him before. It relates to why doctors and dentists are being treated——

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman cannot just persist. He should know that it is not right to quote at length from the treaty. He should recognise that hon. Members have read it and know what is in it—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"]—and they have followed the debate intensely. I call Sir Richard Body.

Mr. Marlow: Further to that point of order, Mr. Morris. It is a known fact that the Home Secretary has not read the treaty.

The Chairman: I call Sir Richard Body.

Mr. Bill Walker: On a different point of order, Mr. Morris. The treaty is not couched in the normal language of the Westminster Parliament of the United Kingdom. I suggest that there will inevitably be large parts of each article, therefore, that need explanation by Ministers. So far they have not been giving us explanations.

The Chairman: With the greatest respect, Ministers have not had the chance to respond to anything yet. The hon. Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body) has been on his feet for the best part of two hours, so it is a little hard to chastise Ministers.

Sir Richard Body: I do not deny that I have been speaking for two hours. I began by taking the hon. Member for Stretford to task, and there have been some interventions to which I have sought to respond. That is only courteous.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman himself decides whether to give way to interventions, but they are all part of his speech and count towards the time of that speech.

Sir Richard Body: Correct me if I am wrong, Mr. Morris, but I believe that one of the amendments alludes to article 57. It is that to which my hon. Friend the Member for Beverley (Mr. Cran) was trying to refer. It concerns the medical and pharmaceutical professions. Why should not there be differences between this country's view of those professions and that of other countries in the European Community?

The article seeks to harmonise the education, training and qualifications of those two professions in such a way that anyone in them can freely cross frontiers and, having done so, can practise. I accept that there are many advantages to that, and none of those who share my views about the Maastricht treaty would suggest that professional people should not cross frontiers. But we are concerned about the education, training and qualifications of those who will cross frontiers, because we want the highest standards to prevail in those professions.

Mr. Cash: Is my hon. Friend aware that it is possible, under arrangements for the mutual recognition of diplomas and degrees, for a first-class degree from one of the great British universities such as Oxford or Cambridge to be equated with a similar first-class degree from some other place that clearly does not carry the same quality, as a result of which there will be complete confusion as to the value of first and second-class degrees?

Sir Richard Body: Yes, and we must ask whether those professions and the patients who seek advice from them will be at a disadvantage.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Hon. Members are aware of my interest in the health service and its quality. My hon. Friend alluded to the interests of patients. If we are forced to accept what I would describe as a substandard medical qualification because of the Maastricht treaty, which extends vocational training and education to the Commission and the European Community, the British Parliament, by proceeding with the Bill, could be putting the safety of British patients in jeopardy. We should be deeply concerned about that.

Sir Richard Body: My hon. Friend speaks with authority on that subject and I cannot aspire to his understanding of the two professions in question. But as I said, I know something about the veterinary profession, and in that the standards in some southern European countries, particularly Spain, are manifestly lower than they are in Britain. I am in favour of free transfer, but only if we can decide the appropriate standards for our own country.

Mr. Cran: I assure my hon. Friend that I am not besotted with article 57. Is he aware that there is dubiety about whether an English doctor who practises in another country in Europe need speak the local language and, similarly, about whether a doctor from a European country need speak English? That reinforces my hon. Friend's argument that health care will go down rather than up.

Sir Richard Body: That is self-evident, and I hope that when the Minister replies he will deal with that and the catalogue of other questions that have been raised. I beg him to treat this group of amendments more seriously than Ministers treated previous groups and to deal with every point that we have raised. It has been said that we do not need a referendum because the matter will be fully debated and all the points at issue will be answered. If the questions that we raise are not answered that will weaken the Government's case for denying a referendum. It is in the interests of the Government to deal adequately with all these matters in a language that the people can understand. That cannot be said of the treaty because we have already heard many examples of how it——

It being Ten o'clock, THE CHAIRMAN left the Chair to report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Committee to report progress; to sit again tomorrow.

Commercial Court

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Robert G. Hughes.]

10 pm

Mr. Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South): This is very much a case of third time lucky. After the fracas on the day before the start of the Christmas recess, I was prevented by Opposition Members from making this speech.

In drawing attention to delays in the commercial court, I declare an interest as a solicitor and a director of companies which, from time to time, have had reason to use the commercial court. One of the main reasons why hon. Members should not be deterred from holding outside interests is that they are able to bring to the attention of the House problems that arise in those outside interests and which the Government can remedy.

Britain is a trading nation, and depends on international trade and commerce for its existence. At its heart is the City of London and, as I am a Member for a London seat and many of my constituents work in the City, its success is paramount to my constituency's interest. The City of London has a pre-eminent role in global trade and, inevitably, there are disputes in such trade. The commercial court provides a disputes resolution service for the international trading and commercial community, and to date it has been most successful.

The commercial court enjoys a worldwide reputation for providing the service for which it was instituted nearly 100 years ago in 1985. It was set up to overcome delays in the High Court—which, ironically, is now its chief fault. In well over half the cases that appear before the court, all the parties are foreign enterprises, and in more than three quarters of the cases, at least one of the parties comes from abroad. One of the chief results of that success is that the court is a substantial earner of foreign exchange in the form of invisible earnings. Those earnings arise not merely from those directly using the court, because the existence of the court in London means that the big international law firms in the City have an advantage over their overseas competitors and can offer as part of their services their familiarity with the practices of a court of world renown.

Bearing in mind the huge costs of commercial legal advice and advocacy, it would not be an exaggeration to measure the financial benefits of the court in hundreds of millions of pounds per annum. According to the Central Statistical Office balance of payments year book, foreign legal earnings are £425 million per year. The success of the commercial court over recent years is demonstrated by the fact that the court is so popular that the number of judges on commercial cases has increased from one 30 years ago to the present six. It is a credit to this Government and the Lord Chancellor's Department to have nurtured and promoted this state-owned industry. However, a few problems have recently occurred. Due to the international nature of the court, it has developed a system of providing fixed hearing dates. One of the principal reasons for this is that a system of fixed dates gives foreign litigants and witnesses fair notice of when they will be required to travel to this country.

Another important reason is that all those concerned with commercial affairs much prefer to know in advance when their disputes and differences will be resolved. In order to provide fixed hearing dates that are reasonably reliable, the court must have a constant minimum number of commercial court judges.

Given that starting point, the court can construct a list of court cases and dates. It is the aim of the commercial court that, in principle, cases should be heard at the earliest date on which the parties can be ready. That is in line with the suggestion in the civil justice review, that cases should be listed and heard within 12 months from the time of giving a trial date. That aim is also, most importantly, in line with what commercial enterprises want and need from a commercial disputes resolution service. In this field, justice delayed is likely to be justice denied or at least diminished.

Within an establishment of six judges sitting full time it was possible in the past to come close to achieving that aim. However, the situation has deteriorated recently. At the beginning of the last legal term, only five judges were available, and for reasons which are not surprising in a commercial court, four of those judges had become tied up in cases which had overrun or been brought on expeditiously. So we have a situation in which one judge is doing the work of six. He is the judge in charge of the commercial list, who is unable to undertake any trial of any length, as he has to be available to deal with the administrative matters and paper applications, which run to dozens every week.

The upshot of that is that the commercial court faces an immediate and serious problem. Had the full complement of judges been available, the difficulties would largely have been overcome, but on 22 October 1992, the question of judicial resources was raised in the other place when Lord Byron specifically raised the problems faced by the commercial court because of the lack of a full complement of commercial judges.

The Lord Chancellor, dealing with this point, observed that it was not immediately possible to replace those promoted to the Court of Appeal, but that he hoped to be in a position to appoint replacements and that the matter was temporary. A similar response was given to me by my hon. Friend the Member for Solihull (Mr. John M. Taylor), when, in answer to an oral question on 30 November, he said that a further appointment would shortly be made and implied that that would solve the problem. He gave that response in absolute good faith and I assure him that I am not suggesting otherwise.

Unfortunately, since then it has transpired that the problem is proving more than temporary. The complement of commercial judges is, on information I have available, likely to be affected indefinitely. As my hon. Friend is aware, three fresh appointments have been made in recent weeks, but I am informed that, because of shortage of judges in other parts of the Queen's bench division, two of these new judges can be made available next term for the use of the commercial court, and one is one of the five already struggling.

If I may anticipate my hon. Friend's reply, he may suggest that this is a matter for the Lord Chief Justice, but the Lord Chief Justice has been saying for many years that he does not have enough judges. My hon. Friend may say that this is a matter for the working party recently set up, but I put it to him that it has already been submitted to the working party that the High Court requires more judges. In other words, the shortage of judges in the commercial court will continue, and the difficulties will multiply every day. They cannot be solved next term, because the court will not have the judges available to do next term's list, let alone grapple with this term's problems of the emergency problems that next term itself may bring.

The commercial court users committee met last month. It is a committee not merely of lawyers with a vested interest in the success of the court but predominantly of major City and international organisations that reflect the cause of global trade. Its spokesman in discussions with the Government is Peter Tudball, the chairman of the Baltic Exchange, who has done much to raise the issue, not to be difficult but to protect London as a centre of world trade. I wholeheartedly support that attitude.

On being advised of the present position, the committee considered the matter so serious that an immediate approach should be made to Government. Its aim was to ensure that all concerned were made aware that it is not only the lawyers of the court who believe that a properly manned commercial court is essential for the continued well-being of many City institutions, which provide international service and thus enable Britain to earn its living in the world. It believes that a total of four new judges are required.

The situation is now such that the judge of the commercial court list recently wrote:

> "To my mind, the Commercial Court is no longer merely in a state of crisis. It is about to reach the point when it would be dishonest to continue to pretend that it is capable of providing the service for which it was instituted."

This autumn, Lord Donaldson, a former Master of the Rolls, said:

> "The situation has gone from crisis to catastrophe."

If that is true, it is a very serious matter indeed. In drawing it to the attention of the House, I have sought to show that the problem can be resolved.

It is not clear to me how we have reached this position. I am aware that the Government must exercise restraint in public expenditure, but there is a solution for the commercial court. The sums of money in dispute in the commercial court are huge and run to millions of pounds, but the writ fees are insignificant. If the writ fee were raised to £1,000 for every case filed in the commercial court, it would be a drop in the ocean to the users of the court, but it is estimated that it would raise £2 million per annum.

That would make the court largely self-financing, would allow for the appointment of even more judges, and might leave a small profit for the Treasury. Perhaps that will help the Treasury to review the situation and allocate more funds directly for more judges in the commercial court.

On that happy note of suggesting a small profit for the Treasury, I look forward to hearing my hon. Friend's proposals for sorting out this situation. I emphasise my belief that this institution is a credit to the Government, and that its problems are capable of resolution.

10.12 pm

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Lord Chancellor's Department (Mr. John M. Taylor): I acknowledge the concern that has been expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Mr. Ottaway) about delays in dealing with the work of the commercial court, and I congratulate him on securing this Adjournment debate.

I should first explain that the commercial court is part of the Queen's bench division of the High Court and came into existence in 1895 to provide a tribunal with greater familiarity with the subject matter of commercial and mercantile disputes and procedures to enable those disputes to be justly determined expeditiously, effectively and without undue formality.

Those remain the objectives of the court, which operates a system of fixed rather than floating lists because its users, many of whom carry on their businesses in foreign countries, are given fair notice of when they will be required to travel to London, so they know in advance when their disputes and differences will be resolved.

Under section 6 of the Supreme Court Act 1981, the Lord Chancellor nominates the High Court judges who may then be deployed to sit in the commercial court. Apart from the commercial judge, who is in charge of the list and who sits full-time in the commercial court, the others who sit there are drawn according to need and availability from the pool of judges nominated by the Lord Chancellor.

The work load of the commercial court has shown a steady increase, year by year, since 1988. The number of judicial sittings has also increased proportionately, from 936 days in the year to July 1988 to 1,256 in the year to July 1992. The commercial court had reached a relatively stable position and had been able to allocate trial times for parties who were ready for trial. Recent promotions to the Court of Appeal have, however, had a temporary effect on waiting times.

At the beginning of the last legal term, only five judges were made available from the pool of nominated judges to sit in the commercial court, although lists were planned on the basis that six judges would be available to sit. Of those five judges, two were tied up on cases which had considerably overrun their time estimates, as my hon. Friend indicated. Two others were involved in cases which were expedited—that is, ordered to take priority over other cases in the list. There was therefore only one other judge available to take the cases at that time. All five were, however, transacting the business of the commercial court.

It was not possible to secure immediate replacements for judges who had been promoted to the Court of Appeal. The pool of suitable practitioners is relatively small, and full-time appointments of judges suitable for nomination to the commercial court bench are difficult to arrange, especially as appointees may have other commitments to be met. I am pleased to say that further nominations have now been made, and the Lord Chief Justice has additional judges available for him to deploy in that court.

On 30 November, the Lord Chancellor nominated a further judge, Mr. Justice Tuckey. On 9 December, he further nominated Mr. Justice Colman, who was appointed to the High Court on that day. On 11 January, Mr. Justice Clarke, another new appointee to the High Court bench, was also nominated, to bring the number of nominees in the pool up to 10 who, together with the commercial judge, thus providing 11 judges who are currently able to sit in the commercial court, although I understand that there has had to be some replanning of lists for the current term because of last term's difficulties.

Of course, some of the judges who sit in the commercial court have other commitments. Two of the High Court judges who sit in the commercial court are presiding judges on circuits, and visit those circuits for part of the legal term. Others are also deployed to sit in other parts of the Queen's bench division, the Court of Appeal, the divisional court and the Crown court from time to time by the Lord Chief Justice.

The day-to-day deployment of judges in the Queen's bench division is a matter for the Lord Chief Justice. While it is important that fixtures arranged in the commercial court several months in advance should be kept, the Lord Chief Justice, in deciding on where judges are deployed must, of course, give due weight to the needs of the Crown court, the Queen's bench division, the Court of Appeal, criminal division, and the divisional court. The Lord Chancellor and the Lord Chief Justice consider a reduction of waiting times in these latter two courts to be of the utmost importance at this present time. At any one time, therefore, there will be difficult questions of priority to be decided in the allocation of judges. This is an important point and one which is accepted by the commercial court judge.

As the Lord Chancellor explained in the other place on 22 October 1992, in response to an unstarred question from Lord Irvine of Lairg, there is some difference between the waiting times in the various parts of the High Court, and this is true within the Queen's bench division itself. The most recent figures I have seen illustrate these differences. In the warned list, the statistics show that waiting times have halved since June 1991, from two months to one month, while the waiting times for fixtures and after fixtures fell from 15 months to eight months and from six months to three months respectively. There have been improvements in waiting times in other areas of business.

The overall picture is a very complex one, and there is no doubt, therefore, that the situation requires a thorough review. It is one thing to believe that, because of delay, more judges seem to be required; it is quite another to determine how many and on what basis.

It has been said that there is a need to plan for more judges overall, so as to ensure that enough are available in all jurisdictions, including the commercial court. That there should be sufficient High Court judges to hear the most serious, sensitive or complex cases is a natural public concern, and in recognition of this concern, the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Chief Justice have asked a group of senior judges and officials to provide advice on the work, deployment and numbers of High Court judges. The group is chaired by Lord Justice Kennedy, and its other judicial members are the Deputy Chief Justice, Lord Justice Watkins, Lord Justice McCowan, Lord Justice Scott, Lord Justice Rose, Mrs. Justice Bracewell, Mr. Justice Johnson and Mr. Justice Macpherson.

The group's first meeting was on 5 October 1992. It has met several times since then. The chairman has commissioned material relating to the work, deployment and numbers of High Court judges from members of the group and from other members of the judiciary who have responsibility for, or knowledge of, specialist High Court jurisdictions.

The advice which the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Chief Justice are seeking would cover a number of areas. The first area is what work, civil and criminal, it is appropriate for High Court judges to undertake and merits their expertise and what work can be left to others. The second is how High Court judges should be deployed to dispose of that business, having regard to the relative needs of the circuits and, in London, of the Court of Appeal, the three divisions of the High Court, the employment appeals tribunal and the other commitments they must meet. The third and related area is the system for deploying High Court judges, including the information needed to allocate appropriate business to them and to deploy them flexibly within the courts' structure to carry the work out.

It is hoped that the advice will help to address the number of High Court judges not simply in terms of needing more, or indeed fewer, to meet immediate demands, but in developing a more systematic method of determining those numbers.

The commercial court judge has contributed his views and those of the users of the court—to which my hon. Friend referred—to the group of judges and officials, and these views will be taken fully into account. It is hoped that the advice will be received soon, but until it is received it would be premature to speculate or reach conclusions about how many High Court judges are needed adequately to discharge the work load falling on them in all or any of the jurisdictions in which they sit, or how best they should be deployed to meet it.

I think it pertinent to mention finally that, since the Lord Chancellor came to office in October 1987, the number of High Court judges increased from 79 to 85 in June 1992. Although that number has fallen very recently to 83 because of promotions and retirements, steps are being taken to bring the number back to 85 as soon as is practicable.

It has been suggested that fees should be increased to pay for more judges in the commercial court. I am grateful for this suggestion. Supreme Court fees are currently subject to review, and I have offered to meet my hon. Friend to hear his views on that. The commercial court cannot, however, be seen in isolation from the rest of the court service and there could be no guarantee that increased fee income would translate directly into increased "judge power" in the commercial court.

It has also been suggested that the problems of the commercial court might lead to a significant decrease in this country's invisible earnings. I find it improbable that a temporary reduction in the total number of judges available to sit in the commercial court will do any long-term harm to its excellent reputation.

I have been asked whether the advice of the group of senior judges and officials will be published. It is unclear yet whether the advice will be in a form which could be published. Parliamentary and Privy Council approval is required to increase the current statutory limit, so in the normal course of events, any changes which were proposed to be made as a result of the advice would come into the public domain.

I should add, however, that, even if an increase in High Court judge numbers were agreed, the need to seek such approval and the problems of disengaging candidates from their current practices would mean that some time would inevitably elapse before any appointments would become effective.

The list of judges, then, nominated to sit in the commercial court as at 11th January 1993 was as follows: Mr. Justice Sheen, Mr. Justice Hobhouse, Mr. Justice Saville, Mr. Justice Gatehouse, Mr. Justice Phillips, Mr. Justice Potter, Mr. Justice Waller, Mr. Justice Cresswell, Mr. Justice Tuckey, Mr. Justice Coleman and Mr. Justice Clarke.

Mr. Justice Sheen is the Admiralty judge and devotes about 20 per cent. of his time to the commercial court. Mr. Justice Waller and Mr. Justice Potter are also presiding judges on circuits.

I should like to thank the House for the opportunity to reply to the points raised by my hon. Friend and, once again, to congratulate him on securing this Adjournment debate on a very important subject, about which I know he cares very sincerely, and of which he has considerable knowledge.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Northern England

1. Mr. Mandelson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the Government's policies to bring new industry to the north.

The Minister for Energy (Mr. Tim Eggar): We seek to ensure that the north and all other regions in the United Kingdom benefit from the prosperity which new industry brings.

During the past six years our policies and grant incentives have enabled the north to attract £2 billion of inward investment creating or safeguarding 15,000 jobs.

Mr. Mandelson: To everyone listening in the northern region that will seem a pathetic reply, especially when regional assistance to it has been cut by 78 per cent. since 1979, unemployment has been higher there for each of the past 20 years and when the recovery was weaker in the second half of last year than it was in the first

Will the Minister give an assurance that, when he makes his announcement on regional assistance, there will be no reduction in assisted area status for any locality in the northern region? Will he give a commitment that the funding of the Northern Development Company will be maintained in real terms? When will the Government create the one-stop business advice centres, a network of which they promised us last year?

Mr. Eggar: The hon. Gentleman has not managed to improve on his record when he was advising the previous Leader of the Opposition. He does not appear to know the unemployment figures in his constituency, which have fallen sharply since 1986, and he completely downgrades the tremendous success of the northern region in attracting companies such as Nissan and Fujitsu. I am suprised that he, as a new Member, does not spend more of his time praising the people of the north, the Northern Development Company and other organisations on their spectacular success in attracting inward investment to the north.

Mr. Devlin: Has not the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) just quoted figures that were bloated in 1978 by the massive subsidies paid to loss-making industries, particularly steel and shipbuilding? Is not it the case that, since then, we have diverted much of that money more profitably and usefully into Teeside development corporation, Tyne and Wear development corporation and the Northern Development Company as well as a host of other agencies that have brought new investments to the north and are currently constructing several new advance factories, one of which I shall have the honour of opening on Friday?

Mr. Eggar: I agree completely with my hon. Friend. I very much hope that inward investors will look to the messages delivered by my hon. Friend rather than to those of Opposition Members.

Mr. Fatchett: The Minister would be better advised to use his energy to answer the questions specifically put by my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) rather than simply trading in personal abuse.

I put the same question to the Minister. Against the background of rising unemployment in the north of England in the past two years, the loss of jobs in manufacturing industry and the fact that much industry in the north of England is dependent upon regional assistance, will the Minister give the House a clear commitment that no area in the north will lose under the review of the assisted areas map?

Mr. Eggar: I am delighted to be exchanging pleasantries once again across the Dispatch Box with the hon. Gentleman now that he has followed me from education. Obviously he has not done his homework in this new area of responsibilities. He knows perfectly well that we await decisions on regional assistance in the light of the current overall look at the map.

Energy Review

2. Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he expects to announce the conclusions of his review of the Government's energy policy.

9. Mr. Canavan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what recent discussions he has had with representatives of British Coal about the future of the coal industry; and if he will make a statement.

The President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Michael Heseltine): I hope to be able to publish the coal review White Paper as soon as possible next month. As part of the review process I meet British Coal as necessary to discuss a range of issues.

Mr. Nicholson: Any fair-minded person will recognise that resolving the problems that my right hon. Friend inherited will require some cost—whether financial, legislative or ideological. Will my right hon. Friend carefully examine the case for more private enterprise, rather than more subsidy, in the coal industry? Will he also take a hard look at the hidden subsidy that the British consumer pays, through the channel link, to the French nuclear industry and to the dash for gas?

Mr. Heseltine: I know of my hon. Friend's concern in such matters and I assure him that both the Select Committee and, I hope, my Department have carried out an extremely comprehensive and thorough review. I hope shortly to put the findings of the review before the House and I assure my hon. Friend that the matters that he has raised will be included in our review.

Mr. Canavan: Will the Secretary of State investigate the astonishing claim made earlier this week by the chief executive of Scottish Power that, towards the end of last year, British Coal did not even bid for a contract to supply 800,000 tonnes of coal to Scottish power stations, so that Scottish Power had almost no option but to go for subsidised imports? In view of the Government's complete lack of an integrated energy policy and the fact that the Secretary of State was found guilty of flouting the law by unnecessarily closing pits, will the right hon. Gentleman face up to his responsibilities and intervene to save the British coal industry, or resign and make way for someone who will?

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Gentleman will realise that the specific issue of tendering for coal supplies to the Scottish electricity industry or any other consumer is a matter for British Coal. I shall certainly draw the attention of British Coal to the issues raised by the hon. Gentleman. British Coal is charged with the responsibility of advancing the interests of British coal and it must decide whether to bid for contracts. As to the hon. Gentleman's general observations, he will find that our review will be extremely comprehensive and we shall look carefully at the large subsidies in the energy industry, many of which we have sought to reduce during the past decade to fulfil our energy policy objective of providing a diversity of supply at competitive prices.

Mr. Robathan: In my right hon. Friend's deliberations on the future energy policy of the United Kingdom, will he take into account his Department's renewable energy advisory group recommendations, in particular the generation target of 1500 MW by the year 2000 and the idea of a renewable energy obligation? Will he also look into the sensible use of combined heat and power and municipal waste-to-energy schemes? When is he likely to make his decisions on those matters?

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend raises two more aspects of the wide-ranging review that we are conducting. I assure him that we shall deal with both matters when we produce our White Paper.

Mr. Fisher: As part of his review of energy policy, will the President of the Board of Trade give the House the time scale for the review of the 10 pits ordered by the High Court? Will he assure the House that that review will be no less thorough and rigorous than that of the 21 pits? Will he allow coaling to start in the 10 pits so that the reviews may be of equal parity and importance and conducted on an equal basis?

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Gentleman is right. We have asked Boyds—an internationally respected firm of consultants—to introduce the degree of independence to the consultative processes now under way in the light of our judgment of the court findings. It is now for Boyds to conduct the review and we have asked it to look at the evidence and the state of the pits. That matter was also raised in the light of the assurances given by the chairman of British Coal to myself, the Select Committee and the courts. It is for Boyds to determine the speed at which it conducts its review, which must be done thoroughly. It is for British Coal to consult the unions on whether they accept the element of independence that the appointment that I have made could provide in the circumstances. When the exercise has been conducted and I have received the report, I shall ensure that the House is fully informed.

Mr. Kynoch: While conducting his review of energy policy, will my right hon. Friend ensure that there is a proper balance between all forms of energy, with particular reference to the North sea oil and gas industry, which contributes an important amount to the economy of the north-east of Scotland?

Mr. Heseltine: I very much agree with my hon. Friend. It is important that all aspects of energy provision are considered in our review and that is what we are doing.

Mr. Robin Cook: Has the President already forgotten that since last Question Time, the courts have ruled that his decision of 13 October was unlawful and that his decision of 19 October to shut 10 pits was both unlawful and irrational?

Would not the rational response to that ruling be to let the miners who clock on at those pits every day go underground and dig coal? Why, then, does not the right hon. Gentleman instruct British Coal to reopen the 10 pits that it unlawfully shut? As he has told the House that he has met the top people in British Coal, who will all keep their jobs, will he say which pits on the list he has visited during the review and what meetings he has had with the people working there who face the sack?

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Gentleman is fully aware that we have continual discussions with British Coal, which is responsible for the management of pits. We have not instructed British Coal to resume coaling at the 10 pits, for the simple reason that it advises us that it does not need the additional coal. It already has large stocks, both at the pithead and with the generators. The contractual prospects for British Coal would not justify the additional cost of extracting that coal now.

Mr. Riddick: Is my hon. Friend aware that my local council—Labour-controlled Kirklees—is imposing smokeless zones on the rural parts of my constituency, despite the fact that the council's own figures show that emissions of smoke and sulphur dioxide are well within the legal limit? The result will be that hundreds, if not thousands, of local households will switch from burning coal to burning gas. Is not that Labour hypocrisy in action?

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend brings out one of the less attractive features of the controversy that has surrounded the pit closures. It must also be said that we have not heard a great deal from the environmental lobbies, which were so vociferous in urging us to achieve better environmental standards in this area.

Mining Industry

3. Mr. John Evans: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on his Department's support for the British mining industry.

Mr. Eggar: We are engaged in a wide-ranging review of the prospects for 21 of the pits proposed for closure by British Coal, in the context of the Government's energy policy. We shall shortly be publishing a White Paper setting out the results of that review, which will then be debated in the House.

Mr. Evans: Will the Minister give an undertaking that in view of the High Court's ruling that British Coal and the Government acted unlawfully in closing the 10 collieries, which include Parkside in my constituency, he will ensure that the criteria under which Boyds reviews those collieries will be exactly the same as the criteria being used in the review of the other 21 collieries? Everyone could then be sure that those 10 collieries were getting a fair deal.

Will the Minister give the House and the country a further undertaking that the miners at the 10 collieries will not be dismissed, at least until the House has had the opportunity to debate the Government's review of the future of the British coal industry?

Mr. Eggar: On the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question, Boyds' report on the 21 pits plus the additional 19 will be published. With regard to the report on the 10 pits which my right hon. Friend has asked Boyds to prepare, both the unions and British Coal will be consulted. We assume that that report will also be published and made available. At that stage, the House will have an opportunity to consider it, as well as the report that is shortly to be published on the 21 pits plus the additional 19.

On the latter part of the question, there will be no compulsory redundancies until there has been a debate in the House, until the review has been published and until the House has had an opportunity to discuss the White Paper and the report of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry.

I apologise for the length of that answer, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Cormack: Does my hon. Friend accept that many thousands of miners are finding it extremely difficult to decide on their future before they know the future of their industry? Therefore, will he talk to Mr. Clarke urgently and ask that the special redundancy and early retirement arrangements be kept in force for at least another six months so that those men are relieved of the intolerable, agonising pressures that they face at the moment?

Mr. Eggar: We are acutely conscious of that point, which Mr. Neil Greatrex of the Union of Democratic Mineworkers made to me this morning.

Mr. Skinner: The 90 days are almost up.

Mr. Eggar: We have said—I think that this must be right—that we should not make any decision, nor should we press British Coal to make any decision, in advance of the publication of the White Paper, because that obviously has a bearing. The two are interconnected.

Mr. Hardy: Before reaching any conclusions, will the Minister take particular care to consider the total cost of the closures as well as the sterilisation of large volumes of coal? Will he take even more care in considering the recommendations of the electricity regulator in the recent report on electricity purchasing which appears to ignore the costs of production and reaches conclusions that are not justified by the facts, which are known to the hon. Gentleman, his Department and every hon. Member who is concerned about this matter?

Mr. Eggar: Of course, the matters mentioned in the hon. Gentleman's first point will be considered as part of the review. The responsibility for the report is Professor Stephen Littlechild's, but, as the hon. Gentleman would expect, that report is one of the factors that we shall consider as part of the review. It may help the House, as the matter was raised from a sedentary position, if I add that the 90 days is the minimum consultation period.

Mr. Alexander: Bearing in mind the huge anxiety among the mining communities about the final outcome, may I ask my hon. Friend to confirm that the Boyds' report on the 10 pits and the reports of the Select Committees on Employment and on Trade and Industry will all be the subject of the Government's conclusions in their White Paper before we come to the House and discuss it with a view to determining our future energy policy?

Mr. Eggar: It will be important to have those documents available, but my hon. Friend will be aware that the coal industry faces a major crisis at the beginning of April when there are no contracts for coal. If we were to delay the publication of all the documents in the way that my hon. Friend suggests, no coaling at all may be possible on 1 April. I am sure that my hon. Friend would not want that, but I shall bear in mind his other points.

Mr. O'Neill: The Minister clarified his reply to the hon. Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) in relation to the 90-day period and the special redundancy terms that have been offered. Will those redundancy terms remain on the table until the various problems that flow from the court decision are resolved? Can we take it that the offer will remain for as long as it takes to resolve the matter? That is the men's worry at present and the Minister was not specific in his reply.

Mr. Eggar: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. First, I repeat that the 90-day consultation period is a minimum period, so no miner should be under the impression, as I understand some are, that on 30 January the position will suddenly change from what it was on 29 January.

The hon. Gentleman's second point relates to the end of March date for the present voluntary redundancy terms. To clarify the matter, we are acutely aware of the concern about that, but we do not think that it would be right either to announce that the scheme will stop on that date or that it will be extended beyond that date, in advance of the publication of the White Paper and the other papers. Those decisions must be taken in the light of the White Paper. I hope that the House will understand that.

Manufacturing Productivity

4. Mr. Dunn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the change in manufacturing productivity for the latest period for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister for Industry (Mr. Tim Sainsbury): Manufacturing productivity in the three months to October 1992 was at record levels, 2 per cent. higher than in the previous three months and 6 per cent. higher than the same period a year earlier.

Mr. Dunn: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. Would he care to speculate on what those figures might be if all the restrictive practices that we abandoned, abolished and swept away were reimposed according to the policy of the Labour party?

Mr. Sainsbury: That is a good point. It is ghastly to contemplate where we might be if we had not introduced our reforms of industrial relations law, in the teeth of persistent opposition from Labour,

Mr. Snape: Does the Minister accept that in the real world, under a Conservative Government, total employment in manufacturing continues to decline, particularly in the west midlands? Instead of planting silly questions such as this, will the right hon. Gentleman tell us what action the Government will take to save this vital sector of British Industry?

Mr. Sainsbury: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree that if we are to have an internationally competitive manufacturing sector, its productivity must be of the highest standard. The hon. Gentleman should bear in mind the fact that, because of our changes to industrial relations law, productivity growth in manufacturing industry since 1979 has been three times as fast as that achieved under the last Labour Government.

China (Ministerial Visit)

5. Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the visit of the Minister for Trade to the People's Republic of China.

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Richard Needham): I made a visit to Guangzhou between 3 and 5 January with a team of 20 senior business men, to pursue important opportunities in the fastest-growing region of the world. I made clear our long-term commitment to a significant expansion of trade between the United Kingdom and China. Our substantial commercial presence in Hong Kong has a vital role to play in this process.

Sir Thomas Arnold: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his successful journey, which was made at a difficult time for Anglo-Chinese relations. Does he believe that British business is taking full advantage of the opportunities that China has to offer?

Mr. Needham: I do not think that we are taking full advantage, but we are taking much greater advantage than we were even a year ago. As my hon. Friend said, there are immense opportunities for British business in China. We have a long trading relationship with the country, which is one of the fastest-growing markets in the world. It is a market which we must and will enter and I am sure that we shall be successful in it.

Mr. Bell: The Minister will be aware that we have sold nose-cone radar for fighter aircraft to the Republic of China. Last time the issue was raised in the House, he told us that there was a ban on arms trade. Is that ban extant?

Mr. Needham: Yes, Madam.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Will my hon. Friend ensure that a rather vociferous and sometimes short-sighted minority in Hong Kong does not imperil our relations with the Republic of China, on which so many jobs and so much else will depend in the future?

Mr. Needham: The governor's proposals for the 1992 elections strike me as entirely consistent with both the Basic Law and the joint declaration. China has been invited to discuss those proposals with us; in the mean time, our trade with China continues. The vice-premier of China, Zhu Rongji, and the mayors of Suzhou and Shanghai have recently visited this country and I have every confidence that business between our two countries will continue to grow.

Cultural Programme

6. Mr. Cohen: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the current cost of the cultural programme administered by overseas trade division 3 of his Department.

Mr. Needham: My Department does not normally administer cultural programmes. However, overseas trade division 3 had a budget of £1·4 million for the cultural and entertainment programme connected with Expo 92.

Mr. Cohen: Did the existence of that cultural programme come as a surprise to the Minister and his officials? Is not that symptomatic of the absence of any serious promotion of British trade abroad? Are not the Government so ashamed of the Britain that they have run down over the past 14 years that they cannot promote British culture or help our exporters?

Mr. Needham: I was not in the slightest bit surprised by our cultural budget for Expo. We can teach anyone in the world about culture, and we did so at Expo. The British day was the most successful of all national days at Expo because of our immense cultural attainments.

Mr. Duncan: Given the importance of our cultural programmes overseas and the fact that the Sri Lankan Minister of Trade and Commerce, Mr. Abeygunasekera, is currently visiting the United Kingdom, will my hon. Friend take this opportunity to reaffirm his belief in the importance of our trade and cultural relations with Sri Lanka and, indeed, our admiration for that country's domestic policies?

Mr. Needham: Yes, although Sri Lanka is rather far from Seville.

Mining Equipment

7. Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is his policy on the mining engineering sector.

Mr. Eggar: Our policy, as for all other sectors of industry, is to help United Kingdom companies to compete successfully at home and abroad.

We are working closely with the industry to give our suppliers every proper assistance.

Mr. Hinchliffe: As the Minister will recall, I have already expressed my concern about the implications of Government policy on the coal industry for the export efforts of the British mining engineering sector. Is he aware that the British Jeffrey Diamond Company in my constituency has developed an award-winning leading edge technology in switched reluctance variable speed drives? [Laughter.] That is what it says here. Is the Minister aware that there is major export potential, but that the company and the industry as a whole are concerned that Government policies for coal are destroying the future potential of such products, which can earn for Britain, because our shop window to show these products is being destroyed with the British coal industry?

Mr. Eggar: May I be the first to congratulate the hon. Gentleman on reading his hand? I am aware of the importance of the British coal industry to the British mining equipment industry and I understand the difficulties to which he drew attention. It is right to point out that the mining equipment industry has been a successful exporter which runs a positive balance of trade surplus. We are working hard to help it to promote exports in areas such as China.

Mr. Gallie: Is my hon. Friend aware of a company called Wallacetown Engineering in my constituency which specialises in electrical mining equipment? It currently has representatives in China seeking new business in view of the difficulties in the coal industry. There are encouraging messages, but may I have an assurance that the Department of Trade and Industry will do all in its power to encourage and help companies such as Wallacetown Engineering?

Mr. Eggar: It was precisely to help such companies that I went to China, and for precisely that reason that we are seeking to reach an agreement between the Export Credits Guarantee Department and Chinese banks to facilitate coal equipment exports.

Engineering

8. Mr. Butler: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he will next meet motor manufacturers to discuss measures to support the engineering sector.

Mr. Sainsbury: My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade and I will be meeting the Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders and senior representatives of the leading vehicle manufacturers later today.

Mr. Butler: At that meeting, will my right hon. Friend bear in mind the importance, as set out in detail in the Bangemann report, of pre-competitive co-operation in the development of high technology products? Will he also bear in mind moves to encourage further inward investment which, in successful areas such as Milton Keynes, now accounts for 18 per cent. of our employment?

Mr. Sainsbury: I am happy to assure my hon. Friend on both points. He mentioned inward investment. The success of inward investment evident in his constituency, which I had the pleasure of visiting recently, is attributable largely to the creation of the right economic climate, a climate of low taxation, good industrial relations and minimum regulation—the very factors which would be most put at risk by Labour's policies.

Burdens on Industry

10. Mr. Gill: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what progress is being made in ridding industry of unnecessary legislative burdens.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Corporate Affairs (Mr. Neil Hamilton): We have taken a wide range of measures in Whitehall, in town halls and in the European Community to promote deregulation. For the first time, all Government Departments have had to undertake a census of their regulations. Following that, by 1 April they will be providing me with their candidates for repeal and simplification.

My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade will shortly be announcing the terms of reference of a scrutiny of the formulation of European Community law and its implementation and enforcement in the United Kingdom, and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister will shortly be holding a seminar for Cabinet and other Ministers and senior civil servants to impress on them the importance of achieving results in the deregulation initiative before the next Government reshuffle.

Mr. Gill: I am sure that many people employed in the wealth-generating sector of the economy in my constituency and in the rest of the country will be encouraged by my hon. Friend's positive response. Will he assure the House that, in considering those important matters, the Government understand that what bothers the entrepreneur and imposes a high cost burden on industry is not just one individual piece of legislation, but an amalgam of hundreds of them?

Mr. Hamilton: I fully agree with my hon. Friend that the greatest burden of regulation falls upon smaller businesses. That is a tremendous distraction from wealth creation and job creation, and we at the Department of Trade and Industry are determined to play our part in reducing that burden.

Mr. Trimble: May I draw the Minister's attention to the problems experienced by exporters, especially in the implementation of the single market? Their job has not become easier, despite no longer having to regain certain classes of papers, because under the new value added tax regulations they have to find out the VAT numbers of the persons to whom they are exporting. They have considerable difficulty, especially when dealing with countries where the cultural attitude to tax matters is different from our own.

Mr. Hamilton: I agree that, although the single European market offers great opportunities for businesses in this country and, overall, has reduced the burden of regulation, there is still much more that can be done. I am keeping a wary eye out for opportunities to reduce the burdens. If the hon. Gentleman comes across any examples among his constituents' businesses, I should be grateful if he would send me the details.

Sir Michael Grylls: Most hon. Members will give enthusiastic support to my hon. Friend's vigorous campaign to get rid of unnecessary burdens and overbearing Government measures affecting all sorts of industries, but will he ensure that he is informed of any new burdens proposed by other Departments, especially regulations and secondary legislation? Supported by the President of the Board of Trade, will my hon. Friend do all in his power to ensure that, at the highest level, Ministers are told to bring proposals to him first to find out whether they are really necessary?

Mr. Hamilton: I thank my hon. Friend for that question. He has been a doughty fighter in the cause of deregulation for many years in the House. Each Department now has its own deregulation Minister, whose responsibility within that Department is to ensure that if any new regulations are proposed they are proportionate and not too costly to businesses in this country. The deregulation initiative is centrally co-ordinated from within my Department, so I can assure my hon. Friend that I shall subject proposals from other Departments for increased regulation to the closest possible scrutiny.

Dangerous Toys

11. Mr. McAvoy: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many warnings have been issued by his Department under the Consumer Protection Act 1987 to manufacturers and distributors of dangerous children's toys.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Technology (Mr. Edward Leigh): Since October 1987 my Department has served 18 prohibition notices on named companies prohibiting them from supplying toy-like items which were considered to pose a choking hazard. My Department does, of course, from time to time offer informal advice to traders on matters relating to the safety of toys and other consumer goods.

Mr. McAvoy: With so many official recalls of dangerous children's toys, kettles, car tyres, washing machines and electric light bulbs, is it not clear to the Minister that his system is ineffective and leaves tens of thousands of consumers at serious risk from dangerous products?

Mr. Leigh: No, I do not take that view. Trading standards officers are responsible for enforcing the Consumer Protection Act. The hon. Gentleman's original question referred to toys. Under the directive on the safety of toys, trading standards officers have all the powers that they need. That directive is extremely detailed and lays down strict criteria as to how toys should be manufactured and retailed. There is no evidence that trading standards officers do not have sufficient powers to ensure that toys are safe.

Mr. Michael Brown: Is my hon. Friend aware that I have a very great vested interest in receiving a successful answer to my question as I am a purchaser of toys for my god-daughter—his daughter? I believe that consumers, both purchasers and recipients, should have the benefit of some kind of British safety standard so that it might at least be clear that a toy is safe for my hon. Friend's daughter.

Mr. Leigh: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He will be relieved to hear that if he were to attempt to buy for my daughter anything called Splat Balls, Splat Eggs, Splat Tomatoes, Slime Balls, Sticky Balls, Tacky Wacky Wall Rollers, Spike Balls, Sticky Flying Hammers, Hand Hammer Sticky Catchers, Sticky Hand, Sticky Flicker or Sticky Troll, that would be illegal under consumer protection legislation.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: How does the Minister defend the present recall system, which leaves four out of five dangerous articles in the hands of consumers? The system is ineffective and open to abuse by manufacturers and retailers.

Mr. Leigh: The hon. Gentleman is, of course, a slime ball and should get his tacky hands off—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. As hon. Members will have seen, I was rather distracted when the remark that has caused the interruption was made. However, from the reaction of the House I take it that it was made in good humour.

Mr. Leigh: Of course it was made in good humour, Madam Speaker. The hon. Gentleman and I get on extremely well in respect of all these matters, as he knows.

This is a serious matter, and if the hon. Gentleman has any evidence we shall ensure that it is passed to trading standards officers.

Debt (Late Payment)

12. Ms. Lynne: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what further plans he has to tackle the problem of late payment of debt.

Mr. Leigh: The Government are already addressing the problem of late payment with a range of measures, including pilots with trade associations and new Government contracting terms.

Ms. Lynne: Does the Minister agree that late settlement of debt has caused many small businesses to go to the wall, not only in Rochdale but throughout the country, that this has led to increased unemployment and that the trend will continue in the foreseeable future? Does he agree that Government measures to date have not ended late settlement of debt? Is it not time we had a statutory requirement that interest be paid on overdue debts?

Mr. Leigh: The hon. Lady is, of course, correct in saying that this is a very serious problem for small businesses. We keep these matters constantly under review, and we have an open mind about the question of a statutory requirement that interest be paid on overdue debts. The problem—a difficult and serious one—is that it would simply result in larger companies' imposing longer credit terms on their contractors. Other countries in the European Community have such provisions. France and Italy are examples, but their late payment problem is worse than ours. Denmark and Germany, too, have such provisions, but the fact that they do not have the same problem is probably due as much to cultural factors as to statutory controls. Most small business organisations—such as the Federation of Small Businesses, the Confederation of British Industry and the Association of British Commerce—support our present stand.

Mr. Tracey: Is my hon. Friend aware that many Conservative Members have campaigned for many years for improvement in respect of the question of late payment, which is so very debilitating to small businesses, especially at this time? Does my hon. Friend know that small businesses say that some of the biggest companies in this country are among the worst payers?

Mr. Leigh: I pay tribute to the campaign waged by a number of hon. Members with regard to the late payment problem. As well as keeping an open mind about the need for legislation in the future, it is vital that the Government should set an example—indeed, there is a requirement that Government Departments pay promptly, within 30 days—and to ensure that prompt payment goes down the line to subcontractors. The campaign waged by hon. Members has had an effect on Government action, and I am delighted to say that the Association of District Councils has taken up the campaign with regard to the need for prompt payment by local authorities and that trade associations, too, are following the problem through.

Manufacturing

13. Mr. Henderson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on changes in the manufacturing base of the economy.

Mr. Sainsbury: Over the 1980s, manufacturing output grew at the same rate as in Germany, and faster than in France and in Italy. Output in the three months to October was higher than at the end of 1991.

Mr. Henderson: Is the Minister aware of the plight of the machine tool industry—a key high-tech and capital goods industry at the heart of the British manufacturing base which has lost 25 per cent. of the United Kingdom market in the past three years? Will the Minister tell the House why he thinks that that has happened? What does he intend to do about it?

Mr. Sainsbury: I appreciate that the machine tool industry has suffered severely during the recession. It is understandable that it would be one of the industries likely to suffer most and therefore it is equally likely to benefit as the upturn comes, so long as we retain the competitive position that we now have with low taxation, less regulation and a competitive exchange rate.

Mr. Rathbone: What actions have arisen in Government policy in the light of the submission from the Engineering Employers Federation?

Mr. Sainsbury: It was an interesting submission and we have studied it carefully. We have discussed and will continue to discuss it with the Engineering Employers Federation. As I am sure my hon. Friend agrees, a careful reading of the report—rather than some of the press comment that accompanied its release—will show that there is much in it which is being done or has already been done on the recommendations made to the Government.

Mr. Turner: Will the Minister accept that the manufacturing base is fast disappearing in the black country of the midlands—an area in which there was more wealth created per acre than anywhere else in the world. The latest casualty is Cannon Industries in Coseley. Unless we can save it, the plant is to be closed, with the loss of 900 jobs. The company has been trading satisfactorily for the past 175 years and makes top-quality products——

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is now doing a public relations exercise instead of putting a question.

Mr. Turner: Not at all.

Madam Speaker: Order. I ask the hon. Gentleman to come to his question.

Mr. Turner: I am speaking for the 900 workers who will lose their jobs, and for their families. What do the Government intend to do about that?

Mr. Sainsbury: I wish that the hon. Gentleman could use his public relations skills to praise the achievements of British manufacturing industry. Manufacturing output—[Interruption.] The Opposition may not wish to hear, but the country should know that manufacturing output is now one fifth higher than it was 10 years ago, manufacturing investment is one third higher, productivity is more than one half higher and export volume is four fifths higher.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: I entirely endorse the views just expressed by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. Turner). What response will my right hon. Friend give to the Engineering Employers Federation on the excellent campaign that it has launched? Will he admit that the manufacturing industries of this country, together with construction, are the only source of non-inflationary economic growth? What action does he intend to urge on the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the two Budgets this year to broaden our manufacturing base? Although my right hon. Friend gave some optimistic forecasts and statistics, the fact is that we have one of the narrowest manufacturing bases in the European Community.

Mr. Sainsbury: I am happy to agree with my hon. Friend about the importance of manufacturing industry. I am sure that we share the wish to see the manufacturing base expand. I hope that my hon. Friend agrees that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's autumn statement responded very adequately to the needs of manufacturing industry.

Mr. Cousins: The Minister will recognise that the British aerospace industry, which is our largest exporter, is facing a period of considerable change and difficulty. Last Friday the largest order for cargo aircraft ever placed was placed with Boeing. What action has the Minister taken to ensure that British Rolls-Royce engines are used for that order?

Mr. Sainsbury: The hon. Member is well aware of the difficulties being experienced by the aerospace industry internationally, partly due to the cutback in defence requirements. My Department works closely with the aerospace industry and keeps very close contact with it in all its aspects in order to promote the interests of British manufacturers. I am happy to have this opportunity to pay tribute to the export achievements of the aero-engine sector and Rolls-Royce in particular.

Industrial Competitiveness Division

14. Mr. Page: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement concerning the work of the industrial competitiveness division.

Mr. Heseltine: I attach great importance to the work of the industrial competitiveness division, which is central to my drive to make the Department of Trade and Industry a real partner to British business. The division provides me with a wide range of advice on the United Kingdom's competitiveness, based on research at home and abroad, which I take into account when considering Government policy.

Mr. Page: I thank my right hon. Friend for his reply. I am delighted that he takes information from that division into account in formulating Government policy. That is a change from what some of his predecessors have done. Nevertheless, does he agree that it is vital for the information gathered by the division to be disseminated to British industry so that industry knows where it is lacking and where it can compete to drive out imports and increase exports? Will my right hon. Friend please say how he will get this information through to British industry?

Mr. Heseltine: I very much sympathise with what my hon. Friend has said. He will realise that we have a wide range of contacts with British industry, both large and small companies. The purpose of the competitiveness division is not to produce one jumbo report, but to continue to advise us. We shall therefore use all the avenues available to us, through the sectoral divisions or through the one-stop shops that we are pioneering, to communicate information to the companies where appropriate.

Mr. Barry Jones: When can the right hon. Gentleman get the problems of manufacturing at the head of the Government's agenda? When shall we see an end to the indecision and drift which are at the heart of industrial policy in Britain today? Would it not be better to invest in manufacturing rather than go for quick profits from privatisation sales?

Madam Speaker: Order. I feel that perhaps the hon. Gentleman is putting a supplementary to the wrong question. We are here concerned simply with the division in the Board of Trade which is concerned with industrial competitiveness.

Mr. Heseltine: I understand the point that the hon. Member was making, but I am at a loss to understand how he can criticise the Government when his own party has produced a budget designed to cut back on the levels of investment in British industry by a windfall tax on consumers of British-manufactured products.

Coal Industry

15. Mr. Skinner: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will now make a further statement about the coal industry.

Mr. Heseltine: If I may, Madam Speaker, I will answer this question and question 18 together——

Madam Speaker: Order. I was not informed that questions 15 and 18 were to be linked. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will deal only with question 15 at this stage.

Mr. Heseltine: In that case, Madam Speaker, I will not answer question 18 in conjunction with question 15.

The answer to question 15 is that the Government are conducting a wide-ranging review of the prospects for 21 of the pits proposed for closure by British Coal. I hope to be able to publish a White Paper as soon as possible next month, setting out the results of that review, which will then be debated in the House.

Mr. Skinner: Is it not true that, according to the High Court, the review turned out to be illegal, that the 90 days' consultative period is up on 27 January and that miners at some of the pits are being told by local management that if they do not take their redundancy pay by this weekend they will lose their £10,000 supplementary redundancy pay? It is a form of blackmail. We need an assurance that since the Government acted illegally and the High Court has ruled that the consultative period must be extended, those redundancy payments will be extended as well. We expect better from this Government, who ought to have been surcharged—especially the right hon. Gentleman, who has cost the mining industry £100 million, including miners' lost wages. If he had been a member of a Labour council, he would have been surcharged.

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Gentleman will know that the courts did not deal with the review that we are talking about. However, I wish to deal very seriously with the essence of his point, which is about the availability of the redundancy terms. The redundancy terms are available until the end of March, and it is clear—[Interruption.] No, the official 90 days—[Interruption.] If the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) was ever interested in the answer to any question, he would listen to what I have to say because it is vital to the people whom he represents and, of course, to a wide range of other hon. Members' constituents.

The consultation period, which ends at the end of January, is a minimum consultation period. We have made it clear that there will be no steps to close mines until the House has had an opportunity to debate the issue in the context of the White Paper. We have made it equally clear that the redundancy terms will still be available at that time.

Mrs. Peacock: Following the reply by my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy to a question on the special redundancy scheme, will my right hon. Friend give an assurance that that scheme could continue after the end of March as the matter is causing great concern to many miners and their families?

Mr. Heseltine: I quite understand the point that my hon. Friend raises. I can assure her that we shall deal with that issue in the White Paper and that the redundancy terms will be available until that review is published, and then we shall clarify the future.

Mr. Cunliffe: In view of the right hon. Gentleman's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), will he now clarify that, as the British Coal 10-day pit closure was declared invalid and illegal, the 90-day consultation period is meaningless and invalid? Will he now give a categorical assurance, as the Prime Minister has written to the miners' parliamentary group saying that the 10-pit review which he has now spoken about is independent of the other 20 pits and that the 90-day consultation period must be introduced again from the day the right hon. Gentleman presents the review to the House?

Mr. Heseltine: Obviously, I have read with great care the judgment which, of course, has not yet been perfected; nevertheless, I have read all the evidence that I can. It seems to me that the judge was saying that I should ensure that there is a degree of independence in so far as it lay to me to do so. It was with that in mind that I appointed Boyds to conduct the review of the 10 pits. The point remains that the 90 days is a minimum period. I have made it absolutely clear that, before any further decisions are taken in terms of the closure of those pits, the House will have an opportunity to debate the outcome of the White Paper.

Mr. Oppenheim: What conclusions does my right hon. Friend draw from the fate of Kloeckner, the leading west German steel maker which recently declared bankruptcy because of Germany's high-price energy policy and because of Germany's policy of protecting its coal industry from competition? Does that not show that, if we protect one industry from competition, we simply load costs and job losses on to others?

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend obviously makes a most important point, which underlies our determination to achieve competitiveness in British industry. It would be inappropriate for me to analyse the precise reasons for the failure of that steel company in Germany, but it is absolutely self-evident that the British Government have negotiated to ensure that some of the more onerous social costs of the German economy are not imposed here.

Mr. Janner: Will the Minister reassure the House that his White Paper will take into account the recommendations of the Trade and Industry Select Committee and of the Employment Select Committee? Is he aware that the chairman of British Coal, who told the Employment Select Committee that he had been too busy to go down any pit to meet affected miners, has announced that tomorrow, by a strange coincidence, he will go down a pit at precisely the time the Employment Select Committee is to put out its report? Did the right hon. Gentleman know about that? Were the Government told that that unworthy public relations exercise was to happen?

Mr. Heseltine: I think that my Department received that information by way of a press release. To go back to the substance of the hon. and learned Gentleman's first point, obviously it is the Government's intention to take account of the views of the Employment Select Committee, which the hon. and learned Gentleman chairs, and of the Trade and Industry Select Committee. It looks as though that will now be possible, as we had always intended. We could not have known that at the outcome, but certainly that is what we have sought to achieve.

Mrs. Currie: Does the President of the Board of Trade agree that, however tempting, it may be dangerous and, indeed, foolish to postpone economic change any longer than necessary? Is he aware that, from 1987—when the closure of the last pit in my constituency was announced —to the end of 1992, more than 11,000 new businesses were registered for VAT by the South Derbyshire VAT office, and that the unemployment rate in my constituency is 6 per cent? None of that would have been possible if we had struggled to keep that dead old pit open. Will the President of the Board of Trade take that point of view into account?

Mr. Heseltine: I understand the point that my hon. Friend has made. There is no doubt at all that it is one of the obligations of my Department to pursue energy policies that make competitive prices available to our manufacturing base and to domestic consumers.

Mr. Robin Cook: May I press on the President of the Board of Trade the points made by my hon. Friends about the extension of the period for enhanced redundancies? Is he aware that there is a view in many of the pits that he will not extend the deadline beyond 31 March so that he can pressure miners to make a decision immediately to leave the pits? If that happened, the Government could claim that the miners had taken voluntary rather than compulsory redundancy. Is the President of the Board of Trade aware that if he does not report on his review until the end of February, there will be only five weeks left until 31 March for those people to make important decisions about their future lives? Why does he not now have the confidence to say that, whatever the outcome of the review, the deadline will be extended if there are to be redundancies?

Mr. Heseltine: It is obvious that if one is conducting a wide-ranging review into all aspects of the pit closure programme in the context of our White Paper, the issue of subsequent redundancies and the terms of them must be part of that review. The redundancy terms are available until 31 March, and I hope that we shall have a debate in the House before that date.

Redundancies (Pendle)

3.32 pm

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing an urgent and important matter, namely,

"the 574 redundancies announced in Pendle yesterday."

Smith and Nephew is one of the largest employers in Pendle. Yesterday's decision to sack 574 people will reduce the work force by half in an area in which unemployment levels are already grotesquely high. We need to explore urgently any possible way of retrieving the position.

The matter is specific. It involves a decision of Smith and Nephew to pull out of denim manufacturing completely. That means that, when the decision is taken through, Britain will no longer be capable of producing denim cloth. That is staggering when one considers the number of fashion products that are made from denim cloth. I am not necessarily talking about imports from the far east. Forty per cent. of imports of denim cloth into the United Kingdom come from the European Community —Germany and Ireland—and from other high-cost producers such as the United States.

Why are we faced with a further contraction of the textile industry in my constituency? The issue is of national significance. The redundancies will have a devastating impact locally, but they will have an enormous impact throughout Lancashire where the textile industry is losing the critical mass to continue as an effective manufacturing industry.

The matter is of national significance because it will cost the Exchequer £5,166,000 in dole payments and social security payments to offset the cost to people who were gainfully employed. It is also of national significance because it throws into high relief the supine attitude of the Government to protect the textile industry in the GATT negotiations and their complacency to allow a vital part of the manufacturing industry to go down the pan. That is an important reason why we should have an urgent debate on the matter.

Madam Speaker: The hon. Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the 574 redundancies announced in Pendle yesterday."

I have listened carefully to what the hon. Member has said about the decision of Smith and Nephew to close its denim-making plant at Colne, with the loss of 574 jobs. I have to give my decision without stating any reasons. I am afraid that I do not consider that the matter which the hon. Gentleman has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 20 and I cannot, therefore, submit his application to the House.

Points of Order

3.35 pm

Mr. Graham Riddick (Colne Valley): May I ask for your guidance, Madam Speaker, on two issues relating to a matter which has recently come to my attention? I have notified the Members involved that I intended to raise the matter on the Floor of the House this afternoon. It has come to my attention that Sheffield city council subsidises the constituency offices of four Sheffield Members—the hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts)—[Interruption.]——

Madam Speaker: Order. The matter which the hon. Gentleman is raising with me arises under Standing Order No. 128, which provides for complaints relating to the registration of interests. That must be considered by the Select Committee on Members' Interests. I have to tell the hon. Gentleman, and any other hon. Member who might be interested in such matters in the future, that such complaints should not be made to me on the Floor of the House. The subject should be raised immediately with the Select Committee on Members' Interests. I ask the hon. Gentleman to take that course of action now.

Mr. Riddick: I am grateful to you for pointing that out to me, Madam Speaker; I take that point on board entirely. I wish to raise another issue on which I should like your guidance. I was going to point out that the Sheffield Members are being subsidised to the tune of——

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must accept my guidance.

Mr. Riddick rose——

Madam Speaker: Order. Is it a separate point?

Mr. Riddick: It is an entirely different point, Madam Speaker. I am pointing out, so that people may know the background, that Sheffield Members are being subsidised to the tune of £55,000——

Madam Speaker: Order. If the hon. Gentleman has a genuine point of order to raise with me, I am prepared to listen to it; but it must be directed to me.

Mr. Riddick: I should like to ask you for guidance on the propriety of Members of Parliament receiving additional public money for constituency offices.

Madam Speaker: Order. This is an abuse of the House. I ask the hon. Gentleman to resume his seat.

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. May I draw your attention to question 1 on the Order Paper today, tabled by the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson). The question refers to "the north". It became clear during his question that he was referring to the north of England, which is, of course, to the south of Scotland and largely to the south of Northern Ireland. I do not intend any criticism of the hon. Member for Hartlepool because I am sure that he used the word in shorthand, but perhaps when such questions are tabled and accepted people could look at them more closely so that they are not misleading.

Madam Speaker: I take the hon. Gentleman's point. I am sometimes guilty of regarding myself as coming from "the north" and representing "the midlands".

Mr. Joseph Ashton (Bassetlaw): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. For the second time this week a Conservative Member has launched a campaign against an Opposition Member. On Monday the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) attacked my hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) without telling him that she intended to refer to him.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn) is chairing the Select Committee on Trade and Industry and has asked me to speak on his behalf. He has been accused by the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick) when he cannot be here. It is a carefully chosen time. This is an orchestrated campaign. The protocol of the House is that Members should give notice that they intend to refer to other Members. This is a plot by Conservative Members.

Mr. Riddick rose——

Madam Speaker: Order. I shall hear no more on that matter. I have heard one point of order from either side, and I shall now move on.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. During Question Time a Minister used abusive and unparliamentary language, and I apologise for not telling him that I intended to raise the matter. At the time, you said that you were temporarily distracted and that you were sure that the remark was made in good humour. I must draw your attention to the fact that it was certainly not regarded as good-humoured. Will you reflect upon the possibility that Members, and especially Ministers, having hurled abusive remarks, will further abuse the system and defend themselves by pretending that it was done in good humour?

Madam Speaker: I said at the time that I was distracted, as I think the House could see. From the reaction of the House, it seemed to me that the remark was taken in jest, and I hope that the matter can rest there.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. May I ask for your general guidance about a matter that I wish to refer to one of the Committees of the House? At the weekend, 14 members of the Conservative party were accused by a member of the shadow Cabinet of having their votes bought——

Madam Speaker: Order. I must inform the hon. Gentleman that I do not give procedural advice across the Floor of the House. If he needs such advice, he should come to see me and he will be advised correctly.

Small Aircraft (Insurance)

3.41 pm

Mr. Anthony Coombs (Wyre Forest): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to require owners and operators of small aircraft to carry third-party insurance; and for connected purposes.

The measure is limited, but nevertheless is common sense and it is important, as it will fill a loophole in aviation law by requiring the operators and pilots of small and microlight aircraft to maintain minimum third-party or passenger liability insurance. That would lessen the consequences of accidents, provide security for people who live near aerodromes and have an impact on the irresponsible few who do not bother to take out third-party insurance.

During the past few years there has been a significant increase in the number of small aircraft, and of microlight aircraft in particular. The British Microlight Aircraft Association told me that it has 3,800 members with 3,500 machines and that the number is growing significantly all the time. The Civil Aviation Authority told me that it has 11,000 small aircraft on its register, 7,400 of which are relatively small and weigh less than 273 kg.

The growth of the sport is welcomed, especially in my constituency where a microlight airfield has grown up during the past year, provided that its environmental consequences can be controlled and local people can be assured that, should there be an accident, they are likely to be able to gain compensation, through insurance, from those responsible.

Under present legislation, the Civil Aviation Authority requires people who ply aircraft for hire or fly them for commercial purposes to have third-party insurance. The noble Lord Caithness recently told me that European Community licensing regulation 2407/92, which came into force in this country on 1 January, requires insurance for passengers, luggage, cargo, mail and third parties if operating licences are to be granted to people flying commercially. I also understand that gliders are required to have third party insurance. However, under present law, hobby flyers—people with small aircraft who do not ply them for hire—are not required to have any insurance for passenger liability or third parties. I believe that that should be put right.

There is no legal requirement to take out such insurance despite the fact that, according to the recent letter from Lord Caithness, section 76 of the Civil Aviation Act 1982 imposes upon pilots and fliers an absolute liability to pay compensation to people who are injured or where property is damaged on the ground as a result of their activities.

Thankfully, accidents are relatively rare. The CAA tells me that, since 1988, the average annual accident rate for aircraft weighing less than 2,301 kg, excluding microlight aircraft and helicopters, has ranged between 215 and 230. Those figures are relatively small, but, in absolute terms, they are significant. There are about 200 accidents a year involving microlight aircraft, of which between 10 and 30 are major ones and, in the past 10 years, they have caused, on average, between two and 10 fatalities a year.

In one sense, the Government recognise the problem because they have recently encouraged the CAA to distribute 10,000 copies of an updated leaflet on insurance which encourages fliers and owners to take out

"very substantial third party insurance for claims of up to £1 million or more."

[Mr. Anthony Coombs]

Despite that message and the logical demand that third-party insurance should be available, as it is for cars, for all aircraft, the Government have refused to act. They have refused to act despite demands for safety and the long-running campaign by the CAA—supported by the British Microlight Aircraft Association—for such insurance to be compulsory under statute. They have refused to act despite the fact that the vast majority of non-microlight owners and fliers and two thirds of microlight fliers take out some form of third party insurance—it is not terribly expensive and costs between £80 and £200 a year.

The Government's refusal to act now is based on their argument that to introduce a compulsory, statutory system of third-party insurance would be, again according to the letter from Lord Caithness, "administratively cumbersome and expensive." I do not believe that that is right, nor do the CAA and the British Microlight Aircraft Association.

The CAA has told me that it would be easy to introduce such insurance through its existing registration system for aircraft, which is updated annually. It would be easy to make that registration conditional upon proof of third party insurance. Similarly, the British Microlight Aircraft Association, on behalf of the CAA, has to grant a certificate of validation to individual microlights every year. The chief executive of that association literally told me a few moments ago that to combine third-party insurance certificates with its annual certificates of validation would be "administratively no problem at all." That refutes the argument of Lord Caithness that such a scheme would be "administratively cumbersome and expensive."

My Bill, whose scope is limited, is a common-sense measure, which would require people to have third-party insurance, possibly even passenger liability insurance. What fliers do to themselves in the course of pursuing their hobby is up to them, but the Government have a responsibility to ensure that their activities do not damagingly impinge on innocent parties who might otherwise be affected. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Anthony Coombs, Mr. Simon Burns, Dr. Kim Howells, Mr. Bob Dunn, Mr. David Porter, Mr. Keith Vaz, Ms. Estelle Morris, Mr. James Pawsey and Mr. Rod Richards.

SMALL AIRCRAFT (INSURANCE)

Mr. Anthony Coombs accordingly presented a Bill to require owners and operators of small aircraft to carry third-party insurance; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 19 February and to be printed. [Bill 116].

Orders of the Day

European Communities (Amendment) Bill

Considered in Committee [Progress, 19 January]

[MR. MICHAEL MORRIS in the Chair]

Clause 1

TREATY ON EUROPEAN UNION

Amendment proposed, [20 January], No. 6, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert

'(except Articles 126 and 127 on page 32 of Cm 1934)'.
—[Mr. Tony Lloyd.]

Question again proposed, That the amendment be made.

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Morris): I remind the Committee that with this we are also considering the following amendments: No. 193, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 3(p)'.

No. 199, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 57(2) on page 13 of Cm 1934'.

No. 212, in page, 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 127(2) on page 32 of Cm 1934'.

No. 365, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert 'except Article 57 as referred to in Article G on page 13 of Command Paper number 1934'.

No. 52, in page 1, line 10, after '1992', insert 'but not Article 126 in Title II thereof'.

Sir Richard Body: A number of important issues arise from the articles. I hazard a guess that you, Mr. Morris, selected some of the amendments, as they were of a probing nature. A number of questions arise which have not yet been put to the Minister. He may be aware of the article that appeared on 18 September last year in the journal Education, in which Mr. Delors was quoted. Anyone reading the quotation—no doubt many of those in the teaching profession did so—would have felt apprehensive about the Commission's intentions.

Mr. Delors clearly said that every European must—not ought to—have the same educational route. That seems to be a denial of the principle of subsidiarity. When my right hon. Friend replies to the debate, it would be helpful if he would say how he interprets those words, and how the Government's representative in the Council of Ministers, will react when proposals are made by the Commission in accordance with the powers that the Commission will soon be granted under the treaty—[Interruption.] Does my right hon. Friend the Minister wish to intervene?

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Tristan Garel-Jones): No.

The Chairman: Keep going.

Sir Richard Body: I hope that my right hon. Friend will say a little more about what he understands the term "education of quality" means, when linked, as it is in the context of one of the articles, with culture. Does my right hon. Friend agree that, the larger the country or unit, the lower standards of education tend to be? It was said last night that Scotland has, for a long time, had a tradition of providing higher standards of education than England.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): But it does not have higher educational standards than Northern Ireland, which has retained its grammar schools.

Sir Richard Body: We are treading old ground. We discussed that matter last night, and we must not go over old ground; otherwise you, Mr. Morris, will intervene—and we do not want that.

In both contemporary and historical terms, the smaller countries have given more to the world in terms of culture than the larger ones. That has been the case in our country both historically and in contemporary times, and there are a number of other such examples around the world. If we are to have common educational and cultural policies and schemes, there is a great danger that standards will fall, because culture and education should be judged qualitatively, not quantitively. That means value judgments, which can be made with unanimity only if there is some homogeneity—and that is manifestly lacking in Europe. It may always be lacking, because the great wealth of Europe is not material so much as the rich diversity of its culture. I hope that my right hon. Friend will deal with that point, and also assure us that he does not share the view of Mr. Delors Amendment No. 199 stands in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash), who, as the House knows, is suffering from flu. Unfortunately, he has not been able to be here as much as we or he would have wished. The amendment relates to article 57, paragraph 2. I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to one vital word—"shall". The paragraph says, "the Council shall". There is to be no option, no discussion; it is a mandatory instruction to the Commission to introduce legislation under article 189 of the treaty of Rome—which, as we all know, bypasses this House.

Yet again, we come to subsidiarity. How will my right hon. Friend or his successor judge such a serious matter in the Council of Ministers? Thousands, if not millions, of self-employed people in this country could be affected.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Does my hon. Friend again accept that paragraph 2 does not apply to everyone—there is no question of everyone being affected—but only to "natural persons"? Until we can get our right hon. Friend the Minister to explain what that means, we do not know what category or percentage of people will be covered by that paragraph.

Sir Richard Body: I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister will deal with that point. I also hope that he will deal with the matter of majority voting. Millions of self-employed people will have their lives redirected because of majority voting in the Council of Ministers. That is made perfectly clear in the first half of paragraph 2.

In the second half, after the full stop, there is a reference to unanimity. However, unanimity in a decision by the Council of Ministers appears to apply only if a member state has already introduced and passed legislation concerning the affairs of the self-employed. I hope that my right hon. Friend will deal with that point with some care. There are hundreds of self-employed people in his constituency, in mine and in all others. My constituents, like his, want to know where they stand.

Has my right hon. Friend investigated whether there is already on the statute book legislation concerning the self-employed that would enable us to veto any legislation proposed by the Commission under that article? The matter affects possibly millions of British people, so I hope that it has already been carefully considered by those who advise my right hon. Friend. I hope that they have the answers to my questions ready, and that they will have already briefed him on this important matter.

If the unanimity rule applies, should not we consider at this stage whether it would be wise to introduce legislation to safeguard the interests of the self-employed in future? Unless we do that fairly promptly, we shall, as I understand it, forgo any opportunity to veto legislation by the Council of Ministers governing the lives of our self-employed constituents.

Mr. Marlow: My hon. Friend is talking about training, but we are also concerned with education, and he will be aware that article 126(4) says that changes with regard to recommendation can be produced on the basis of a qualified majority but only on the basis of a proposal from the Commission. The Commission is in the driving seat. The Commission is the only——

The Chairman: Order. I made it clear yesterday that hon. Members should ask one succinct question. The hon. Gentleman has asked that.

4 pm

Sir Richard Body: As always, I agree with my hon. Friend. We have learnt that that is how the Commission works. That is how great quantities of legislation are churned out. That is the result of article 189 of the treaty of Rome. Those of us who opposed it many years ago may feel that our position was justified.

Amendment No. 212, also in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford, excludes article 127(2). There are important questions to be answered. That paragraph hands over to Brussels considerable activities concerning vocational training. We discussed some of the details at length last night, and I shall not repeat them. But one question above all arises, and that is that the article suggests that there should be co-operation between European countries on vocational training. That is a fine idea, which I support.

I am glad to see that the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, my right hon. Friend the Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones), is to reply. I want to ask him why on earth, all these years, we have failed to use the services offered for vocational training by the Economic Commission for Europe. As my right hon. Friend must know, it sits in Geneva and is in a position to do a great deal for Europe. When I say "Europe", I mean all Europe, not just 12 countries. The Economic Commission for Europe has around the table representatives of all 35 countries of Europe. It has the power and the mechanisms necessary to co-ordinate the activity which the Government now appear to consider desirable.

Why have we not used the Economic Commission for Europe? If my right hon. Friend is a true European, as I am, and therefore believes that Europe consists of 35 countries, not just 12, here is an opportunity to bring round the conference table and to co-operate with countries beyond the 12. Surely among them, just as much as among ourselves—more so, indeed—there is a need for such co-operation.

It is sad that the Foreign Office has put the brakes on the Economic Commission for Europe. If it had not been for its antipathy, I have not the slightest doubt that the Economic Commission for Europe could do a great deal more for the benefit of Britain and for all of Europe. I hope that, in reply, my right hon. Friend will explain why we have not been able to use the services of that European institution in recent years.

Amendment No. 365 is in the name of the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell). No doubt he will have various questions to ask if he catches your eye, Mr. Morris, but I shall ask just one.

The amendment would enable mutual recognition of various formal qualifications. In our language, "mutual" implies the existence of two parties. Does the wording mean that, within the Community, two countries may agree to recognise each other's qualifications, or does it mean much more than that—that qualifications will be agreed throughout the Community?

I shall not go over old ground, but it was pointed out last night that in some countries professional qualifications are of a lower standard. I hope that no lowering of standards will result. May we have an assurance about that and may we also be assured that, under the article—it is not a bad article, in my opinion—mutual recognition in the ordinary sense of the word will be possible? Many people in this country believe that we have much in common with certain other countries in regard to professional qualifications: I am thinking especially of Germany, Denmark and, of course, Ireland.

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills): Article 57 states:

> "In the case of the medical and allied and pharmaceutical professions, the progressive abolition of restrictions shall be dependent upon co-ordination of the conditions for their exercise in the various Member States."

Is it not interesting that, in matters of life and death, the absurd nonesense of trying to homogenise all the rules and regulations remains at the discretion of nation states? Should not that guiding rule apply to all recognitions of qualifications?

Sir Richard Body: As ever, I agree with my hon. Friend. I only hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister of State will agree as well; he is not quite a lost cause, but I am not over-optimistic about my chances of persuading him.

Amendment No. 52 also raises a number of questions. The phrase "quality education", for instance, seems to limit the concept of education. Why is that? Are we embarking on another value judgment, and is that judgment to be made in Brussels or elsewhere? Have we completely forgotten about the principle of subsidiarity? In the treaty, we ask Brussels to support my right hon. Friend in matters of education. What kind of support does he seek?

The article also contains the word "supplementary". What supplement is needed? Are we conceding to the Opposition Front Bench that much is lacking in the provisions for educational and vocational training? I hope that we shall be given a clear explanation of the meaning of the word, and of why it is used.

The article provides for an exchange of information. The Economic Commission for Europe already performs that function, and is willing to expand it in respect of 35 European countries. Why is such duplication necessary? The treaty uses the phrase "European dimension". Does it mean Europe in the true sense of all 35 countries, or does it mean only the 12? Surely we are missing an opportunity—the Economic Commission for Europe has the resources, facilities, expertise, mechanisms and committees already established but we are failing to use them. It is a criticism of the Government that they have failed to support the Economic Commission for Europe because, I fear, they are so besotted with what happens in Brussels.

Sir Teddy Taylor: My hon. Friend kindly referred to an amendment which I hope to move and to speak to shortly. Does he agree that the basic point, which I hope to illustrate, is that the words "quality of education" mean exactly what the Commission decides? In other words, it can introduce any directives as long as it believes that they refer to the quality of education. Basically, it can do what it likes, and it is a waste of time looking for a definition, because there is not one.

Sir Richard Body: I fear that my hon. Friend is right. As lawyers say, obiter dicta. Mr. Jacques Delors, whom I admire because he is frank and honest—unlike some others—has said that all Europeans must follow the same educational route, which is why I am suspicious of the fact that we are handing powers to Brussels. We may have better education as a result, but I would rather that we had our own education system and powers to decide our own practices. I fear that we are on the way to giving away that ability.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): The hon. Gentleman's comments on Mr. Delors will be echoed by many of my colleagues. Mr. Delors makes it perfectly clear what he, as President of the Commission, wants to do. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) should also be congratulated on making it clear that he wants a federal Europe, and that it is the pro-Maastricht people who are not so frank, especially those among the Tory Members, who should be condemned?

Sir Richard Body: The hon. Gentleman's last word is a strong one, and I would not wish to echo it. However, I too congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) on having spoken frankly in recent weeks. I can remember speeches that he made decades ago, when he spoke differently about what he saw for the future of Europe. We are not to know whether his views have changed in the intervening years, but I am glad that he is now frank about what he wants, and what I fear various hon. Members also want but which they are unwilling to state frankly to the British people.

I feel strongly about that. The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) may know that I was once a federalist——

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman is straying and being repetitive. I should be grateful if he would restrict his remarks specifically to the issues with which he was dealing.

Sir Richard Body: Of course I shall, Mr. Morris.

Perhaps my right hon. Friend the Minister of State will respond to my final point. The regional fund has been increased as a result of the Edinburgh summit from £10,000 million to £16,000 million, and it seems that this country will be eligible for an appreciable sum of money from that fund. We said last night that some of the proposals will be costly. Money must be found from somewhere, and I should like to ask my right hon. Friend whether we shall be able to tap in to some of the regional fund.

It is not a matter for pride that we are now proving eligible for regional fund money. Northern Ireland has received it in recent years, but when the regional fund was established, not only were we major contributors but no one at that time believed that our standard of living would fall so much that we should be entitled to make a claim.

Under objective 1, concerning the budget, regional fund money may be available if average earnings in an area are 75 per cent. of the Community average. Northern Ireland, at 76 per cent., is almost in that position, and it is disturbing to read that, in the highlands and islands, the figure has fallen from 98 per cent. to 78 per cent. I understand that the Commissioner for regional policy, Mr. Bruce Millan, whom we remember as a Member of the House, is holding a meeting today to find out whether the 75 per cent. ruling could be made more flexible.

4.15 pm

That is of some importance to this country, because many areas in the United Kingdom are drawing close to the 75 per cent. It may be a matter for some shame that our standard of living, and our average earnings, should be falling. Those areas of the United Kingdom include my constituency, because many hundreds of my constituents work in the gangs. They do casual work on the land, and many earn only £2 an hour, so manifestly they are earning 75 per cent. of the Community average. That is a matter for concern to my constituents, so I hope my right hon. Friend the Minister of State will give us a clear answer. If those figures for our average earnings are right, we shall be eligible for an appreciable slice of the £16 billion in the regional fund.

I submit to my right hon. Friend that vocational training should fall within that branch of the budget. It would equip many people to get jobs or to earn more, so would it not be appropriate for that part of the Community budget in the article to come under the regional fund? If so, does my right hon. Friend envisage areas of the United Kingdom becoming eligible, and will he say how he thinks we would spend that money? Would all schemes have to be approved by Brussels, or could we have some subsidiarity and tailor our schemes to our own needs?

I have put rather a long list of questions to my right hon. Friend, but they are important questions, because we shall not have many opportunities to debate this part of the treaty. I have studied it closely this morning, and I am horrified by the extent to which the Commission will attract to itself powers which the House will lose. The Government may not altogether lose those powers, because they will still be a member of the Council of Ministers, but the House will lose a great deal as a result of the two articles.

I hope that my right hon. Friend will give the assurances that we have sought, and will answer my questions.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): In one sense it is an unqualified pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body), because to do so means by definition that his speech must have come to an end. You recently uttered an amazing phrase, Mr. Morris—although I do not know whether it will find its way into the Official Report. When the Minister was talking to another of his hon. Friends, the hon. Member for Holland with Boston thought that his right hon. Friend was intervening in his speech, and you advised the hon. Member for Holland with Boston to "keep going". That was a brave thing to say, Mr. Morris, and I shall be interested to see whether it is duly recorded.

My remarks refer not so much to what the hon. Member for Holland with Boston said this afternoon, as to his speech last night. That substantial contribution reminded me of the boy who was sent to church on Sunday on his own. He came back a long time later, and his parents asked him, "What did the Minister talk about in his sermon?" The boy replied, "Well, daddy, he talked about sin." The boy's parents said, "You were away a long time, son. What did the minister say about sin?", to which the boy replied, "I think he's against it."

The hon. Gentleman talked about the amendment. I think that he is against the group of original provisions, but I do not know that we got much further than that. He said that this was his first contribution since the general election last April. I am sure that, their appetites having been whetted, the House of Commons and the country are looking forward to many more contributions from him during the passage of this Bill, as we deal with the entire ratification process.

Last night the hon. Gentleman said that he did not consider it at all appropriate for the Community to concentrate on vocational training and to do so to an even greater extent. Leaving Maastricht aside, I regard that as an astonishing observation. A number of years ago Parliament legislated for something called the single European market, with all that that implies. Is itnot a logical consequence of the single market that we must think about education and training, too, so that we may be as competitive as possible right across an integrated economy? It seems to me that that is a logical corollary of the Single European Act—never mind the signposts that the Maastricht treaty contains. I suppose, therefore, that I have a fundamental disagreement with the hon. Gentleman. I respect the position that he takes, but I cannot see eye to eye with him.

Sir Richard Body: Does the hon. Gentleman go as far as Jacques Delors, who, according to words that I quoted earlier, believes that every European must go along the same education route? It will be interesting to hear the Liberal party's view on that matter.

Mr. Kennedy: I have said that I regard myself as a good European. In so far as M. Delors was indicating that it makes sense for educational developments in one member state to take account of what is happening in other member states and to provide for a degree of integration —for reasons with which I shall deal later—he was talking extremely good sense. If the whole idea is that the European Community should become an economic engine capable of competing effectively, on a global basis, with the Pacific basin and with the single market that is being put together in north America, it makes sense to go in that direction.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Perhaps I can help my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body) by reminding him that article 126 states specifically that the Community must fully respect the responsibility of member states for the content of teaching and the organisation of education systems. In addition, it specifically rules out any harmonisation measures.

Mr. Kennedy: I am grateful to the Minister for his intervention, to which I should like to add a postscript.

Sir Teddy Taylor: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. Surely quotations from the treaty should be accurate. The Minister has said that article 126 contains the word "must". In fact, it does not.

The Chairman: That is not a matter for the Chair.

Sir Teddy Taylor: On a point of order, Mr. Morris.

The Chairman: Order. The matter that the hon. Gentleman has raised has nothing to do with the Chair.

Mr. Kennedy: I can see that the hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) is exercised about this matter. I expect that if the Minister catches your eye, Mr. Morris, he may want to deal directly with it—presumably to his hon. Friend's satisfaction, as the Opposition have observed is customary on these occasions.

On the basic point of principle, there has been a fair degree of paranoia and xenophobia—hysteria, indeed, though carefully controlled. The hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) made an impassioned speech, but I noticed, with professional respect, that his passion was well channelled. His attack was carried in "Yesterday in Parliament" this morning, so his views were communicated with some effect to the outside world.

What came through in the debate on culture and is now coming through in the debate on education is a degree of not only hostility, but downright paranoia about openness to other member states in the Community. I find that attitude especially perplexing in Conservatives and in Unionists. In the United Kingdom Parliament, whatever arguments we may have about constitutional reform within the United Kingdom, nobody can say that as a result of not only a common currency, but a common language and a common legal system—albeit with different traditions in different parts of the United Kingdom—the English, the Scottish and the Welsh have become indivisible and unrecognisable one from the other. We all know that that is not the case.

Why are Unionists, in the United Kingdom sense, of all people so worried about losing their sense of individualism and national character in the European Community? The Community is nowhere near as centralised or homogeneous as the set-up in the United Kingdom. I find that worry perplexing.

Mr. Marlow: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Kennedy: I will not because I want to make progress. We have listened to an immensely long speech and I do not intend to detain the House. Others wish to speak and there are other issues that we want to discuss this evening—the sooner the better.

It is encouraging to see greater emphasis being placed on vocational study as well as on non-vocational study. We very much support that. If we want an effective and well-resourced expansion of further and higher education, the emphasis being given to education at Community level acts as a good signpost for the United Kingdom. Some will say that the policy will cost money, which is a fair criticism to make when Opposition parties propose it.

I remind hon. Members that during the election, the Liberal Democratic party laid special emphasis on educational policy. We went further and said that we believed that the basic rate of income tax should increase by 1 per cent. to fund it. That was an example of the seriousness with which we approach—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body) does not seem to be terribly interested in listening to different viewpoints. He seems to display the lack of tolerance that he ascribes to every European country apart from our own.

The emphasis that the Liberal Democrats placed during the election on education in this country is an emphasis that we want to see at European level, too. That is why the provisions on education are so important and why we give them our support in this debate.

We want the provisions to go further, not least for tertiary education. In some ways Scotland has been more continental and more international in its outlook, not least in education. Scotland has looked to the continent of Europe. Scots are proud of that outlook, which has served us well. We now want to take the opportunity of the single market and of greater integration at European level to build on that outlook for the United Kingdom as a whole.

Schemes such as the Euro-credit transfer scheme, whereby Europewide credits can be obtained in universities across the Community, could contribute to a more flexible degree programme. I like to think that in years to come, more students will not only think of universities within the United Kingdom where they can pursue their educational endeavours, but will look automatically to other member states as well. That will broaden education and will become the norm rather than the exception, as it is at the moment.

Mr. Richard Shepherd: To which amendment is the hon. Gentleman addressing himself? I inquire so that I may relate his speech to the text and to the amendment.

Mr. Kennedy: I note that the hon. Gentlman did not raise that question during the two hours of verbiage that we heard last night. I am addressing in the main the group of amendments currently under debate, as the hon. Gentleman well knows. The amendments give rise to a variety of different, interlinked educational and training issues. That is perfectly legitimate.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): The hon. Gentleman has just said that he hopes that in future young people in this country, students and potential students, will look to a whole range of universities, not just within the United Kingdom. I endorse the view that he has expressed. I entirely agree with him. But would he not accept that a very large number of people from Europe and elsewhere in the world currently look to United Kingdom universities for their higher education and that this sector of education has a high reputation not just in Europe but throughout the world?

4.30 pm

Mr. Kennedy: Yes. If the hon. Gentleman looks in the record of the debate tomorrow, he will find that I made that point just about two minutes before I went on to make the point about the future. No one is decrying educational attainments and standards in this country. One is proud to say that in many cases we have centres of world excellence and we want to maintain and extend that. What I wish to add—I do not think that the hon. Gentleman disagrees with me on this point—is that this very excellence can be sustained and built on by those would-be graduates and graduates going through the system at present, gaining from their international experience, coming back to the centres in this country and enriching them as a result. That is something that we want to see developed and built on and it is something which this aspect of the treaty can help emphasise and give an impetus to. That must be a good thing.

The debate that we had yesterday on the importance of culture—the diversity of culture and the bringing forward of European culture in general—together with the emphasis in this section on education and training, is worth while. It bodes well for better understanding and greater harmony—harmony not in the technical sense of harmonisation, but in its proper meaning of understanding and comprehension between individual countries and between Europe and other parts of the world. It is something that, in principle, Liberal Democrat Members very much support. It is one aspect of the treaty that deserves a positive response, not the negative and at times xenophobic response that it has received from some hon. Members on the Government Benches, and we are happy to support it.

Mr. Marlow rose in his place and claimed to have, That the Question be now put, but The CHAIRMAN withheld his assent and declined then to put that Question.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Thank you very much, Mr. Morris.

Sir Teddy Taylor rose——

Mr. Garel-Jones: If I may be allowed just to enter upon my speech, I think that it will be of help to the Committee.

I begin by thanking the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) for opening the debate and for indicating to the Committee that amendment No. 6 is a probing amendment, the purpose of which has been to offer the Committee the opportunity to discuss the educational and vocational training aspects of the treaty. I shall try to respond to the invitation that the hon. Gentleman issued in opening the debate.

I shall also, as I proceed, seek to respond to some of the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) in his intervention last night, but I hope that he will forgive me—and I am sure that the Committee will—if I make a distinction in responding to amendments moved as probing amendments, to provide us with the opportunity for debate, and the amendment in the name of my hon. Friends the Members for Stafford (Mr. Cash) and for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) and the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell). You have guided us, Mr. Morris, with the help of the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton), in making it absolutely clear that no amendment selected by you is a wrecking amendment, and I accept that; but the amendments that my hon. Friends have moved and intend to press, if given the opportunity —and the Committee needs to be clear about this in other important debates that we are to move on to—would make the United Kingdom a non-ratificant country.

I know that it is offensive to many of my hon. Friends, but a consensus has now emerged in Britain about our membership of the Community. That does not mean that the Conservative Members agree with Opposition Members. Indeed, we are shortly to have a debate, in which our disagreements will be very sharp, about how we wish to use that Community, to shape that Community and to make our contribution to it. It is that consensus —that overwhelming consensus—which now exists in the House for our membership of the Community that I am seeking to address.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Garel-Jones: I will not give way just for a moment.

My hon. Friends will forgive me if I do not address every point that they have made in the detail that they would wish, because I understand, and the Committee understands, that their purpose is not the purpose of the Committee. Their purpose is to make the ratification of the treaty impossible. Let me give just one example.

My hon. Friends the Members for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body) and for Southend, East have made great play about the term "natural person". The Committee will understand that that is a matter of very great consequence. The term "natural person" is in the treaty of Rome, as amended by the Single European Act. Its meaning is perfectly clear. It seeks to make a distinction between a person, people and institutions or companies. I do not intend to detain the Committee by making copious reference to every point raised by my hon. Friends the Members for Southend, East and for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow), because their purpose is well known to the Committee.

Mr. Marlow: I will admit to my right hon. Friend that I do not want to see the treaty ratified, but I do not wish to leave the Community. I am sure that many of my hon. Friends would agree with me. I should be grateful if my right hon. Friend would not misrepresent us.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I do not think—the record will so reflect tomorrow—that I was presumptuous enough to say what are the ambitions of each and every one of my hon. Friends and, indeed, Opposition Members so far as Britain's future in the Community is concerned. That is not for me to say. I simply make the point that there is a difference, it seems to me, between those who wish to ratify the treaty and those who do not. It is courteous of me to address the overwhelming majority in the Committee who wish to debate these matters in a ratificant mode.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: I am most grateful to my right hon. Friend for the courtesy that he is showing in his response to the debate. Several times he has referred to the overwhelming consensus in the Committee supporting the——

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Put it to the test.

Mr. Winterton: Will the hon. Gentleman please give me time?

Although my right hon. Friend assumes that the Committee overwhelmingly backs the ratification of Maastricht, does he accept that one of the vital constitutional purpose of the House of Commons of Westminster is to represent the interests of the people of the United Kingdom? Will he therefore perhaps be more understanding of the role of those Conservative Members whom he describes as Euro-sceptics? We are doing precisely that. We should be only too happy if my right hon. Friend were to say, "We are prepared to give the people of this country, not just the House of Commons, an opportunity to express their views on the Maastricht treaty."

The Chairman: Order. I hope that the Minister will not be tempted down that route. There are later amendments on that topic.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I have already said, Mr. Morris, as you have reminded the House, that there are amendments on a referendum, and I look forward with considerable relish to dealing with them with the hon. Member for Macclesfield. So far as Euro-scepticism is concerned, I do not describe the hon. Member as a Euro-sceptic. To the extent that I would give him a description, it would be "Euro-nihilist". I regard myself and every right-thinking person in Britain as sceptical about the Community, as we should be sceptical about the Community. We should also be sceptical about Whitehall, the Government and any institution that is funded by the taxpayer. It is our duty to——

Mr. Marlow: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. I wonder whether you could clear up a matter for me. I shall be brief. My right hon. Friend said that he is prepared to address the arguments of those who are in favour of the treaty, but that he is not prepared to address the arguments of those who do not want to see the treaty ratified. Is that a proper process?

The Chairman: That is not a matter for the Chair.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I will now make some progress in my speech.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Garel-Jones: May I simply respond to my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North. I think that the Committee will thank me for this. I do not think it is possible to respond in detail to every point made. [HON. MEMBERS: "Why not?"] I shall say why not in a moment, if I am allowed to make some progress. Unlike my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston, who made a lengthy speech yesterday, I am not under written instructions from anybody about how long I should take with my speech. I shall make my speech in my own time, and I shall respond to those points that I believe are worthy of response.

Mr. Roger Knapman (Stroud): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Sir Teddy Taylor: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Garel-Jones: No, I will not give way for a moment. As the Committee will be aware, co-operation on education between the member states of the European Community and the Commission is nothing new. In 1976, the member states agreed to a programme of intergovernmental co-operation in education outside the scope of the treaty of Rome.

Mr. Knapman: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. In the past few minutes, my right hon. Friend said that our purpose is to debate the question whether to ratify the treaty. Does that mean——

The Chairman: Order. If the hon. Gentleman raises a point of order, it must be something on which I can rule. I cannot rule on the content of speeches from any hon. Members unless they are out of order. So far, nothing has been out of order. What exactly is the point on which I am to rule?

Mr. Knapman: Does that mean that the House has any opportunity to amend the treaty? If what my right hon. Friend is saying is correct, we are not here to amend the treaty; we are here for a canter around the course.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows full well that we have many days ahead of us. If he uses a little ingenuity, he may find that further amendments are possible, but I cannot decide that until he puts them in writing.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The co-operation has comprised non-binding resolutions, exchanges of information and experience and pilot studies. One outcome has been the establishment of a working group to exchange ideas about teaching the European dimension in schools. The most recent fruit has been the establishment of a small programme of school partnerships. Schools throughout the Community have been brought together to pursue projects. Twenty-three British schools are involved. I am sure that the pupils in those schools will receive an invaluable insight into Europe.

In addition to such intergovernmental co-operation, the Community's education programmes, ERASMUS, LINGUA and COMETT, have been adopted under articles 128 and 235 of the treaty. They have produced substantial benefits for universities in the United Kingdom. COMETT has helped United Kingdom universities to link up with industry across Europe, LINGUA has assisted with the teaching of foreign languages and ERASMUS has enabled more than 25,000 United Kingdom students to spend part of their time at university studying abroad. The Committee will be pleased to know that the United Kingdom is a leading—often the leading—participant in all of those programmes.

Mr. Richard Shepherd: On that point, will my right hon. Friend give way?

4.45 pm

Mr. Garel-Jones: Not yet.

At Maastricht, it was accepted that amending the treaty of Rome to insert an education article was the logical next step in building on the co-operation. This treaty will put the co-operation between member states on a firm footing. It will clearly distinguish between those areas in which the Community can assist the member states and those in which it should not be involved. That is an important development, because the potential scope of the existing article 128 on training is both unclear and unlimited and has given good grounds for considerable anxiety on both sides of the House.

I want to clear up the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East made. The treaty article explicitly enshrines the principle of subsidiarity in education. My hon. Friend was right to jump up, because it might not have been clear to Hansard exactly at which point the quotation marks come in. The quotation marks come in after the word "fully". Article 126 mentions the Community

"fully respecting the responsibility of the Member States for the content of teaching and the organisation of education systems and their cultural and linguistic diversity."

In addition, any harmonisation of the laws and regulations of member states is expressly ruled out. There is thus no possibility of Community interference in, for example, the national curriculum.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Garel-Jones: Not for the moment.

The Community will be limited to adopting incentive measures——

Mr. Richard Shepherd: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Garel-Jones: When I have made my point, I will give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills.

The Community will be limited to adopting incentive measures, such as the exchange and co-operation programmes already adopted, and making non-binding recommendations. The treaty envisages Community activity in matters with a genuine transnational character: for example, teaching the languages of the member states, exchanges of information and experience, distance education, and so on. The enthusiasm of our schools and universities to become involved in European projects and programmes is ample evidence of the benefits that they see in European co-operation. With the boost of article 126, they are set to benefit even more.

Mr. Shepherd: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Garel-Jones: I am about to finish my point and then I shall give way to my hon. Friend.

As I have already said in passing, Community activity in training is well established. The existing article 128 provides for the Community to lay down general principles for implementing a common vocational training policy.

The new treaty provision constitutes an improvement for two main reasons; this is a point of which I am anxious for the Committee to be aware. First, the voting base is changed from simple majority to qualified majority voting. That is an improvement on the position under the treaty of Rome, as amended by the Single European Act. It will increase the control of member states over Council decisions and will allow member states to wield much greater influence over the control of the training budget. Secondly, the new treaty text states that the Council

"shall adopt incentive measures, excluding any harmonisation of the laws and regulations of the Member States."

As for the new education article, the treaty specifically rules out any attempt by the Community to impose on member states training strategy common elements that take no account of their diversity. That is a welcome change. It respects subsidiarity and is a substantial improvement for member states over the position that pertained under the treaty of Rome as amended by the Single European Act.

Mr. Shepherd: My question for information arises out of an earlier comment in which my right hon. Friend outlined the ways in which the Community attempts to influence education policy in the Community. My right hon. Friend may recall that, at a conference in Madrid recently, Dr. Lenarduzzi argued that there was no authority under the treaty of Rome for such excursions. If that is right, what is the authority by which the member states are expending money to influence educational projects?

Mr. Garel-Jones: In a sense, that is my point. I did not have the pleasure of attending the conference in Madrid with my hon. Friend. One of the anxieties that we have felt is that the Commission has sought to insert itself into education through the training article in an inappropriate way. There are some areas in which we want the Commission to insert itself. However, we believed that it was right to define and limit what the Community could and could not do.

If my hon. Friend read the five or six tirets in paragraph 2 of article 126, he would find that most of our fellow citizens would prefer to promote co-operation between educational establishments. In the United Kingdom, 25,000 schoolchildren already benefit from such programmes. So these are worthy programmes which supplement and complement what we are doing in the United Kingdom. That is why it is important to make the distinction between the overwhelming majority of the Committee, who are in favour of the treaty, and the small but perfectly honourable and respected minority who see a phantom in every line and a ghost in every article. That view is not shared by any political party in the House; nor is it shared by the overwhelming majority of our fellow citizens.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): This was a probing amendment. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Hon. Members: No.

Amendment accordingly negatived.

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): I beg to move amendment No. 7, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert
'(except Article 123 on page 31 of Cm 1934)'.

The Chairman: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 127, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert
'(excluding Article G D(10) on page 12 of Cm 1934).'.
No. 129, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert
'(excluding Article G D(12) on page 13 of Cm 1934).'.
No. 186, in page 1, line 9, after 'II', insert
'except Article 3(i) on page 9 of Cm 1934'.
No. 58, in page 1, line 10, after '1992', insert
'but not the Protocol concerning Article 119 of the Treaty establishing the European Community'.
No. 27, in page 1, line 13, after 'Community', insert
', with the exception of the Protocol on Social Policy'.

Dr. Cunningham: Amendment No. 7 is a probing amendment which we intend ultimately to withdraw.

Mr. Michael Spicer (Worcestershire, South): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Cunningham: No. I shall not give way as I have just begun to speak.

I shall address my remarks to amendment No. 27 on which, in due course, we shall press the Committee to a vote. Amendment No. 27 states:
"Clause 1, page 1, line 13, after 'Community', insert ', with the exception of the Protocol on Social Policy'.
I shall address my remarks to that protocol and the importance to the Labour party of the social chapter.

The Bill keeps the United Kingdom outside the scope of the protocol on social policy, so excluding the United Kingdom from the social chapter. It prevents the people of the United Kingdom from being part of the full social dimension of the European Community. The Bill excludes Britain from provisions which our 11 partners have agreed to facilitate greater protection for employed people in their working conditions, better rights of consultation and information, equality of treatment and opportunity for men and women, and the integration into the labour force of long-term unemployed people, including disabled workers. Those benefits will flow to the citizens of the 11 other members of the Community, but will be denied to the people of our country by the actions of the Conservative Government.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way and particularly grateful—as is the Committee—that he has said that amendment No. 7 is a probing one.

Will he give the Committee and those of his hon. Friends who sit below the Gangway the benefit of his view on one issue? He said that the Labour party will press amendment No. 27 to a Division if it is called. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that, under the terms of the amendment, United Kingdom law would not conform to the treaty's provisions, so it would be impossible for the United Kingdom to ratify the treaty—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I am grateful to my hon. Friends.

We have just seen on the closure motion—thanks to the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd)—the majority that exists in the Committee in favour of ratification. Will the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) explain to his hon. Friends and other interested hon. Members why the Labour party intends to press amendment No. 27 to a vote?

Dr. Cunningham: Yes, I can simply and willingly explain that to the Committee. As the right hon. Gentleman well knows, I would not move the amendment on behalf of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) and my other hon. Friends if we did not fully understand its implications. Those implications would be to remove the protocol on social policy, which refers to the exclusion of the social chapter from the treaty. That would require Her Majesty's Government to negotiate with the other 11 Community members.

The solution to the problem would be for an agreement to emerge that folded the social chapter into the treaty, thus benefiting Britain and the British people, as well as the other 11 Community members. Of course I recognise that that would present Her Mjesty's Government with a dilemma, but we have taken the precaution to check that the other 11 member states would be happy for that outcome to obtain.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The hon. Gentleman admits that there is what he refers to as a problem. Will he confirm that that problem—as he describes it—is that the United Kingdom is not in a position to ratify the treaty? Furthermore, will he give the Committee the information that he says he has on the views of other member states?

Dr. Cunningham: I do not agree with that intervention, any more than I agreed with the right hon. Gentleman's first intervention. The problem is one for Her Majesty's Government, and there is a simple solution to it. The solution would be to include the social chapter in the treaty and approve it and for the citizens of our country to receive all the manifest benefits which flow from the social chapter and which will be enjoyed by the citizens of the other 11 member states.

While we are on the subject, Her Majesty's Government alone—the British Conservative party alone of political parties in the Community—have decided to exclude the social chapter and its benefits from application in the United Kingdom. No other party, in or or out of Government, in the European Community supports the position of Her Majesty's Government. No applicant Government for membership of the European Community supports the position of Her Majesty's Government. The European employers organisation does not support the position of Her Majesty's Government. Therefore, the isolation of the British Conservative Government in Europe on the issue is absolute. They should regard that not as a badge of honour but as a badge of shame against Britain.

Mr. Marlow: I merely make an innocent observation. My right hon. Friend is trying to put the wind up and the frighteners on the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), but I can tell the hon. Member for Copeland that if there is anything that I dislike more than the Maastricht treaty, it is the social contract.

Dr. Cunningham: I am not absolutely fazed by that intervention. Perhaps I should apologise to the Minister and the Committee for a slight error earlier. There is one other political party in Europe that supports the position of the British Conservatives: Mr. Jean-Marie Le Pen and the French neo-facist party. I hope that the Government feel comfortable in his company.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman and I promise that I shall not intervene further. I shall comment later on the supposed merits of the matter. However, the question remains and the hon. Gentleman must answer it—does the amendment place the British Government in the position of being a non-ratificant? One thing that we wear as a badge of honour is the support of the British people. We obtained the support of the British people, not least because of the exclusion from the provisions of the social protocol which we obtained for Britain. I recommend to the hon. Gentleman and his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) that, when we next face the British people, they do not promise to import that pernicious protocol into our law.

5.30 pm

Dr. Cunningham: I hope that the right hon. Gentleman is not asking me to apologise for placing the Government in a predicament. I thought that that was one of the principal roles and duties of the Opposition. Of course, the Government will be placed in a predicament—that is exactly our intention. However, we are also offering a clear and unambiguous way out—which is to embrace the social chapter, as every other Government in the European Community have done. That is the purpose of our amendment—a wholly beneficial purpose—which is well intentioned and motivated. It has overwhelming support throughout the European Community and we make no apology for it.

[Dr. Cunningham]

Article 2, paragraph 6, of the social chapter states:

"The provisions of this Article shall not apply to pay, the right of association, the right to strike or the right to impose lock-outs."

Article 3, which provides for agreements to be made between management and labour at the Community level, was promoted by the joint initiative from the employers' organisation UNICE and the European Trades Union Congress. There is no question of such agreements superseding the Commission, the Council of Ministers or member Governments by altering trade union or strike laws.

I have said all that to remove another canard from the Government's argument: that, somehow, if the social chapter were adopted and applied in Britain, it would set back the clock and reverse the decisions of the House on industrial legislation and wage bargaining. That is a wholly false argument, and it always has been.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): Earlier in his speech, the hon. Gentleman assured the House that he had the approval of all the other member Governments for the approach that he has adopted on behalf of the Opposition. As that would be a gross interference in domestic politics, which is outside Community regulations, can he explain in detail exactly what he meant?

Dr. Cunningham: As the hon. Gentleman is usually critical of the Labour party for not being sufficiently pro-European, I regard his intervention as pathetic. First, he clearly was not listening to what I said, so he misrepresented my remarks. Secondly, we are confident that other member Governments would be happy to renegotiate the matter to include the social chapter in the treaty. I stand by those remarks.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Dr. Cunningham: No, I shall not give way at the moment.

From the outset, it has been the purpose of the Conservative party and the Government to erect a bogus case, to pretend to slaughter a paper tiger, to perpetrate a squalid fraud on the British people and to promote the Prime Minister as some sort of pathetic hero tilting at the windmills of the distressed minds in his own party on social and employment policy issues. It has been a charade —a squalid fraud—to cover the real impact of the provisions of the social chapter.

I shall revert for a few moments to the social charter, which expresses fundamental principles relating to 12 major themes. They are: free movement of workers based on the principles of equal treatment in access to employment and social protection; employment and pay to be based on the principle of fair remuneration; improved living and working conditions; social protection based on the rules and practices proper to each country; freedom of association in collective bargaining; vocational training; equal treatment for men and women; information, consultation and participation of workers; protection on health and safety in the workplace; protection of children and adolescents; the guarantee of minimum living standards for elderly people; and improved social and professional integration for disabled people. Those are the 12 main objectives of the social charter.

Of course, the charter itself has no force in law, but it provided the initial political impetus for an action programme of specific measures which was drawn up by the European Commission and which was before the Council at its Strasbourg meeting. The social chapter was based on the provisions of the social charter.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Can my hon. Friend confirm that the treaty, as it now stands, not only discriminates against workers in this country, but formalises the discrimination shown within the European Community to immigrant workers? In terms of the free mobility of workers and their families, there are two classes of people—the citizens of Europe and the immigrant workers and their families. That discrimination is formalised in the treaty.

Dr. Cunningham: I agree with my hon. Friend.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): Will the hon. Gentleman give way on that point?

Dr. Cunningham: No. I have already given way four or five times, so the hon. Gentleman can hardly complain if I do not give way now.

Just as they declined to support the social charter, the Government refused to agree to a chapter on social policy being included in the body of the treaty on European union and European economic and monetary union agreed by the European Council in Maastricht in December 1991. The purpose of our amendment is to reverse that decision.

What was said at that time was set out in the protocol, which made Britain's position clear. It stated:

"The United Kingdom . . . shall not take part in the deliberations and the adoption by the Council of Commission proposals made on the basis of this Protocol and the abovementioned Agreement . . . Acts adopted by the Council and any financial consequences other than the administrative costs entailed for the institutions shall not be applicable to the United Kingdom".

In other words, although Britain is opting out and denying the benefits of the chapter to our people, we are still expected to pay our share of the costs of European Community activities.

Mr. Wells: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the difference between him and many other members of the Committee is that we believe that matters of vital concern to all the people of this country are properly and naturally the concern of the House and the country? They should not be imposed on us by the European Community through the social chapter. Is he further aware that if he manages, by chance, to get the social chapter included in the treaty, he will undoubtedly find that there will be no majority among Conservative Members to ratify the treaty, with the result that the whole treaty will be lost?

Dr. Cunningham: I agree with little, or even none, of the hon. Gentleman's remarks. I would be more persuaded of the force of his argument if there was some evidence on the Conservative Benches of a liberal approach to social and employment policies. I do not regard the abolition of the wages councils, which provide protection for the poorest and lowest-paid people in our communities, as liberal social and employment policies. Therefore, I do not agree with that part of the hon. Gentleman's intervention. I certainly do not agree with the second part, in which he suggested that somehow decisions on such matters would be taken away from the jurisdiction of this House. If it is so important to have a level playing field under the Single European Act for business, industry and commercial development, why is it so wrong to have a level playing field in social and employment policies?

The agreement appended to the protocol states, among other things:

> "the Community shall support and complement the activities of the Member States in the following fields:
> —improvement in particular of the working environment to protect workers' health and safety;
> —working conditions;
> —the information and consultation of workers;
> —equality between men and women with regard to labour market opportunities and treatment at work;
> —the integration of persons excluded from the labour market".

It continued:

> "To this end, the Council may adopt, by means of directives, minimum requirements for gradual implementation, having regard to the conditions and technical rules obtaining in each of the Member States."

Mr. Stephen Milligan (Eastleigh): May I pursue the matter raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes)? The hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) said that he understood that the other 11 countries were happy to renegotiate with regard to the social chapter. But does he have information that the other 11 countries are prepared to restart their entire ratification processes and, in the case of Ireland and France, to hold new referendums to accommodate the hon. Gentleman?

Dr. Cunningham: The hon. Gentleman does not seem to understand what is going on. The other 11 countries have already accepted the social chapter. They do not need to reopen their ratification processes. If he does not understand that, he does not understand much about what has been going on in the past few months in the rest of the Community.

The agreement refers in particular to the need to take measures to promote equal opportunities and to the role that trade union and employers' organisations can play in reaching agreements that help to give effect to the aims of the social chapter.

Finally, on the EC-wide aspects of the matter, the social policy was on the agenda at the Edinburgh summit at the conclusion of the British presidency. We just need to remind the House and our fellow citizens what was decided there. Part A, annex 2, of the conclusions of the Edinburgh summit says:

> "Turning to social policy, the Commission considers that the group of directives based on article 118 of the treaty is too recent to warrant re-examination."

There are no prizes for guessing which member state was asking for re-examination. It goes on:

> "Furthermore, instead of re-examination its priority will be to supplement them by implementing all the provisions of the chapter of the fundamental social rights of workers."

That is the most recent view of our Community partners on this nexus of issues.

The Labour party agrees with our European partners that the primary source of Community strength, the single most important element in our wealth creation, is people —the working men and women of Europe. That is why we see the social chapter as an integral part of the Maastricht treaty. That is why the development of common basic standards for people at work is central to our vision of a future Europe.

As I have already pointed out, we do not want Europe simply to be a marketplace; it must be a developing community. Progress is not just about economic and industrial development; it is about associated social and employment policy developments, too, and social justice. A civilised society is measured not just by its wealth but by the treatment of its citizens.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): I agree wholeheartedly that Europe is more than just an economic unit. Does the hon. Gentleman accept that all the noises that we hear from the Conservative Benches on the narrow economic and market issues are usually noises in favour of a level playing field, yet in this one instance Conservative Members are trying to get preferential treatment at the expense of ordinary working people?

Dr. Cunningham: I am delighted to be able to agree absolutely with the hon. Gentleman's intervention.

For people throughout the Community, the social chapter offers the prospect of a platform of basic rights —the right to decent working conditions, the right to be consulted about changes that affect them and the right to protection against bad employers. It places individual employees on a par with their employers, empowering them to demand fair treatment and real participation in the workplace. All that is opposed by the Government and their supporters on the Conservative Benches.

Britain's Conservative Government have chosen to opt out of the social chapter and that is entirely consistent with their indifference to the rights of ordinary people, their disregard for decent working standards and their determination to empower no one but themselves. As I have said already, it is consistent with their callous decision to abolish wages councils, the last remaining defence of many low-paid workers against exploitation.

As my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition did on a previous occasion, I shall quote what Winston Churchill once had to say about that.

> "When you have no organisation, no parity of bargaining, the good employer is undercut by the bad and the bad employer is undercut by the worst. Where these conditions prevail you have not a condition of progress but a condition of progressive degeneration."

Someone on low pay in Britain will now no longer be offered legal protection even at that level. It is the economics of the sweatshop and it should have no place in a civilised society.

5.45 pm

Opting out of the social chapter is saying that we should compete with Taiwan on price rather than compete with Germany or France on quality. We will never attract investment on the basis of low wages; we will attract investment only on the basis of the high skills, proficiency and productivity of our working men and women. The best aids to that efficiency and productivity are good working conditions, safe workplaces, good controls on working practices and health and safety and the involvement of the work force in discussion of those matters.

Opting out of the social chapter goes against that which is clearly understood everywhere else in the Community —that the future has to be in high-quality, high-productivity industry and services. That means training, investment and proper rewards for the people who work in those industries and services.

Labour wants Britain to be able to stand alongside our European partners and say that we are proud of our work force and that we treat them with the respect and dignity that they have earned and deserve. That is why our major objective for the proceedings on the Maastricht Bill will be to reverse the opt-out on the social chapter.

Mr. Marlow: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Cunningham: If the hon. Gentleman must.

Mr. Marlow: It is a fairly important point. It is the difference between our two parties. The hon. Gentleman seemed to imply that people considering investment in the United Kingdom are not concerned about employment costs. If so, he is living in Mickey Mouse land.

Dr. Cunningham: No, I am not suggesting that at all. I am suggesting that, in addition to employment costs, of course, people considering investment in the United Kingdom are concerned about the ability and skills of our working people. Increasingly, Britain is being left behind, first because of disinterest and, secondly, as a previous Conservative Chancellor of the Exchequer said, because our ambition is not a high-tech economy, or a low-tech economy, but a no-tech economy. That was his ambition for British industry.

If the hon. Gentleman thinks that such an approach to the future of our economy, with the kind of balance of payments deficit and public sector borrowing requirement that we have, is the way forward for Britain, he must be living in cloud cuckoo land.

To its credit, the organisation of employers in the EC supports the provisions of the social chapter. In an exchange with my hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair), speaking for us on employment matters on the issue, the director of social affairs at the UNICE said:

"The procedure in articles 118A and 118B of the annex is a means of recognising the autonomy of the social partners and of introducing an obligation to consult them on any Commission proposals in the social field. It also introduces a mechanism to realise any agreement of the social partners to be used if they so desire.

Our clear understanding is that Articles 118a and 118b cannot be used in any way connected with laws relating to strikes or unions, and in any event we would not agree to any agreement which did have such effect."

That—very clearly and succinctly—blows the Government's whole fraudulent case out of the water. It has been rejected not by the Government's political opponents, or by Governments in other countries, but by the European employers' organisation. That statement by the UNICE was, and is, supported by the Confederation of British Industry: even on home territory. The Government's posture is not supported. Who, then, supports the Government?

Mr. Garel-Jones: The British people.

Dr. Cunningham: We have to keep reminding the right hon. Gentleman that the Government were not elected by the majority of British people, even in the most recent general election. Even that claim does not bear simple examination.

No one supports the Government's position—not any Government of any political persuasion in the Community; not any applicant for Community membership, such as Norway, Sweden, Finland or Austria; not the European employers; not the European Parliament; not even the Conservative Members of the European Parliament. They were obliged to sign a declaration in support of the social chapter on joining the European People's party: therefore, their isolation is virtually complete. Given the attitudes of Mr. Jean-Marie Le Pen, I suspect that they wish that they did not have his support.

Had not the social chapter been denied to the British people, I—along with many of my right hon. and hon. Friends—could have supported the Bill. We shall continue to press, at every opportunity, for Britain's acceptance of the social chapter: it is right for the British people and for our country. A future Labour Government will immediately sign the social charter and move for the implementation of the social chapter in Britain. That is why we shall not jeopardise the future of this aspect of the Maastricht treaty, which is fundamentally important to our European partners, and that is why I intend to press the amendment to a vote.

Mr. Iain Duncan-Smith (Chingford): I wish to concentrate on amendment No. 27.

On Second Reading, which seems a very long time ago, I expressed anxiety about the status of the European Court and about its ever-increasing power, which I believe is enhanced by this treaty. Let me say at the outset that I consider the attitude of the Opposition Front Bench to be wholly cynical. Its real reason for wishing to incorporate the social chapter is the fact that it has lost all hope that a socialist party will ever be returned to power in this country. It needs all the assistance that it can find to ensure that someone else can do its dirty work for it.

On Second Reading, I congratulated my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Minister of State on their skilful negotiation of a position that excluded this country from the social chapter. Since then, I have examined the treaty more carefully, and I now believe that the social chapter is no longer relevant. The treaty covers a series of open doors through which many of the intentions of the social chapter may well be introduced. Although I still admire my right hon. Friends' negotiating skills, I do not believe that that is the end of the story.

Under amendment No. 27, the existing provisions on social policy contained in the treaty of Rome would be subject to significant interpretation, according to the new objectives set out in article 2. They include "social cohesion and solidarity". For example, article 118a of the treaty of Rome—which concerns the working environment, and the health and safety of workers—would have to be interpreted in the light of article 2 of the Maastricht treaty, and of article 3j, which specifies

"the strengthening of economic and social cohesion"

as a Community activity. Paragraph 1 of article 118a of the treaty of Rome states:

"Member States shall pay particular attention to encouraging improvements, especially in the working environment as regards the health and safety of workers, and shall set as their objective the harmonisation of conditions in this area, while maintaining the improvements made."

Article 118a is subject to qualified majority voting. The provisions on page 31 of the Maastricht treaty bring majority voting in that context into line with the new common operating procedures of article 189c, which—along with article 189b—specify the way in which qualified majority voting is to be handled.

There is currently much talk of a new Community directive on a 48-hour working week. That directive is based on article 118a, and is therefore likely to be subject to majority voting. If it were agreed, Britain would have to comply with its provisions or face action against it in the European Court of Justice. Our opt-out from the social chapter will not help us in that regard.

The protocol on social policy clearly states—this is important, because it divorces the social chapter from the main body of the treaty—

"this protocol and . . . Agreement are without prejudice to the provisions of this Treaty, particularly those relating to social policy which constitute an integral part of the 'acquis communautaire.'"

It is clear that whether we have signed up to the social chapter is irrelevant; we are already obligated to the parts of the treaty that we have already signed up to.

If we were taken to the European Court of Justice for failing to comply with that Community directive, how could I reassure business men in my constituency of Chingford that they would not find themselves at a considerable disadvantage as a result of the court's ruling, given the extra cost implications? The court would be likely to follow precedents established by previous rulings.

The court's ruling in the sex discrimination case of Defrenne v. SABENA in 1976 is important, as it gives a clear indication of the way in which the court would rule in this instance. On that occasion, the court ruled "to avoid a situation in which undertakings established in States which have actually implemented the principle of equal pay have suffered a competitive disadvantage in intra-Community competition as compared with undertakings established in States which have not yet eliminated discrimination against women workers".

It is therefore already interpreting in the light of how the majority of the Community is likely to have worked.

Mr. Geoffrey Hoon (Ashfield): Is the hon. Gentleman saying that he does not accept the conclusion in that case, which provided for equal treatment for men and women throughout the European Community? Is he saying that the court was wrong to decide as it did?

6 pm

Mr. Duncan-Smith: If the hon. Gentleman will bear with me, I am developing a case; I am not judging whether the court was right or wrong in that particular case or with regard to sex discrimination in general. I am trying to prove that the aspects of the treaty which are justiciable from the European Court's point of view will lead the court and other countries to start introducing many of the elements in the social chapter from which we have opted out. I cited the ruling merely as an example of the court's thinking in terms of the acquis communautaire.

The Defrenne decision was based on the same title of the treaty of Rome dealing with social policy as the 48-hour working week directive with which we are threatened. Sex discrimination in fact falls under the following article, article 119.

There is powerful evidence that the court would rule that Britain was enjoying an unfair competitive advantage if it did not comply with the 48-hour directive which was in force in other member states. If there is the slightest doubt, it is wholly removed by title II of the Maastricht treaty, because the European Court of Justice would interpret article 118a under the new objectives of article 2, which are "social cohesion and solidarity". That is an important phase. The new objectives would be subject to interpretation under the commitments to which we have already agreed in article 5 of the treaty of Rome, which is an important and powerful article.

Mr. Marlow: I am perhaps looking to my hon. Friend for legal rather than political advice. The Committee has been told many times that social cohesion has to do with the expenditure of funds in the poorer areas of the Community and nothing to do with social policy. Is my hon. Friend sure that the court would interpret it in that way? Under the new article 118a(2), the impositions under majority voting would have to have regard to the "conditions and technical rules obtaining in each of the Member States".

To what extent would that be a safeguard?

Mr. Duncan-Smith: My hon. Friend makes an interesting and important point. I believe that "social cohesion" and "solidarity" must be taken together. The European Court must eventually have regard to the spirit underlying all the articles and, bearing in mind what is best for the majority of the Community, decide how the rest are proceeding and why there is some deviation. Essentially, I believe that the answer to my hon. Friend's question is that the court would not necessarily rule in our favour.

I give a specific example of article 5 being interpreted by the court to impose continuing obligations on member states. In Cullut v. Centre Leclerk in 1985, the court ruled that member states are allowed to adopt measures which would undermine the effectiveness of the community legislation, even if they do not directly contradict its terms. Therefore, article 5 of the treaty of Rome, although it is not being amended, is of major importance to the debate, because it provides a legal basis on which the general treaty objectives and goals, which many people view as general and undefined, suddenly become very clear and may be converted by a process of interpretation by the European Court of Justice to binding and specific legal rules.

Article 2, as amended by Maastricht, gives much greater precedence to social objectives. Accordingly, the court will give much more weight to social aspects and determinations.

Dr. Godman: I remind the hon. Gentleman of the 15th report of the Select Committee on European Legislation from the 1991-92 Session. It refers to the growing power of the European Court of Justice but points out a new factor. Paragraph 34 on page 49 states:

"The jurisprudence of the Court . . . recognised a right for individuals (in carefully defined circumstances) to sue their Member States in their national courts for damages flowing from non-implementation of obligations intended for their protection."

I can envisage a flood of complaints heading for our courts in England, Wales and Scotland on the basis of the treaty.

Mr. Duncan-Smith: The hon. Gentleman makes a powerful point, which stands on its own. To some extent, I agree that these articles will come back to haunt us because of the great and growing power of the European Court to rule over nation state Parliaments and, necessarily, Governments. I believe that I am succeeding in proving that the text provides a route to the European Court of Justice on social matters.

I list some of the new objectives of article 2 which powerfully prove my point. They include:

"social protection, the raising of the standard of living and quality of life, and . . . social cohesion and solidarity among Member States".

That is powerful language. In the debate so far, many Members have said that they are general objectives, but I maintain that the general becomes specific once it is bound by a court which will rule and interpret—and interpret behind closed doors—and issue its interpretation as a statement.

I have already said that the protocol on social policy specifically states that it shall not

"prejudice . . . the provisions of this Treaty, particularly those relating to social policy which constitute an integral part of the 'acquis communautaire'".

Therefore, the route that I have demonstrated leaves the door open for substantial Community interference in social policy, effectively undermining our exclusion from the social chapter.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): I have been trying to follow carefully the hon. Gentleman's argument. Does it not lead to the conclusion that, if all the provisions can be secured by the courts or through other mechanisms, there is very little to be lost by including the social provisions for the United Kingdom as for the other 11 countries?

Mr. Duncan-Smith: I disagree fundamentally with the social chapter, and I congratulated my right hon. Friends the Minister and the Prime Minister on their negotiating skills in keeping us out of it. However, having re-read the treaty, I believe that there is an established route for all of the social provisions to be implemented through the European Court. That poses a challenge, although I have not yet shown how that challenge would arise.

Mr. Garel-Jones: My hon. Friend is developing an interesting point. Does he agree that it is probably a fair assumption that the 11 parties which intend to proceed with the treaty will have read it very carefully? If they felt that the objectives were achievable under the treaty of Rome as amended by the Single European Act, why does he think that they went to the trouble of making these arrangements—or does he think that he and he alone has espied the route for implementing the objectives under the existing treaty?

Mr. Duncan-Smith: I am not sure whether I alone have espied the route, but I was hoping that my right hon. Friend would be able to prove that I was incorrect. I shall be looking for him to do that at the end of my speech. I could assume a Machiavellian intent on the part of other nations—perhaps they made a big fuss and pushed us to the brink, knowing that they could make a concession but still implement the proposals—but for all 11 countries to think in that way would imply an acquis communautaire which I am not sure necessarily exists.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Whether or not my hon. Friend is the only person to have espied that route, would it not be fair to say that previous British Governments of all complexions have missed the central point of previous legislation amending the treaty of Rome? As my hon. Friend is explaining, that central point is the importance of the preambles and listings of objectives in the legislation. We have sometimes overlooked the combination of the preambles and objectives with some of the detailed wording, because that is not the way in which we go about things. We simply look at the main text of legislation; we do not have a tradition of examining preambles. But other countries have. That is a central point.

Mr. Duncan-Smith: Indeed, that has always been my point. In my maiden speech on Second Reading, I said that the European Court of Justice was a more significantly powerful organisation than many of my colleagues on both sides of the House thought, because it had far more latitude than our High Court. If we examine the European Court's rulings, we see that it tends to interpret more according to the spirit of legislation; it looks to the general objectives underlying the words, not necessarily the words alone.

I believe that it was Lord Mackenzie-Stuart who wrote a couple of letters to The Times about article 3b. I apologise, Mr. Lofthouse, if I appear to be moving away from the amendment, but what I am saying is related to it. Lord Mackenzie-Stuart said that, although politicians had given the European Court a near-impossible task of interpretation, it would none the less do as it had done in the past and interpret according to what it found in the treaty. It has become clear that the court sees that part of its task as to ensure that the interests of the Community as a whole go forward.

Mr. Marlow: The intervention by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State must have been uncharacteristically naive—because I am sure that he was not dissembling. Is not the reality that the Government have to sell the treaty to a British public who are, to say the least, somewhat sceptical? Among that public are industry, the Institute of Directors and the Confederation of British Industry. It is important for the Government, as it was for Chamberlain when he stepped off the aeroplane, to come back waving a victory—the victory that we have been excluded from the social chapter. Yet the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Duncan-Smith) thus far has conclusively proved that we have not been excluded from the social chapter at all. It will be interesting to hear what my right hon. Friend the Minister says about it later.

Mr. Duncan-Smith: My hon. Friend's objections stand on their own, and I shall not elaborate on them.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (Colchester, North): It is important to enlarge on the argument about the scope of article 2 and the activities of the Community. Where the Commission feels that it can make a proposal which would command the support of a qualified majority of the Council of Ministers, it merely needs a pretext, and can choose the article under which to achieve such a vote. It is inconceivable that the European Court would subsequently rule against a qualified majority in the Council of Ministers.

Mr. Duncan-Smith: Indeed. All that, which I have previously stated, underlines the point.

It is never enough simply to prove a route to somewhere. I dare say that it is not difficult to find a route to the European Court of Justice through many parts of the treaty. The key difference is the reason why we may proceed along such a route.

Mr. Garel-Jones: My hon. Friend is making an interesting speech, and the intervention by my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) pointed in the right direction, too. Of course, one of the things that we have learnt is that the Community is a developing process. In the previous debate I tried to clarify the fact that we have seen that there is a desire—understandable, perhaps—on the part of the Commission and its officials to extend their writ into more areas. They sometimes sought to do that in ways which did not seem proper to us. In various other debates we have attempted to close those gaps.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Duncan-Smith) raises an important point, and I shall seek to reply to it in detail later. He has made it clear to the House that we abominate the content of the social protocol—I believe that that is common ground amongst Conservative Members. We believe that it would not only undermine but reverse much of what we have achieved in the past decade. If my hon. Friend has identified a route by which the social chapter could be imported into the treaty, that would be a serious matter, and I shall try later to deal in detail with that important question.

6.15 pm

Mr. Duncan-Smith: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend. This matter needs much consideration, and I hope that it will receive it.

As I was saying, it is not enough simply to prove a route. In legal terms, there are always routes to all sorts of decisions. The key is to prove that there is a reason for those routes to be taken. We must consider all 11 of the nations that were behind the social chapter—much of it was generated in France—and ask why we might be dragged down some of those routes. The answer must surely be that—not in one year's time, perhaps not even in two years' time, but as things develop—it will become clear that the United Kingdom is a low-cost country with much simpler worker-management relationships.

I should applaud that—it will be lauded by all Conservative Members—but France or Holland may say, "It is unfair. The United Kingdom is part of the Community and has signed up to the spirit of all the agreements, yet underneath it all United Kingdom products are becoming very competitive. We are finding it difficult to compete with the British, and they have a right to our market. And it is all because they have no minimum wage and no social objectives, as we have. We can point out many ways in which they are not implementing the agreements."

Those countries would then encourage the Commission to examine the matter and report that the United Kingdom was in contravention of the body of the treaty. They will say that, under articles 2 and 3, in conjunction with article 118a and bearing in mind article 5, there is a good reason for the Council of Ministers to investigate and bring the United Kingdom into line. They could pick us off in one area at a time.

That is a powerful reason why either individual nations or the Commission will push for harmony. That would drive the others forward, with us as part of the process rather than our undermining them, which would otherwise happen—and which I should applaud, but which would be seen as a threat to the other nations.

That is why the other nations will wish to go down that route and challenge us in the European Court. That is why the European Court will, not for the first time, be called to make a judgment on a matter which is now supranational, in an area where we as a Government have distinctly refused to take part. Yet suddenly the European Court will find against us in one area and then another. As qualified majority voting cut in, we should find ourselves in dispute with the other members of the Community. Arguably, that would not be the best way to encourage a decent relationship with them—if that is what people want us to do.

I have tried to demonstrate that the social chapter is already to a greater or lesser extent in the body of the treaty. For Conservative Members the problem is that, although we all applauded the great skills of my right hon. Friends, hidden away underneath everything is not only the route but the reason why we shall be brought to account, whether we like it or not. We shall find that the invidious social provisions will be introduced bit by bit.

Yet again, the nation state will lose its position and its ability to make decisions. Our opt-out of the social chapter will be put on one side. Who here would say—it may be a wiser man than I—that in 10 years' time the opt-out will not be almost forgotten, and we will not already be tightly bound in to many of the social provisions?

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): The hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Duncan-Smith) will probably not agree with what I have to say, but I do not intend to take quite as long as he did.

On many occasions, I have been critical of several aspects of the European Communities, but I am certainly not critical of the approach to the social problems of Europe or the socio-economic management of the Community. A few moments ago the Minister of State expressed opposition to the social charter. He said that it undermines the achievements of the last 10 years. Well, what have we achieved? In 1979, Britain was the fifth wealthiest country in the world; it is now the 15th. In the past 10 years, we have seen wastelands created, industries wiped out and social and economic devastation inflicted on many parts of the country, which is rapidly becoming criminalised. We have become a criminal, impoverished, under-invested and paganised nation. When someone, even in Brussels, offers to help to get us out of the mess, we have evasion, pompous and unjustifiable boasts, such as we have heard from the Minister, and further evidence of the decline in public standards.

In my brief remarks I shall refer to one aspect of the social policy of Europe—the structural funds through RECHAR. The hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) will recall a debate of about a year ago in which he and I participated. Hon. Members with constituencies in which there are coalfields that have been devastated in the past decade became increasingly concerned about the fact that, although the British Government were receiving resources through the structural fund, we did not seem to be getting any benefit. We had very serious misgivings. We pressed the Government about the matter and, in response, they assured us that the money was flowing to the coalfields.

But then Mr. Bruce Millan, acting responsibly and properly in fulfilment of his duty as a Commissioner, established beyond all doubt that the Government were receiving this money but were not passing it to the coalfields. He said that, as the money was not going to the coalfields, he would not pass it to the British Government. Conservative Member after Conservative Member denounced Mr. Millan, and Ministers said that he was acting irresponsibly. Members of the Government subjected him to the most appalling, irresponsible and dishonest condemnation and criticism. Not a single Member from the Treasury Bench had the guts to admit that Bruce Millan was right.

[Mr. Peter Hardy]

Some hon. Members went to see Ministers about the matter. At one meeting, I pointed out that the Government's claim that the money was being paid to the coalfield areas could not stand up. Let me refer to the way in which I illustrated the point. The Government had worked out their disbursements to local authorities in September of the year in question—two or three years ago—and said that in those disbursements they had allocated the RECHAR money. But it was not until three months after they had calculated the aid for the coalfield areas that the Government found out what the RECHAR money for the following year would be.

We challenged the Minister to consult the right hon. Gentleman who is now President of the Board of Trade but was then at the Department of the Environment, and find out whether he could deny that charge. The response of the right hon. Gentleman was to leak a letter referring to the pressure to which he and his colleagues were being subjected by Labour Members of Parliament who had—he did not use these words—rumbled the Government's approach.

At that point the Government, quietly—very quietly indeed—accepted that Mr. Millan was right. That was after we found out that they had not met Mr. Millan for about 18 months. But they did not tell their friends—or those whom they sometimes assume to be their friends—that Mr. Millan's action was justified. They had spent 12 months or more blackguarding the Commissioner for action that was entirely responsible and proper, but they did not take any significant steps to offer the public apology or expression of regret that was due to our former colleague. Indeed, I know that Conservative Members and Ministers tramped round the country linking Mr. Millan's action with the evils of the so-called social policy. How is it that Germany, France, Spain, Luxembourg and the Netherlands have all passed Britain in the international prosperity tables while they have pursued policies which are acceptable to their peoples but are apparently not to be accepted in this country, which is in rapid economic and social decline?

I assumed that the Government had turned over a new leaf—that they had accepted that Mr. Millan was right and that they would in future pass on the social funds. But, a short while ago, I received from the Minister for Industry a letter whose contents the Committee needs to know, because the Government are about to change their policy as quietly as possible—as quietly as they sought to retrieve their position following the dishonesty about Mr. Millan's intervention.

The letter says:

"You ask about future assistance from European Structural Funds for coalmining areas. RECHAR must be considered together with all the other Structural Funds Community Initiatives . . . Taken together, the Initiatives cannot be shown to have brought the UK more than if the same money had been spent on ordinary . . . programmes."

What the Minister meant was that the initiatives could not be shown to have brought to Britain from Europe any more than had been received before, when the funds were buried in the moneys that allowed the Government to pursue a tax-cutting policy that did not have any economic advantage for the country.

The letter goes on:

"However, the Government shares the view . . . that there have been too many Community Initiatives."

For that reason, the Government will seek to end the RECHAR programme. However, they offer the comforting sop that they will make good use of RECHAR while it lasts. The letter continues:

"the Government will continue to give all due priority to the needs of areas such as South Yorkshire, though you will accept, I am sure, that regions with needs unrelated to coal must also receive their fair share."

As my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) will recognise, even the current Government pretend to accept that the coalfield areas are in particular need. Brussels not only recognised that fact, but sought to do something about it. We were extremely grateful when Mr. Millan sought to compel the Government to do something about it. We had hoped that acceptance of the accuracy Mr. Millan's statements might lead the Government to maintain the provision of these funds for areas like ours, which, had the Government had their way in October, would have seen further blight at enormous public cost. We now have very good grounds to be suspicious of the Government and not at all ungrateful for some of the actions in Brussels.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): I thank my hon. Friend for his extremely powerful and knowledgeable argument. I think that no hon. Member knows more about this situation. Can he confirm that the obligations arising from RECHAR and other moneys intended to assist coalfield areas and other declining industrial regions arose as the result of an obligation under the treaty of Paris, which was subsumed within the treaty of Rome, and that the Government not only were duplicitous in their treatment of the RECHAR moneys but also offended against—if they did not actually break—the treaty obligations undertaken when the European Coal and Steel Community was set up, long before the days of European Economic Community and the treaty of Rome?

Mr. Hardy: My hon. Friend is quite right. What we have seen from the Government is a repudiation of some of the basic principles on the basis of which they were eager to enter the Community. Apparently they are eager to remain in the Community so long as it does not affect that small proportion of the British people on whom they believe we all depend—the entrepreneurs. There is a place for the entrepreneur, but there must also be a place for a decent society. The Government have rejected that decency.

I mentioned the hon. Member for Southend, East. He will recall a debate in which we discussed RECHAR. I think that the hon. Gentleman will agree that his argument was that money should not go to the coalfield areas, but that it should be used to assist all the British people. I am sure that he accepts that, although people who live in places such as Southend are not free from problems, which may be exacerbated if the Government pursue their policy towards British Rail, there are areas in which levels of unemployment, and economic and environmental devastation have risen and have now reached chronic proportions.

6.30 pm

The Government now say that moneys from Europe should assist everyone and not only areas in which there are special needs. I submit that the Government have no sense of reasonable priorities and no understanding of the fact that they are supposed to represent the whole nation. Given that, it is wrong to have Britain in an isolated position in Europe.

Mr. Llew Smith (Blaenau Gwent): Does my hon. Friend accept that there are problems for some local authorities? There is a strong possibility that they will not be able to take up the RECHAR moneys because of cuts in public expenditure. They will not have the moneys to meet their part of the cost of projects that are so important to communities such as my own.

Mr. Hardy: I am sure that my hon. Friend is aware that I represent a coalfield area, as he does. I know that he has great familiarity with, and knowledge of, such areas. I strongly suspect that, when Ministers in the Department of Employment consider the implications of the 1991 census, they will be astonished. There is excessive complacency about unemployment, and the Government believe their own figures. They are foul in their present form as official measurement, and they are obscene in reality. In areas of high unemployment, the 1991 census will reveal the astonishingly low levels of people in work.

Given that reality, which is not exposed by Government statistics, there is an urgent need for a far greater priority to be given to social and socio-economic policy. It seems astonishing that there is a contemptuous rejection of the social charter, which is more relevant to Britain's needs than it is to the needs of most of our competitor countries, which have not suffered the economic decline that Britain has experienced over the past 10 years.

I am extremely critical of many aspects of Europe, but the social charter is not one of them. Of all the aspects of the treaty, the social charter is the one which we should be eager to espouse. We should not reject it with the rather contemptuous and careless approach which is typical of the Government's attitude.

Mr. Jenkin: This is the first time that I have been called to speak in a debate on the Bill. The present group of amendments allows a fairly wide-ranging debate. Before picking up two or three threads that have already been teased a little by right hon. and hon. Members, I will briefly set out my general attitude to the Bill.

I am pro-Europe and pro-Community and I have always been so. One of the disturbing aspects of the argument on this group of amendments is that I have never before felt the need to protest my pro-Community credentials. I have expressed my misgivings about the treaty on European union and people seem determined to misconstrue my motives.

Why should the social aspects be brought into the Community at all? The true intent of the Maastricht treaty is that it should lead to a federal Europe. Why should a truly separate economic pillar include matters such as social protection and social cohesion and solidarity, especially if our opt-out from the social chapter is to free us from those very activities?

I do not suggest, as my right hon. Friend the Minister of state said, that I want to see nothing more than a market in the Community. I point out the inconsistency in arguing in favour of a union based on well-defined pillars while making changes to the economic pillar which weaken its identity. The indisputable effect of what my hon. Friend the Member for Chingford has already described in his extremely able speech, which included many cogent arguments, is to increase the breadth of the European Economic Community's activities so that the change in name is entirely relevant because it betrays the much expanded scope that was given to the Community at Maastricht.

I shall point out some of the developments that will not be reversed. The Maastricht treaty is determined to maintain what it calls the acquis communautaire. When Ministers speak to Conservative party conferences and publish Conservative party documents in which they claim that the direction of the treaty has been reversed, one can only assume that they have been deeply misinformed.

I take as an example the proposed directive on the 48-hour working week. The directive has been delayed, but the important point about it is that it was completely unforeseen by the Government. Assurances were given to the effect that anyone would have believed that such a directive was impossible to achieve. The Government have, admittedly, reserved their position to go to the European Court to plead that the matter is outside the scope of the powers of the Community, but Ministers have been advised to negotiate the 48-hour working week directive on the basis that they had better agree something because they might otherwise have something even worse imposed on them.

What assurances can Ministers give us this evening that the process is not going to continue, using article 118a, and drawing on the objectives at the beginning of article 2, on the activities in article 3 and on article 5, as demonstrated in the case alluded to by my hon. Friend the Member for Chingford?

I draw the attention of my right hon. and hon. Friends to another recent development on the social side under the existing treaty of Rome, which is being specifically preserved in the acquis communautaire to which the Maastricht treaty refers. I have here a cutting from the Observer of 17 January 1993, which says:

> "The Home Office has 'put on ice' plans to privatise prison education."

Opposition Members may be pleased. However, here we have another part of the social sphere being imposed on the United Kingdom without any warning. The article continues:

> "Kent has won the go-ahead for a High Court judicial review and has been joined in the action by the National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education. Natfhe will argue that contracting out is illegal if it does not abide by European Community directive guaranteeing equal rights and conditions for public sector workers whose jobs are transferred to private companies."

Here we have the possibility of a European Community directive, whose scope is being potentially expanded by a European Court ruling, encompassing the entire contracting-out programme and the entire programme of a whole Government Department—the Office of Public Service and Science—and bringing the whole thing to a halt. That is the problem that we are faced with when implementing further competencies in the treaty, regardless of whether we feel that we have opted out of them. I do not wish to detain the Committee longer; I simply wish to ask the Minister to give assurances that the social legislation that the Community seeks to put upon us will be prevented.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I accept—I think that it is widely accepted—one of the burdens of the point that my hon. Friend is making, which is that the Commission, sometimes for perfectly laudable, motives, sometimes not so laudable has sought in the past and will continue to seek, I am sure, to extend its writ into areas where we would not wish it to go. It is my belief, and we are making the case as we go through the Committee, that this treaty inhibits the Commission more than it was inhibited before.

The crucial point is this. I think that my hon. Friend would agree that everything in the protocol that is the subject of the Opposition amendment is unacceptable to him, to me and to most other Conservatives; and even if I were to accept the risk that there will be efforts—of course there will be—to push the ball in another direction, surely he and I would not wish to bring about a position where there is any risk whatever that the opt-out that we have obtained from these provisions is put in jeopardy. That is precisely what Opposition Members are trying to do.

Mr. Jenkin: Whether or not I agree with my right hon. Friend on that point, I wish that the British Government would be honest about the effects of the treaty. We have one assertion after another that black is white and white is black, in defiance of the text of the treaty.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I do not know whether my hon. Friend was in the Committee when we discussed the last group of amendments to do with training and education. That is a very good example of where the Community has begun to insert itself into an area by simple majority voting; under the terms of this treaty, its ability to do so is restricted and defined and we move up from simple majority to qualified majority voting. That is an advance on the earlier position and it is just one example of the way in which this treaty improves our position from the position under the Single European Act.

Mr. Jenkin: I gave way to my right hon. Friend, expecting him to make a point about the group of amendments that we are discussing at the moment. If there was some specific exclusion clause, apart from the exclusion clause to that protocol, which related to articles 2 and 3, I would feel more reassured, but that is not the case.

Mr. Duncan-Smith: Does my hon. Friend agree that the area which I touched on and to which he has alluded—article 5 of the treaty of Rome—gives significant and powerful support to the case that the European Court will be forced to interpret? Therefore, to some degree, it is irrelevant whether individual nation states or Governments wish a certain thing; what is important is what the view of the European Court will be, particularly in the light of some of the judgments that Lasok and Bridge have produced in their period of recording.

Mr. Jenkin: I agree with my hon. Friend, and that leads me to my concluding point.

Mr. Marlow: My right hon. Friend the Minister is trying to cover his nakedness by referring to education. I am afraid that it does not cover anything and the sight is still pretty disagreeable. The Government thought that the Lingua programme was illegal, yet still, under the previous treaty, it was imposed upon us and in the new treaty the Lingua programme is enshrined. This just reinforces the point that my hon. Friend makes: the Government say one thing—they have said one thing before—but the reality is always different.

Mr. Jenkin: I hear the point that my hon. Friend makes.

I conclude by drawing attention to the motives of our European partners. They will wish to make us bear the same burdens of cost as they currently envisage bearing themselves under the social chapter and they will seek whichever way they can to make sure that we bear those costs. Even though we wish to opt out of the 48-hour working week directive—I must congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment on doing a very good job of muddying the waters—it is impossible to imagine a situation in which, 11 member states having voted for a particular directive, the court will not rule against us if we continue to defy the directive.

6.45 pm

Mr. Wells: The 48-hour working week to which my hon. Friend refers has been introduced by the Commission under article 118a of the existing treaty, as amended by the Single European Act. The British are disputing that the Commission can do so under that article because we do not believe that it is a matter of health and safety at work. The Maastricht treaty, with its subsidiarity clause, inhibits or begins to slow down the process and asks the Commission and the whole of the Community whether they are right to extend their powers into this domestic legislative arena. Surely, therefore, the Maastricht treaty is an advance in the direction in which my hon. Friend would like the Community to go.

My hon. Friend should have a little more confidence in the European Court sustaining British objections to proceeding on the 48-hour week under article 118a.

Mr. Jenkin: I draw my hon. Friend's attention to articles 2 and 3 of the treaty compared with what is in the existing Rome treaty. We have considerable additions which will widen the scope of the European Court's rulings and widen the competence of the Community, particularly in social affairs. Even though we have opted out of a separate list of social policy objectives, we are still wide open to the 48-hour working week, and perhaps more so, because we will have less defence against the 48-hour working week if we sign up to such matters as to quote from the treaty.

"economic and social cohesion and solidarity among the Member States",

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): In his concern, has my hon. Friend taken on board the fact that 10 out of 12 countries in the European Community have already ratified the treaty, which permits this country to opt out of the entire social chapter? Does he not consider that in those circumstances he might be better advised to be arguing the case alongside the Government instead of against them? If we had had any other Government elected last year, he and I and Front-Bench spokesmen would all be together in opposing what a Labour Government might have produced, which would have included this particular social chapter.

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Lady unfortunately missed the cogent and able speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Duncan-Smith).

Mrs. Currie: I am asking you.

Mr. Jenkin: I would be very happy to take my hon. Friend through Hansard tomorrow morning and point out the argument. I can give her the answer if she wishes, but I do not wish to detain the Committee longer than necessary. It relates, in summary, to the way in which article 118a can be used now in conjunction with the approval procedures in article 189c, using the objectives laid out in article 2 and the new activities of the treaty laid out in article 3, in conjunction with article 5, where it says that it is against Community law to frustrate the objectives of this treaty. If one takes that as meaningless, have no fear, but the truth of the matter, as we have learnt from the Single European Act, is that the preambles and objectives of those treaties are vital.

The European Court will draw upon the objectives of the treaty to inform its rulings and the Commission knows that. When the Commission initiates legislation in the knowledge that it can get a qualified majority in the Council of Ministers and that the European Court will draw upon the objectives laid out in articles 2 and 3, one can be confident that we are going to find ourselves in a minority. The Government's lawyers will tell Ministers, "You had better agree and sign up to something better than nothing, or you will have the worst imposed upon you."

Sir Teddy Taylor: Will my hon. Friend perhaps correct the issue over the 48-hour directive by consulting Hansard? Does he appreciate that, when the Minister of State, Department of Employment, was asked about going to the court over the 48-hour directive, his answer was that he would consider doing so if it remained in its present form, but not necessarily if it was changed in some respect?

Is my hon. Friend aware that the negotiations on the 48-hour directive are nearly complete and that one of the agreed parts is that French bakers are exempt from the 48-hour week but British bakers are not? Will my hon. Friend consult the Hansard record of yesterday's Question Time and read question No. 2 for the right answer on the 48-hour week being challenged in the court?

Mr. Jenkin: I will certainly consult Hansard.

Mrs. Currie: I am most impressed with the way in which my new colleague is approaching the issue, but I put it to him that the broad principles on which he is objecting have been dealt with in earlier debates and were passed with large majorities. The Single European Act, which is the source of much of what he is complaining about, passed through the House some years ago with large majorities. Is my hon. Friend going to stand by his principles, with which many Conservative Members agree, and vote with the Government tonight?

Mr. Jenkin: The contention of the Government and, I presume, of my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie), is that the Maastricht treaty somehow addresses the concerns that we have come to experience in the Single European Act. My contention and that of a growing number of people in this country is that that is not the case and that every aspect of increased competence in the European Community increases the likelihood that we are going to finish up with laws being imposed upon us which we do not want.

It seems extraordinary to say that we have lessons to learn from the Single European Act and then to grasp tenfold the same mistakes in the Maastricht treaty. The objectives of the treaty are laid out before my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South. If she cares to read them and obtain an understanding of how the legal structures in the Community are likely to work, we might be in a position to avoid making the same mistake.

I have detained the Committee long enough. I thank the Committee for its indulgence.

Mr. Wigley: I am grateful for the opportunity briefly to intervene at this point. This is the first time that I have addressed the Committee on these provisions, and I am glad to do so. My party and I not only support the objective of being a full member of the European Community and playing a full part as a full partner, not as someone who picks and chooses which parts of the package he wants and insists on having exceptions for other parts, but we agree with the objective of amendment No. 7 in order for the social provisions that are available to the other 11 member states to be available also to us in Wales.

I say that for the reason that we in Wales, as has been reflected in election after election, look for a balance of social and economic policy which is different from the balance of social and economic policy that is reflected in the Chamber. Quite frankly, we are more likely to get the social policy that our people in Wales want from the European institutions than we are likely to get from Westminster, Whitehall and the Government who, election after election, are returned to the House of Commons.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I am listening to the hon. Gentleman's speech with care, not least because I know that he and his party are very committed to the Maastricht treaty and wish to see it ratified. It seems likely that the amendment will not be voted on for some time. If the amendment were to be carried, the treaty of Rome must be amended, a further intergovernmental conference would have to take place, and then further ratifications would have to take place. It really is playing with fire for anyone to support the official Opposition's amendment.

Mr. Wigley: If the position is as outlined by the Minister of State, that surely is a consideration that he and his Government should have taken on board when they negotiated the way to exclude the social provisions from the treaty. The Government have cobbled together this exclusion for internal party policy, in order to hold together a coalition on the Conservative Benches to overcome the general election that took place in April. It is nasty internal politics and not the objective of what is best not only for the peoples of the islands of Britain but for the development of unity within Europe, which the right hon. Gentleman wants to see as much as I do.

The workings of the single market cannot possibly take place in the fulness of time if 11 member states have a certain minimal provision in social matters that relate very directly to the economy, to the labour force and to the costs of production and manufacture. A minimum provision is required of those 11 members, and there is a 12th member of the European Community that does not have those rules, applying to it and, therefore, as the Government themselves have boasted, is enabled to have a cut-price economy and has tried to obtain a competitive advantage over the other 11 members. We cannot build a united Europe—a Europe in which the 12 member states trust one another, co-operate with one another and work towards common objectives—if that let-out is allowed for one member state in order to obtain a competitive advantage.

Dr. Godman: I remind the hon. Gentleman that the hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Duncan-Smith) said, among many other things, that, despite the exclusion of the social chapter, the European Court of Justice, given the powers that it has, seemingly, of a supreme court with regard to the 12 nations, could defend the interests of workers and trade unionists in relation to article 118a. The hon. Member for Chingford seemed to suggest that the European Court of Justice could protect and promote the interests of ordinary people, despite the Government's exclusion of the social chapter.

Mr. Wigley: I listened to the speech of the hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Duncan-Smith) with considerable interest. It was an exceptionally good speech and it was delivered in a manner which was a great credit to the Committee. It was a thoughtful speech. Perhaps we should hear more such speeches. The hon. Gentleman begged the question for himself and for his colleagues—perhaps he will throw it back at us—that, if it is possible to use the courts and other provisions which have been agreed and which would be applicable to us in order to sustain the social provisions that are otherwise dependent upon the chapter from which we are excluded, perhaps there is no need to have the social chapter in it at all. Perhaps we can rely on that.

If that is the case, as I asked him in an intervention, what is the argument against having that full provision so that at least we would know where we stood? It would then be clear cut and we would not have the inevitable uncertainty involved in going to the courts on questions of interpretation.

Mr. Duncan-Smith: I shall try to answer that question. Conservative Members abhor the social chapter because we think that it essentially destroys the competitiveness of this country but, from the point of view of those who would wish to have it, it tidies up all the provisions in one clearly identifiable aspect. The hon. Gentleman can see the matter from the other point of view as well as our reluctance to have the social chapter. My point is that, with or without our signature appended to it, most of the provisions will be found in a variety of ways in the body of the treaty.

Mr. Wigley: I respect the hon. Gentleman's position. If he and his colleagues were to say that we are not allowed to exclude ourselves from these social provisions, we would be happy not to be members of the open market and the free movement of people, goods and capital with free competition, which has been the basis of development in the European context recently.

To argue that we should be allowed to have our own laws on labour, standards, working conditions, information, consultation of workers, equality between men and women and all the other provisions in the treaty, which would give us a competitive edge over the other 11 member states in the Community, and then expect them to treat us as an equal member does not hold water. We should not be allowed to compete and undercut the other 11 member states in their own marketplace.

Mrs. Currie: That matter is obviously the heart of the debate. Many Government Members think that the social chapter is bad for the whole of Europe. We strongly believe—I certainly do—that the opportunities for employment are diminished by raising the cost of employment. One need look only at a modern factory which is crammed to the eyeballs with equipment to see what the effect might be.

Mr. Wigley: I know that the hon. Lady is a good European. She has aspirations to play a fuller part on the European stage. I am sure that, as a good democrat, she will accept that, if unanimity is as great—if the people and political parties within the 11 member states agree with this—we may well have to accept it in the name of the European Community, which we believe is important, and in the name of the level playing field which we believe is important for the companies which are competing with each other in the marketplace.

Mr. John Butcher (Coventry, South-West): I know that the hon. Gentleman has great experience in industry, and his views must be respected in that regard. In his own words, he has vividly illustrated precisely why it will be intolerable to the other nations which have adopted the social chapter on competition policy grounds. I listened carefully to what the hon. Gentleman said.

The advice which I have received from outside is that our exemption will be so intolerable that the other member states will bring their action on the grounds of competition policy through, first, qualified majority voting in the Commission and, secondly, interpretation of competition in the protocols and elsewhere. Once the French and the Germans wake up to the fact that it is 25 per cent. cheaper to employ British engineers to do the same job, and the effect that that will have on European investment, there will most certainly be such an action.

Mr. Wigley: Yes; and I respect the ministerial background which the hon. Gentleman has in such matters. His argument is that the provisions will come through one door or another because of the imperative of the discrepancy which arises. There will be an imperative on other countries to cut out the unfair competition of which we are taking advantage. I simply say this: let us have it clear. Let us have it on the face of the Act so that we know where we stand. Everyone involved will know that the social provisions are there in black and white and that we agree with them.

I know that the Committee is divided on the question of whether the provisions should be available, given that they were supported and advocated by 11 of the 12 member states across the board in Europe, with the only exceptions being the Conservative party and Le Pen in France. In the name of democracy and in the name of the free competition which the hon. Member for Coventry, South-West (Mr. Butcher) and his colleagues have advocated for so many years, surely we must have democratic unanimity if a united Europe means anything at all.

Mr. Llew Smith: Will the hon. Gentleman accept the point made by the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) that low wages create full employment? If that were the case, would not India probably be one of the richest countries in the world, with full employment, and would not Germany be experiencing tremendous poverty and mass unemployment?

Mr. Wigley: I agree wholeheartedly. The future for our manufacturing industry must be based on quality, investment, technological development and being able to compete with German, French, Spanish and Italian industry head on. We should be inventive, take our products to the marketplace, and be able to win in that context. That is the only future on which we can build a high-wage economy and an economy which can sustain the social payments which are essential for our people.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The hon. Gentleman is advancing the proposition that, if 11 member states believe something to be the case, Britain is bound to agree with it in the end and should agree with it out of community spirit.

I agree that one of the objectives is that the Community should seek consensus wherever it can find it. On that basis, let us take the British abatement. Does the hon. Gentleman argue that, because the other 11 member states disagree with the abatement, the Government should give way on it? On the basis of what the Government have done on the social protocol, surely one of the purposes of democracy is that they sought and received the support of the British people for what they did.

The hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) and my hon. Friends can be assured that not just the protocol exempts the United Kingdom from any acts taken under it. We do not hesitate to stand on that position, even if we must stand alone.

Mr. Wigley: I understand that there are times when a principle is so fundamental that a nation must stand alone, whatever the rest of the world is saying. However, I do not believe that our insistence on keeping the social provisions for working people, working conditions, information and equality between men and women is such a fundamental argument that we stand alone against all comers.

As far as the abatement argument is concerned, every country will argue for the best financial deal. It is perfectly natural, and any Government should be doing that. When it comes to the building blocks on which the new open market will be constructed—where fair competition will exist, where there is a level playing field, where company and enterprise compete and where 11 of the 12 member states have one set of rules and the other has another set of rules which gives a competitive edge which hon. Members have talked about and which Ministers have boasted about—how on earth can such provisions remain? It is only a transitional provision, which must crumble within a short period.

Government Members would be more honest if they faced up to that. We must put the treaty's provisions into legislation rather than have some bridging provisions which are convenient for the Conservative party. The Conservative party is leading the British public down the garden path as far as these provisions are concerned. It is selling employees short.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The argument that it is unfair to have a competitive edge is interesting. Is it not the case that that is exactly what trade is about? Trade is about using the competitive advantage. Will we have sunshine everywhere? Will olives grow everywhere? Will there be any difference in the utopian world which the hon. Gentleman is painting, or will there be a competitive edge? Perhaps that is a point in favour of our side.

Mr. Wigley: With respect, we are trying to build a competitive edge in law. A competitive edge is secured by innovation, scientific and technological research and investment in plant and machinery to produce better products, which is needed. We must then recommend those products in the marketplace and get a larger slice of the marketplace.

That is what it is all about. It is not about the whole basis of the Common Market before the European Community existed. The whole basis has been about getting a level playing field. In the Bill we are building a playing field on a slope. Government Members may believe that it is a lasting basis, but I suggest that it is a basis which cannot possibly remain. The basis may last for the duration of the Bill if the Government can cobble together a majority on it, but within a year or two pressures from other countries, possibly through the Chingford route which was referred to—through the courts—will mean that it will not last. It would be more honest for us to face up to that now.

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Hastings and Rye): The hon. Gentleman talks about a common market. Is he aware that industry in Germany—especially engineering industry, as I learned from a visit on Monday—is already conscious that it needs to shed the shackles of the social policy that has been imposed on it formerly by trade unions and now by Maastricht? It will work within Germany to reform those provisions. So I suggest that our competitive edge will last only a short time.

Mr. Wigley: I can well imagine that the cancer in the thought of the Government could spread. When the British Government tell industrialists in Germany that we have a competitive edge over them, that we have cheap labour and that we can undercut them, of course they will say that they do not want the social chapter either. The cancer could run through the whole of Europe. The social provisions which have been built up in Germany, Denmark and other countries could be undermined by the thinking of this reactionary Conservative Government.

The Government wish to increase profits by undermining the rights of employees—rights which have been enshrined in the treaty. The social chapter creates a minimum standard. It is not a straitjacket. It acknowledges that many countries may want to go beyond that standard.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Wigley: I should like to make progress, because I know that other hon. Members want to speak.

I draw it to the attention of the Committee that the social chapter includes a provision which says:

"before submitting proposals in the social policy field, the Commission shall consult management and labour on possible direction of Community action."

Presumably we are excluded from that consultation. The Commission will consult people on both the management and the labour side in 11 member states but will not consult them in the United Kingdom when formulating policy of considerable importance within the Commission.

[Mr. Wigley]

As it is important within the Commission, it will affect policy on many other issues. European social policy will inevitably affect Britain indirectly.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The hon. Gentleman says that there are great matters of principle. It may have escaped his notice that one of the core debates in Britain in the past decade has been about corporatism and the way in which the corporate approach to industry has damaged our competitiveness and prospects. He may not like it, but Conservative Members wear it as a badge of honour that the policies that we have pursued have produced four election victories for us. If the Labour party wants to import the social protocol into the treaty of Rome, it had better win an election.

Mr. Wigley: I understand the Minister's warnings about the corporate approach. I understand its dangers and the lessons that we must learn from the post-war history of Britain. I was making the point a moment ago that the Commission would develop policies. That right has not been taken away from the Commission. It will develop policies in many areas and will be influenced by the opinion of management and labour in 11 out of the 12 member states. The conclusions reached will inevitably affect Britain.

The provisions of the social chapter also say:

"The Commission shall draw up a report each year on progress in achieving the objectives of Article 1, including the demographic situation in the Community."

The effects of the demographic situation in the Community must be the basis on which regional policy will be developed. Demographic considerations are fundamental to regional policy. The Commission will take information from 11 out of the 12 member states, from which reports will be compiled on the demographic situation in Europe. Those reports will undoubtedly underpin the regional policy pursued by the Commission. We shall miss out. Wales, Scotland and the regions of England will miss out. They desperately need a proactive regional policy to counter the inevitable centralisation that will accompany the creation of the free market.

If we intend to remain in the European Community and play a full part, we must be right in the centre. We must not look for exclusions such as that from the social chapter in an attempt to buy a short-term competitive edge which we know cannot be sustained. It would be far better for us to be in there, advocating the improvement of standards for working people in our industry as well as the industry of Europe. It would be better for us to be there when the Commission develops policies which affect other countries so that our circumstances and needs are taken into account. We must not be regarded for another decade as an offshore island which cannot determine whether or not we want to be part of Europe.

Mr. Stephen Milligan (Eastleigh): I wish to establish two points. The first is that the amendment is a wrecking amendment to the treaty of Maastricht. The second is that the amendment is undesirable.

When the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) rebutted my intervention, he said that I did not understand the position. The position as I understand it is as follows. Changes were made to the interpretation of the treaty at the Edinburgh summit to allow the Danes to have a second referendum. However, the amendment proposes a change to the body of the treaty. The treaty clearly specifies that Britain will not take part in the deliberations on the provisions of the social chapter or in their implementation. Therefore, the amendment would require the renewal of the ratification procedures in all the other EC member countries. It might require a new referendum in France and Ireland.

I understand the Opposition Front-Bench team saying that the other countries might be in sympathy with us because they supported the social chapter. That might be so, but they would face a severe legal problem. Their peoples and their Parliaments agreed to a specific treaty which did not include Britain in the social chapter.

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman referred to the referendums in Ireland and France. Does he accept that in their referendums the peoples of France and Ireland ratified not simply the treaty but the protocols?

Mr. Milligan: Precisely. The social chapter is a protocol to the treaty. If the hon. Gentleman reads page 117 he will find the specific protocol. That was the protocol which people in France and Ireland ratified.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Let me assist both my hon. Friend and the hon. Gentleman. Perhaps they will recall that there was a moment at which the Republic of Ireland had some problems with the proposals on abortion and its constitution. It asked its partners for a minor amendment to one protocol which would have had no effect on any other country. Ireland was denied such an amendment because it would have prompted ratification by all member states. So Opposition Members have no escape: they have tabled a wrecking amendment.

Mr. Milligan: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that clarification. I understand Opposition Members' political point that if they had negotiated the treaty they would have included the social chapter. But they did not. We are dealing with a treaty and the House must either accept it or reject it. The amendment is a wrecking amendment.

The second point that I wish to establish is that the amendment is undesirable. It is inappropriate for the Community to legislate on social matters. The treaty has established the principle of subsidiarity, which is that, wherever possible, issues should be decided at national level. One can put the case for social intervention and regulation of hours and wages, but that is a national decision. It is not appropriate for the Community to act in such matters.

In any case, the social chapter is damaging. Many Opposition Members have spoken of their concern for jobs. Conservative Members are also concerned for jobs. However, the fact is that raising industry's costs by introducing new regulations such as the 48-hour week—which, as my hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Duncan-Smith) said, is a damaging sign of what might come if we accepted the social chapter—would not create jobs. It would damage businesses and especially small businesses. It would be bad for Britain.

There is also an issue of freedom. In my constituency we have two bakeries. Unfortunately, my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) is not in the Chamber. He spoke of the exclusion of the French bakeries. There is no exclusion for British bakeries. The Mr. Kipling plant is in my constituency. As hon. Members may know it produces, "exceedingly good mince pies." British Bakeries is also in my constituency.

People work extremely long hours for not very high wages in those plants, and may work 60 or 70 hours a week in shifts starting at 6 pm and ending at 6 am. They do not work those hours because they like to do so, but because they want to earn money to feed their families. They have the right to work long hours if they choose. It is not right for bureaucrats in Brussels or Whitehall to determine what hours they should work.

The Labour party has always been committed to the principle of free collective bargaining and that is the chant that we have heard so often. Why is that not allowed to apply in this case? If trade union members freely agree that they wish to work long hours, why should a regulation made in Brussels—or a part of the Maastricht treaty, if Opposition Members have their way—be allowed to stop them? That would be a fundamental contradiction of a basic human right? I should be interested to know from the Labour Front Bench whether a Labour Government would allow free collective bargaining to dominate and whether they would allow workers the right to choose to work more than a 48-hour week.

The exclusion of the social chapter has positive advantages to this country as well as removing some negative aspects that might be associated with its adoption. Mr. Delors has said that this country will be a paradise for Japanese investment, which has been one of the few encouraging areas of job creation in recent years. More Japanese investment would be extremely good news for this country and for jobs.

The hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) raised the spectre of our undercutting our continental rivals. What is the danger in that? Surely that is what we must achieve if we want more jobs and increased exports, and if we want to put our balance of payments right.

Mr. Wigley: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that we should undercut them by virtue of our design, efficiency and use of capital, rather than by using legislation to build in the sort of edge that cannot possibly last?

Mr. Milligan: Frankly, I would agree to any edge that would create more jobs and prosperity. I believe that it will last, but even if it does not, let us take advantage of it while we can. I do not see any disadvantages.

The hon. Member for Copeland said that we could compete with Taiwan on price, but that we should be competing with Germany on quality. In the export business, one must compete on both price and quality. Unfortunately, British industry has not always succeeded in competing on quality, which means that we have a greater need to compete on price. The exclusion of the social chapter will bring us positive advantages in crucial export markets.

My hon. Friends the Members for Chingford and for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) said that we were already suffering from the effects of the treaty of Rome, and that the exclusion of the social chapter would not make a great difference. First, we are not debating the treaty of Rome——

Mr. Duncan-Smith: I never said that we were already suffering. I said that the treaty of Rome was empowered to a greater extent by the social policy amendments. We are discussing that treaty because we are discussing amendments to it and there may be a link with the European Court of Justice because of the route that we are choosing to take. Elements of the social chapter may have to be introduced. I was not saying anything else.

Mr. Milligan: I understand my hon. Friend's argument. In his speech, he said that there is a danger that the European Court might interpret the phrase "greater economic and social cohesion" in a way that would be unfavourable to this country. I believe that that phrase has little meaning. One could say that there was a danger that the court could interpret anything to mean something that we do not want it to mean, but we must work on the assumption that the treaty says what it means.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): It is precisely for that reason that I hope that my hon. Friend will agree that the treaty is riddled with socialist engineering and social philosphy. The cohesion funds, which are clearly stated in the treaty and which we are subscribing to, are nothing more or less than socialism in every conceivable respect. Does he not agree that, for that good reason, we have no reason to sign up for many of the provisions in the treaty?

Mr. Milligan: For once, I would entirely agree with my hon. Friend. Yes, the treaty contains social engineering —the social chapter, which we have opted out of, and which we are discussing. If by social engineering he means the phrase greater "economic and social cohesion", then he is reading far too much into it.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Milligan: I shall not give way again. I hope that Conservative Members can ally on that issue because we are all agreed that the social chapter, the social charter and the social protocol are damaging to jobs in this country and I hope that we can all find ourselves in the same Lobby on that issue.

Mr. Giles Radice (Durham, North): May I begin by declaring an injury, Dame Janet? I have a sprained ankle, but it was caused not by a hostile Euro-sceptic but by an over-enthusiastic Hampstead dog. It means that my speech will be very short and, with your indulgence, I shall have to stand while taking interventions because it is too painful for me to sit down.

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Dame Janet Fookes): Of course, we understand and will waive the usual rules where there is an injury—but not for anyone else.

Mr. Radice: Thank you very much, Dame Janet.

On the Conservative side, the debate has been an argument between the anti and pro-Europeans about whether the social chapter is excluded from the treaty and whether it will be watertight, rather than a debate about the advantages of the social chapter, which says something about the modern Conservative party. I think that I may safely predict that, if either the Heath or the Macmillan Governments had been negotiating the treaty, we would have had the social chapter. Only the modern Conservative party would have opted out in such a way, which says something about what has happened to that party.

Although the social chapter is outside the treaty, it is very much part of the system that the treaty sets up, because member states, except for the United Kingdom, accepted that social progress for people is as important as the free movement of goods, services and capital, and that is a good principle.

As the President of the Commission, Jacques Delors, rightly said, no one falls in love with the single market. If one wants a European Community which has the support of the people it must have a social dimension. Indeed, the Government recognise the force of that argument, because they are slightly worried about it. I have heard the Minister who is responsible for European affairs saying that the Government are in favour of the European Community having a social dimension. However, when they are offered the prospect of one, they opt out, and that is their problem. Other countries are in favour of the social dimension.

I sometimes think that Conservative Members cannot have read the social protocol.

Mr. Duncan-Smith indicated assent.

Mr. Radice: I am not sure whether I shall continue to carry the hon. Gentleman with me.

What is so terrible about article 2.1, which states:

"the Community shall support and complement the activities of the Member States in the following fields:
—improvement . . . of the working environment to protect workers' health and safety;
—working conditions"?

What is wrong with that? Are they against it? Are they against having more "information and consultation of workers"?

Are they against more

"equality between men and women with regard to labour market opportunities and treatment at work"?

Are they against

"the integration of persons excluded from the labour market"?

They should tell their constituents if they are, because we did not hear anything about that during the general election.

Conservative Members may be against those issues on which the Council will act unanimously, which are

"social security and social protection of workers; protection of workers where their employment contract is terminated; representation and collective defence of the interests of workers and employers."

Perhaps they are worried about them.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): I am delighted that the hon. Gentleman and I are standing at the same time; let us hope that we will still be at the end of the Committee. Although many Conservative Members approve of the protections to which the hon. Gentleman just referred, we object to being told by Brussels how to provide them. The matters under consideration are much better dealt with locally, at the factory level, by management and trade unions or employees.

7.30 pm

Mr. Radice: I am grateful for that intervention, because it allows me to say that the purpose of the social protocol is to establish minimum standards. It does not lay down how certain things should be done, or how far matters should go. It establishes minimum standards.

The old canard is that that protocol will apply to pay, the right of association, the right to strike or the right to impose lock-outs, but those matters are specifically excluded from it. It is about time that Conservative Members who talk so much about the protocol actually read it, because that would be very useful.

Mrs. Currie: Someone in France who is trying to keep a business going and to employ people may want to reduce his work force when times are difficult, but he finds that it is almost impossible to make people redundant in such circumstances. What happens is that the entire business must close and everyone has to be made redundant. Many business men who are running small companies feel that that is one of the reasons that the French unemployment rate is much higher than our own. One of the reasons why we object to that rule and to such a minimum standard is that it does not improve working conditions but reduces the number of jobs available.

Mr. Radice: I know that the hon. Lady has connections with France, but so do I, and I do not believe that the situation is as she describes. It is true that perhaps one or two employers complain about certain minimum conditions being imposed upon them, but those complaints are heard across Europe. If we are to have a decent Europe, we need to impose some minimum conditions. [HON. MEMBERS: "Who is 'we'?"] The European Community.

Mr. Cash: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, within the European Parliament, the European People's party is in favour of the social chapter? That party includes many Conservative Members of the European Parliament. Apparently they are enthusiastic about the proposals, and they have expressed their views through the EPP.

Mr. Radice: The hon. Gentleman has made an extraordinarily good point and his hon. Friends should dwell upon that, because they are the odd ones out. The Christian Democrats of Europe do not share Conservative Members' extraordinary view about what should happen.

Mr. Wigley: I should not like any credence to be given to the point made by the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie). Therefore, it is important to draw attention to article 2(2) of the protocol, which states:

"directives shall avoid imposing administrative, financial and legal constraints in a way which would hold back the creation and development of small and medium-sized undertakings."

Mr. Radice: It is a pity that the hon. Lady was not listening, because that was a devastating riposte to her intervention, which I wish I had used. However, I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has drawn our attention to it.

The second argument in favour of the social chapter is that of the level playing field, which was put extremely well by my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham). The argument is simple: if one has a level playing field for goods, services and capital, one needs a single labour market with common employment conditions. It is about fair competition. The other European countries accept that, and they do not see why we should try to gain a competitive advantage in a morally repugnant manner.

Mr. Derek Enright (Hemsworth): Is my hon. Friend aware that it is the stated intention of some of the larger firms that, if it comes to lay-offs, they will lay people off in this country first—precisely for the reasons outlined by the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South—because that is so much easier given our employment conditions?

Mr. Radice: That is a telling point.

The Government reject the argument for the social dimension—in practice if not in theory. They also reject the level playing field argument, because they have a particular model of the future Britain. They want it to be the sweatshop of Europe—the country and the economy that employs cheap labour and is unregulated. That argument was well put by Lord Ridley, who wants us to be the Hong Kong of Euurope. It would not be a good model to follow, because it is morally reprehensible and is doomed to failure. I do not believe that we would be able to compete by offering cheap labour in comparison with other countries. If we have a future, it is as a high-wage, high-tech, high-quality economy. That is the way in which we can compete. We would not be able to compete by adopting the model that has been put forward by those on the Conservative Benches—it is unattractive, and it is doomed to failure.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): The hon. Gentleman is making a persuasive case and it may be of interest to him, taking both sides of his argument, to know that one of the subsidiaries of one of the largest companies in this country has just closed a factory in Taiwan and reopened it in Manchester. I am rather in favour of repatriating jobs from abroad.

Mr. Radice: So am I, but I do not know the circumstances of that decision. I should like to consider it more closely before deciding whether it proved the hon. Gentleman's case or mine.

One or two Conservative Members argued powerfully that the opt-out may not prove to be watertight. As the hon. Member for Chingford sadi, the Maastricht treaty has reformed and amended the treaty of Rome and it could be used to introduce the elements of the social protocol. I know that that possibility has been denied by the Minister, but that serious point must be considered. In any case, the other countries will not allow us to continue to retain our advantage over them. It is no good thinking, therefore, that the existing social protocol, with our opt-out, will survive. When one has private conversations with Ministers, it is interesting to note that they share that view.

Mr. Dykes: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way while still standing up, which he has done courageously. He is well known as a good European and a fair-minded parliamentarian. Without embarrassing him, I should like to commend his excellent book on attitudes in Britain towards foreigners. It has done a great service to the Community, and I hope that more people will read it.

The hon. Gentleman has sought to compare our attitude to the treaty with that of other countries. He also said that the hon. Member for Copeland made a good speech—that is his opinion, but I do not believe that it is shared by those on the Conservative Benches. Was he not shocked by the reaction of his hon. Friend, who represents the official Opposition, to the extremely important constitutional and technical point made by my right hon. Friend the Minister? He said that, if the Opposition amendment were carried tonight, it would not be possible for us to ratify the treaty. No Foreign Office Minister would say that unless he had been given expert constitutional advice from his officials at the Department.

In riposte to that point—and in anticipation thereof, almost—the shadow spokesman on foreign affairs made an astonishing assertion, about which I am still shocked —as, I am sure, is the hon. Gentleman, as a fair-minded person. The hon. Member for Copeland said that all the other member states—presumably he had consulted them officially through their Governments, because there would be no point consulting their opposition parties—would be quite happy with the procedure he had outlined of slipping back into the treaty, once the amendment had been passed. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that that is totally impossible, impracticable, and unacceptable constitutionally? Will the hon. Gentleman comment on that matter, which is just as important as all those flaccid assertions?

Mr. Radice: The hon. Gentleman is trying to create an alibi for why he will not be voting with us. I know that the Government are trying to obtain support among possible doubters because they know that they are vulnerable on the amendment. I do not believe that it would be impossible to devise a mechanism to which we could quickly adhere, particularly as all the other countries are so enthusiastic for us to join the protocol, were it passed.

Mr. Duncan-Smith: In line with what I said earlier, if within the body of the treaty that is judiciable by the European Court of Justice, there are areas where the social provisions can be introduced because the intention of the majority of nations exists, does the hon. Gentleman agree that what others refer to as general language in titles II and III, can now be seen as specific and clear?

Mr. Radice: I agree with that. Might that not be one way forward were the amendment to be carried? It might be one way in which the Commission and the other member states could move to ensure that we were able to adhere to the social protocol—I do not know. Given that everyone is in favour of it, I do not believe that it would be impossible to devise such a mechanism. The European Community is good at devising such mechanisms, provided that there is a consensus.

Mr. James Paice (Cambridgeshire, South-East): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Radice: Yes, but this must be the last time, as it is not fair to other hon. Members who wish to speak.

Mr. Paice: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, as I have tried to intervene several times.

I refer to the level playing field that the hon. Gentleman described and his belief that, in one way or another, the rest of the Community will not allow us to get away with the treaty as it stands. The protocol is only a framework of objectives. It clearly states that directive regulations will have to follow from it. Some 13 months have already passed since the treaty was agreed and, in that time, the recession has deepened throughout the Community in different ways.

The belief has become much stronger, not only among industry in many parts of the Community, but among politicians in the Community, that overweening social legislation in the labour market is counter-productive and that much of the protocol may never happen. By the time that the Commission brings forward the directives and regulations that it envisages, the attitude may have hardened, so that many of the other 11 member states will then be saying that the protocol seemed a good idea at the time, but they do not want it now.

Mr. Radice: I do not know whether that that will be the case. If it is, what is so terrifying about our amendment and the social protocol? As the hon. Gentleman rightly said, it merely lays down some general principles. That is why some of the Conservative propaganda has been so incredibly exaggerated. The Government know perfectly well that the protocol sets down principles. The hon. Gentleman should have a word with Tory central office to tone it down.

Mr. Paice: Has the hon. Gentleman ever tried to do that?

Mr. Michael Spicer: I want to be absolutely clear about what the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) has said. Am I right in thinking that he will be voting for amendment No. 27? I imagine that there are reasons why he may not wish to do so.

Mr. Radice: Of course I shall vote for it. The hon. Gentleman is being ridiculous. [Interruption.] With great respect, Dame Janet——

The Second Deputy Chairman: It strikes me that the hon. Gentleman is in order.

7.45 pm

Mr. Radice: The hon. Member for Worcestershire, South (Mr. Spicer) made a foolish point—I know that it may be important to him. If we can persuade him to vote with us, I do not mind on what grounds he does so—I want him to vote with us.

I shall give some advice to the pro-Maastricht Conservatives: if they wish the Bill to have a swift passage, they should vote for the social chapter. One of the unattractive parts of our political system is its divisive nature. There is a pro-Maastricht majority in the House of Commons, but the Conservative Government have prevented that majority from emerging because they have not been prepared to take the Opposition with them. That contrasts with what has happened in Federal Germany, where the Social Democratic party has been consulted by the Government, the Christian Democratic Union. SPD concerns about the treaty have been taken into account and brought together into a national consensus.

That has not happened in this country. On the contrary, on almost every occasion the Conservative Government have been divisive and tried to gain party advantage out of the European issue. That was a great mistake, made to the detriment of this country. I appeal to some Conservative Members—who freely offer their advice to Labour Members—that if the Government will not take the action, it is up to the pro-European Conservatives. They also have responsibilities and if they are so keen on Europe, they should vote for the amendment—not tonight, but soon.

The Minister for Industry (Mr. Tim Sainsbury): The hon. Gentleman has made an interesting point about the process of opposition and government. Is he attributing the frequency with which the Opposition change their mind on Europe to that process?

Mr. Enright: The Minister is at it again.

Mr. Radice: Exactly—the Government try to make party advantage. I am not trying to do so. It would be a refreshing change if, for once in the Committee, the Government did not try to make party advantage. Perhaps we should follow the example set by the anti-Europeans—at least they do not make advantage out of each other. The two sets of anti-Europeans get together. It might be a good idea if there was more consensus among those who support the Maastricht treaty.

Several Hon. Members rose——

The Second Deputy Chairman: I think that the hon. Gentleman has concluded his speech. I call Mr. George Walden.

Mr. George Walden (Buckingham): I have to make a convoluted point. It will probably come out in a simple way, because when I try to make a simple point it comes out convoluted. My speech has to be convoluted because it was designed for yesterday's debate on culture, but I must mentally switch it into the context of the social chapter.

The social chapter symbolises why the Maastricht treaty is misconceived. There is no escaping the fact that social legislation, as conceived in countries like France and Germany, is of a broadly corporate nature. I am not making a party political point, as I believe that the French, who have a completely different tradition from this country in matters of state, society and politics, have every right to that corporate tradition.

The French have every right to take an entirely different approach to matters of culture, as we discussed yesterday. That approach is, broadly, from the top down. That is true of the social chapter, where everything is regulated among the workers, employers and state. That is fine by me. I certainly do not want to deprecate that country, partly because I love it, partly because what the French do is up to them, and partly because they have not been unsuccessful in many spheres. However, our tradition—and those of some other European countries—is not the same as the French tradition.

I believe that I know not only where the social chapter of the Maastricht Bill originated but where other sections originated: in the fertile minds of some extremely intelligent, estimable, social democratic rather than socialist Frenchmen. They have every right to conceive of their Europe, but they have absolutely no right to thrust it on us. I draw a careful distinction between what can and does work in continental countries, with their distinct traditions, and what will not work in this country. Indeed, it is undesirable that it should work here, because it is not our way of thinking or the way that we do things, whether in social matters, in culture or in education.

I am not demonising Mr. Delors, who I know and greatly respect. I used to discuss these matters with him in the 1970s. He and his then party—he was a social democrat, but moving to the socialists—had a vision of Europe. They were frank about it. They wanted a socialist France—a certain idea of France, as they put it—and to extend it to other countries. Socialist Spain and Italy were to be part of the Community, as was Britain, which at that time also had a socialist Government. It was a social democratic and socialist political vision.

Mr. Radice: Of course the treaty is supported by social democrats and socialists throughout Europe, but we would be the first to say that it is not all our own work. It is rather absurd to suggest that the treaty comes entirely from the mind of Mr. Delors. There are other important forces in favour of the treaty, especially the Christian Democrats and the group to which the Conservative party in the European Parliament belongs. They support it because it is in their tradition.

Mr. Walden: The hon. Gentleman makes his point. I accept that I am dealing, of necessity, in generalities because we are discussing 12 different countries and many different cultures, which is the problem with the treaty. Geenerally speaking, the social chapter, as with so many other chapters—indeed, the whole treaty—is misconceived because it attempts to do the impossible and the undesirable.

I shall give one concrete example of why it is impossible and to show my enormous flexibility of mind on this matter. The social chapter says that there should be worker representation. Who in their right mind could be against that? We could not possibly be against voluntary worker representation, agreed within the firm with the bosses. That is something that the Tories have successfully encouraged, escpecially in small firms. Rather than having things imposed by unions, people get together around a table and sort them out for themselves.

That tradition has been alive and well in Germany for many years. It has functioned well and has helped the Germans. However, it has happened against an entirely different social and historical background from that which, unfortunately, prevails in Britain. Let us face it: we go back to the 18th century and class animosity. That is why I am strongly opposed to the imposition of worker representation within our antiquated union framework.

Mrs. Currie: I am glad that my hon. Friend has made the point that he, like me, is opposed to the compulsory imposition of such rules. Does he accept that those wonderful labour relations laws in Germany have had one significant effect—that its unit manufacturing costs for similar products in similar businesses to those in the United Kingdom are twice as high there as they are here?

Mr. Walden: I am pleased that my hon. Friend made that point because it leads on naturally to another point, which I shall make later.

This chapter of the treaty, like many others, pushes co-operation in Europe way beyond what is necessary or desirable. The end result will be to weaken Europe, and that is what really worries me about the Bill. Maastricht will impose impossible strains and confusions on Europe that will work against cohesion and co-operation and, in the longer term, give rise to the sort of nationalism to which we are all opposed.

The hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) asked how anyone could be against improving the working environment. No one is. However, I invite him to meet a constituent of mine, Mr. Alf Baxendale of Cementone in Buckingham, and discuss with him the pile of papers that he has that tell him, for example, how many cans of paint his employees can lift at one go. If the Commission were given more powers in that area, there would be a great deal more of that sort of thing and the lives of Mr. Baxendale and many other employers, both small and large, would become impossible.

Mr. Dykes: Does my hon. Friend's assertion mean that he rejects the health and safety regulations, which are very strict on such matters, that are already either implicit in or built in to the treaty?

Mr. Walden: No. I gave an example of how bureaucratic matters can get out of hand under existing legislation. I strongly believe, as do the Government, that they would become farcically out of hand if the social chapter was accepted and the Commission was thereby given even more scope to interfere in the affairs of Mr. Baxendale and other employers.

I recognise the fact that the Government have opted out of the chapter. They may say that that therefore weakens my point about it being symbolic of a misconceived treaty, which is the way that I regard Maastricht, but there is a limit to how many chapters from which the Government can opt out. The Maastricht treaty is littered with parallel problems to those of the social chapter, culture, which we discussed last night, being one.

We must not forget that it has been only during the last couple of years that we have decided, possibly wrongly, to have a Minister responsible for culture. Why? It is because we have a wholly different approach to culture from that of other countries. In France, the Culture Minister is one of the top Ministers, active across the board. That does not mean that that makes France worse than Britain. France has Beaubourg. I quite like Beaubourg and I quite like the way France does things, but I would not want to emulate it either in cultural or social matters. That is what is wrong with the treaty; it tries to homogenise all sorts of cultures —economic, cultural, social and so on. That cannot and should not be done—[Interruption.] Before my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) gets carried away, I shall deal with her point and develop it.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): The hon. Gentleman is talking rubbish. When I was a Minister I negotiated several directives. I found that most of the countries were doing much the same thing at the same time. We agreed directives which did not thrust things down other people's throats but which involved harmonisation.

Is the hon. Gentleman saying that people in the north of Italy who speak German will have homogeneity forced on them? Surely, whatever people's language or culture, they should have cultural rights as they move around Europe. That is the current problem in the former Yugoslavia, where people have not learnt to live with the different rights to religion, language and script within one large continent.

Mr. Walden: The hon. Gentleman has two problems —one of language and one of logic. If he can think of no better criticism than to say "rubbish", perhaps he should study the education section of the treaty.

The hon. Gentleman suggested that European Governments were doing all these things in parallel anyway. My whole point is that there is no need artificially to harmonise them and that it could be dangerous to do so. Most sensible things are already being done by broadly sensible countries under the impetus of their own social needs. Therefore, generally, the hon. Gentleman has been making my point.

8 pm

I come back to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South—competition. While we are discussing the Bill, whether education or culture yesterday or the social chapter that will not go through because the Government will not accept it today, many things are happening in the world. We have Iraq, Bosnia and a new American President. All sorts of things are happening in the world, while we are wasting the time of the House and the Government, wasting the efforts of Europe and dissipating the international influence of Europe by this introverted, nit-picking nonsense that the treaty represents.

While we are discussing the social chapter here and how, from the Opposition's point of view, we will put up and regulate the cost of British and European business even more thereby stifling competition, what, to choose but one example, is happening in southern China? Shanghai had a 20 per cent. growth rate last year. One may not like the regime—few of us do; I do not—but we will have to contend with what is going on there in a big way during the next few years.

I talked to one business man recently who told me that he bought not complicated but good lathes from Shanghai for less than the price of the components in Britain. That is the sort of thing that we in Britain and Europe will have to face. Meanwhile, the Opposition and Europe are talking about ways to put even greater trammels on our industry and impede its competitiveness even more.

Mr. Enright: Is the hon. Gentleman seriously suggesting that we should be putting our wage levels and human rights on a par with the southern Chinese? If so, I would deny absolutely everything that he said.

Mr. Walden: What does one say to that sort of remark? It is so silly. I was trying to make a perfectly serious point. If the hon. Gentleman is asking me whether I am in favour —my God, how boring and laborious this is—of British wages and working conditions being the same as those in Canton or Shanghai, guess what the answer is—no, I am not. Satisfied?

I think that I have just about said everything that I wanted to say.

Mr. Marlow: My hon. Friend will have heard our right hon. Friend the Minister telling colleagues, "It doesn't matter. It isn't going to happen. Let's vote for it anyhow."

Mr. Walden: I am perfectly serious when I say that the best thing that could happen for Britain and Europe would be for Maastricht not to happen. What concerns me, and where I sympathise strongly with the Government, is that I do not want any sort of overt clash with Europe, British isolation and all the rest of it. What I would like to see is the treaty run slowly and decorously into the sands.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): I hope that the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Walden) will pardon me if I do not directly follow his argument—convoluted or otherwise, although in the end it came down, as he said at the beginning, to the simple proposition that we are different. It is a proposition which is often heard on the other side of the argument.

It is said that we in Britain are different and unique and do not have the same social and economic culture, so things like Maastricht will not work. I do not agree with that, but I return to the social chapter, which has produced as much confrontation between the two main parties as anything else in the Maastricht treaty. Labour has been consistently, firmly and solidly in favour of it, and the Conservatives have been equally consistently, firmly and solidly against it.

In many ways, I rather agree with the hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Duncan-Smith), who made what we would all agree was an excellent contribution. It seems that the confrontation is rather out of proportion, because the social chapter in the treaty of Rome—which, after all, is the basic treaty to which we adhered in 1973—is not that different from the social chapter in the Maastricht treaty. Much of it is exactly the same. Article 118 of the treaty of Rome clearly states that the Commission will have the task of promoting close co-operation in

> "—employment,
> —labour legislation and working conditions,
> —occupational and continuation training,
> —social security,
> —protection against occupational accidents and diseases,
> —the law as to trade unions, and collective bargaining"— and so on, and so on.

That has been the position since 1973. In some respects, the Maastricht treaty limits the treaty of Rome in the social sphere. The social chapter of the Maastricht treaty states that it seeks "the promotion of employment, improved living and working conditions, proper social protection, dialogue between management and labour, the development of human resources".

It also mentions the need to "take account of the diverse forms of national practices, in particular in the field of contractual relations, and the need to maintain the competitiveness of the Community economy."

I find it difficult to understand what everyone is getting so worked up about. The hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) quoted article 2, paragraph 2 of the Maastricht treaty which says:

"the Council may adopt, by means of directives, minimum requirements for gradual implementation"— and so on. One finds pretty well the same stuff in the treaty of Rome. It says:

"The Commission, on a proposal, may, acting by means of a qualified majority vote . . . minimum requirements for gradual limitation."

All the stuff about equal pay for men and women is practically the same in the treaty of Rome as in the Maastricht treaty. Therefore, I find it difficult to understand why there is such a noise about it. Quite apart from the plain arguments about right and wrong—to the hon. Member for Buckingham I would say that in politics simple arguments about right and wrong are often the most potent——

Mr. Walden: Does the hon. Gentleman mean that the simple answer to my argument is that he is right and I am wrong?

Sir Russell Johnston: Yes.

The Liberal Democrats position on the social chapter has been clear and sustained. In our manifesto at the last election, we stated:

"We will renounce Britain's social chapter opt-out and argue for a more flexible framework of social policy across the Community. The EC should set down minimum standards of health and safety and employee rights, leaving national governments and enterprises to decide how to meet them."

That, broadly, is what one finds in the social chapter.

For Liberals, the Community must have a social dimension. We could not believe in anything other than a Community which accepts the need to set down basic standards for workers' rights in the form of a social chapter, although there can always be legitimate debate about the precise nature of its content. It is a wide area within which there are bound to be disagreements about ways and means.

At the end of the 20th century I find it extraordinary to listen to Conservative Members portraying social policy as a handicap. An hon. Lady who has just disappeared—I do not know her constituency, but certainly she does not believe in tailoring her dress to her political view, because she was attired in bright red—spoke, in a telling phrase of "shedding the shackles of social policy". Others said that the social policy would reduce our competitive capacity. That was the argument used by mine owners in the last century to justify sending little children down the mines.

Mr. Cash: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Russell Johnston: I wish that the hon. Gentleman would contain himself. Indeed, it would be greatly to the benefit of all hon. Members if he contained himself more often. Nevertheless, I will give way to him. [HON. MEMBERS: "Not too many times, please."] Unfortunately, I believe that one of the good things about the Chamber is the way in which hon. Members can interrupt each other, and the fact that hon. Members are not allowed to get away with saying certain things—although that creates risks for me sometimes.

Before I give way to the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash), let me finish what I was saying. It is extraordinary that we should consider ourselves so different—perhaps it would be more appropriate to say "so backward"—that we cannot contemplate introducing the same protections and conditions for workers as France, Germany the Netherlands or any other Community country. I consider that nonsense.

Mr. Cash: I was intrigued—especially in view of the hon. Gentleman's party's historical background—to hear him refer to workers' conditions, and to the days of child slave labour. Disraeli laid enormous emphasis on the requirement for proper social conditions: that was one of the key factors that led to his great Administration, and the One Nation group in the Conservative party has always taken him as its mentor. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that there is a respectable Conservative tradition that runs in the same direction as his argument?

Sir Russell Johnston: If the hon. Gentleman is saying that there are respectable Conservatives as well as non-respectable Conservatives, I agree. Many Conservative Members—unlike the hon. Gentleman—support the Maastricht treaty; many Conservative Members of the European Parliament support the social chapter, and the whole concept of social cohesion in the Community. One feature of the Conservative party is that much of its policy can be ordered à la carte. I suppose that that has certain advantages.

Both the hon. Member for Copeland and the Minister of State, in several interventions, raised the possible effect of removing the protocol on social policy on ratification. That is relevant to amendment No. 27. I must be frank: although I do not think that it will create any dilemma for us, there is no point in pretending that that is not a possibility, and I therefore feel that it should be addressed directly.

From the outset, the Liberal Democrats have made their reservations about the Maastricht treaty well known. It is not perfect; it does not advance the Community in the federal direction that I favour. Nevertheless, we believe that the treaty must be ratified. Its rejection would strike a severe blow at both European integration and the overall stability of the continent. It was for that reason that, amid much criticism, we voted with the Government during the paving debate.

I shall not rehearse the details of our argument; basically, we acted as we did because we believed that it was necessary to progress to consideration of the Bill. Although it is true that the Government were busy using that debate as the means for a vote of confidence for their supporters—and, to an extent, the Opposition—the fact is that, had they lost, they would have engineered a genuine vote of confidence the following day and, with the support of the Euro-sceptics, they would have remained in office.

Our priority, now as then, is not to keep the Government in office—pleasant and amiable though the present Minister may be—but to bring about genuine progress towards the earliest possible ratification of the treaty. I see no reason for us to change that stance. Like the hon. Member for Copeland, we have taken legal advice on the impact of cancelling the United Kingdom's opt-out from the social chapter on the other 11 member states and the Community's procedures. The advice that we have received from our partner Liberal Democratic parties in other European countries, and in the European Parliament, suggests a consistency of legal opinion across a number of countries which is at variance with the views expressed by the Government—and, indeed, by the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) in various interventions.

8.15 pm

Our advice suggests that, while such a cancellation would theoretically require a new intergovernmental conference, might theoretically require re-ratifications and —in the event of an intergovernmental conference—might result in other member states' calling for additional changes to the treaty, making that the excuse that would lead to, as it were, a bleeding of the accord, such a consequence seems most unlikely. All the other member states have accepted the social chapter, and a decision by Britain to adhere to it would present them with no political problems. After all, they have already tried very hard to persuade us to do so.

There is a precedent. In 1972, when Norway decided not to join the Community, the text of the Act concerning the conditions of accession and the adjustments to the treaty had to be modified. Theoretically, that required an intergovernmental conference; in practice, however, it was implemented by a simple Council decision—an ordinary Community legal instrument, binding in its entirety on those to whom it was addressed.

The problem is here, in this country. It lies in the Government's well set out but inflexible position—I do not suggest that they have deceived anyone—and the way in which a defeat of the United Kingdom opt-out would affect them. Such a defeat certainly seems possible, even likely. It does not require a high standard of numeracy to work out that, if Labour and the Liberal Democrats combined with the nationalist parties—and probably the Irish—the Government's fate would rest on the decision of the dissident group within the Conservative party: the Euro-sceptics. Although in the past—and, indeed, during this Committee stage—many of them have been extremely vocal in their condemnation of the social chapter, their priority is clearly the defeat of the Bill, and I am sure that they would not hesitate to cry havoc and let slip the dogs of war.

The Euro-sceptics would vote for the social chapter not because they support it, but in the belief that it would provide a means of preventing the treaty's ratification. But would it? That is the central question. If I were persuaded that ratification would be impossible if the protocol on social policy were removed, it would not be inconsistent for me to vote against amendment No. 27—no more inconsistent than our support on Second Reading for the Bill minus the social chapter, or our support for the Government in regard to the paving motion. If the United Kingdom does not ratify the treaty, it will collapse, and with it the new social chapter. As I have said, however, I do not believe that we are facing that possibility yet.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I am listening carefully to the hon. Gentleman, as, indeed, is the whole House. It will not surprise him to learn that I consider it unlikely that any Conservative Member would find it possible to support the social protocol; that, however, is a matter for my hon. Friends.

The hon. Gentleman knows that the social protocol is an integral part of the treaty of Rome. We shall be party to that protocol even if the arrangements of the 11, which are attached to it, do not apply to the United Kingdom. It follows that if the amendment were carried, United Kingdom law would not conform to the provisions of the treaty so we could not ratify it. Thereafter, an intergovernmental conference would have to take place.

The hon. Gentleman may not have been present when I mentioned this before, but when the Irish Government were confronted with a technical point on a protocol relating entirely to abortion—one which did not affect any other member state's ability to ratify—they were denied the opportunity of a 30-second intergovernmental conference to make that amendment, because other member states feared the consequences for the future of the treaty if a new intergovernmental conference were held.

It is true that under article 236 of the treaty of Rome, once an intergovernmental conference has taken place to amend the treaty, the amendment

"shall enter into force after being ratified by all Member States in accordance with their respective constitutional rules."

Whatever disagreements we may have about the direction in which we wish the European Community to go, I think that there will be common ground between me and the Liberal Democrats we should not wish to subject the Community again to the six months through which the Community has recently lived—the Danish and French referendums and other demarches. Therefore, I was pleased to hear what the hon. Gentleman said, and I hope that he will continue to reflect on these issues.

Sir Russell Johnston: I have nothing to add, but my only comment on what the Minister said is that the advice we have thus far been given does not accord with what he said. However, I shall consider it carefully.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Where does the hon. Gentleman's party stand—will it vote for or against amendment No. 27?

Sir Russell Johnston: I have just told the Committee, and there is no point in repeating myself. I am grateful for having had the opportunity to speak to the Committee.

Sir Teddy Taylor: I apologise for having been absent for an hour—I was in Committee Room 19 addressing a European teach-in for the Bermondsey Conservative Association. That explains my absence, although I have been here for the rest of the debates.

Not for the first time, the Minister of State has put us in a difficult position. We know that he is a difficult person, but people like me, who are worried about the implications of the Maastricht treaty and horrified about the decision not to allow the people to have their say, were astonished to hear the Minister say at the beginning that if this amendment, proposed by the Labour party, was to be accepted, it would not be possible for the Government to ratify the treaty. That leaves us in a difficult position.

Until I heard this debate, I was inclined to abstain in the vote, because all the nonsense about the social chapter and the great debates between our two parties are basically bogus. Conservative Members are telling their constituents that, if the social chapter is accepted, the red brigade will take over, trade union laws will be changed and we shall again have a red revolution in the United Kingdom. However, Labour hon. Members are saying that, if we do not have a social chapter, British workers will continue to be ground into the dust by the nasty employers because we shall not have the right to protect them.

I appreciate that, although those words were not used in the excellent speech of the Labour Front-Bench spokesman, in Essex Labour supporters have been saying that openly, even in places such as that represented by my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess). Such views have, to some extent, been reflected in today's debate.

It was made abundantly clear in two excellent speeches by two of my younger hon. Friends—one of whom was the hon. Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin)—that the debate is based on bogus rubbish. It is clear that a huge amount of legislation relating to social affairs has already been passed. If hon. Members were wise enough to go to the Library, they would find a long list of trade union legislation and legislation on the rights of people which has already been passed.

For example, under the social action programme of the European Community, as of 1 May 1992, of the 50 proposals contained in the programme, 38 have been published and, of those, 21 had been agreed. They relate to a wide range of matters affecting the rights of people, the rights of women and opportunities for employment.

Let us consider the astonishing 48-hour week directive. Baroness Thatcher must be appalled that part of the Single European Act for which she fought so hard—I voted against it because I was doubtful about it—is being used to promote that directive. As some hon. Members may know, yesterday I asked the Minister of State, Department of Employment what we are going to do about it because it is being implemented under the, health and safety conventions of the Single European Act. I was told that, if the directive remained unchanged, the Government would consider going to the European Court. Most of it has already been discussed and agreed, including the remarkable paragraph which states that French bakers should be exempt from the 48-hour week but that British bakers should not. When I inquired why that had been agreed, I was told that it was part of the bargaining process.

Two facts have emerged. First, it is almost certain that the 48-hour week directive would be supported by the European Court if the Government were to challenge it —that does not seem to be in doubt—and we are bargaining like mad to get something which is broadly acceptable. Therefore, if the Minister considers it absolutely terrible and frightful, he should think again, because most of it will happen anyway.

The Minister may ask why, if that is so, did anyone bother to include that particular protocol? The reason why the social chapter was wanted was basically one of presentation. The European Community is constantly increasing its power. The court, the Commission and some of the members who do not scrutinise measures adequately are adding to its powers all the time. The sad fact is that today we have not heard one example of the type of legislation which might be introduced under the social chapter but could not be introduced under existing legislation. Therefore, the whole argument is bogus. It will not make a great difference whether we have a social charter.

I wish that hon. Members would have the courage to face what is happening. We must remember that articles 2 and 3 of the treaty will add enormously to the legislation on which the European Court can rule as being relevant for the European Community. We should also not forget the possibility that the exclusion of the United Kingdom might cause problems in fair trading across frontiers. Some of the legal people whom I have consulted and who have written me letters have said that a case could be made for saying that we are in breach of that aspect of the treaty. However, that is pretty irrelevant.

Whether or not we have a social charter will make precious little difference. The social charter excludes many areas of activity about which particular concern has been expressed. If Conservative hon. Members are doubtful about the dangers of current legislation, they should consider the details of the 48-hour week directive, which is horrifying.

There is always the possibility—although I would not suggest that it might be true—that the Minister of State is wrong in saying that, if we have a social chapter and get rid of the protocol, we must therefore scrap the treaty. I do not say that because he is in the habit of being wrong, but Ministers can sometimes be badly advised when they have to give urgent advice. However, if what he said is correct, we would have another opportunity to consider the issue. If the amendment were passed, we still have Report stage during which issues can be reviewed.

The Minister should be aware that there is a large groundswell of opinion in the Conservative party—it has been supported by two excellent speeches tonight—to the effect that, sadly, the process has been going through, is going through and will continue to go through under previous legislation. The social chapter will make precious little difference.

8.30 pm

However, tonight hon. Members will have to vote on whether we want to promote the ratification of Maastricht. I would love there to be a referendum for the people—but I know that if I so much as mention the word I shall be told that I cannot talk about that because it will be discussed later.

As the Minister of State has said clearly and precisely that if the social chapter is included we cannot ratify the treaty, hon. Members will appreciate that that is what we shall be voting on tonight. Having made that idea abundantly clear, the Minister of State may want to say now that it is not as simple as that. The Government may wish to say that, because of the uncertainty, there may be a case for allowing the people of Britain to make up their minds for themselves. As always, the Minister of State endeavours to be helpful to all hon. Members. He tries to put facts clearly and precisely before them, but he should be aware that although it is nice and pleasant when he makes the position so clear, in doing so he has created problems in the minds of hon. Members such as myself.

I do not want to give additional powers——

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): I have listened carefully to the hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) agonising. Over the years I have heard him agonising quite a lot. What he is saying is interesting and valuable to the House, but may I make it clear that, because of the rules of order, we shall not vote this evening on the crucial issue over which, rightly, he is apprehensive. We shall reach the vote on amendment No. 27 at a much later stage. However, I endorse the hon. Gentleman's apprehensions, and welcome his support, if such support is possible, for amendment No. 27.

Sir Teddy Taylor: That is the problem. I appreciate that we shall not vote on amendment No. 27 tonight. We are all aware of that; we try to follow matters—although I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. But how does that help us? It will make it more difficult. We shall have to talk to more people. We shall have to talk to our constituents and tell them that we are in an impossible position. We have voted against giving extra power to the EC—and extra cash, too. As the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) is well aware, the proposals concerned involve giving more cash to Europe—more European expenditure. In my view, that is wasted money and jobs in Britain will be destroyed.

All the examples that we have seen of the EC spending money—the common agricultural policy, among other things—have destroyed jobs and wasted money. It would be infinitely better if all the EC expenditure plans, subsidies, seminars and all those great conferences which Foreign Office officials attend, were abolished, and instead we sent aeroplanes to Europe to drop £10 notes at random. The money would be far more effectively directed than it is now.

I do not want the EC to take control of educational and cultural policy, as it does now. I am happy to be a Conservative and to say that the EC wastes money on fraudulent schemes.

Mr. Duncan-Smith: To help my hon. Friend to develop the argument whether, if the amendment were passed, it would destroy the process of ratifying Maastricht—that is an important concept to establish—may I add that the protocol would simply allow the other 11 countries which signed it to use the administration of the EC after Maastricht is ratified to put those arrangements into effect? If that connection were broken, the process of ratification must come to a halt. There would then have to be an immediate intergovernmental conference, because the whole set-up would have to be reconfigured and pushed back out for ratification. That is quite clear; most legal minds would come to that conclusion.

Sir Teddy Taylor: I had been doubtful about what the Minister of State said—not because I doubt him as a person, but because the Foreign Office sometimes says things and then has to revise them. But my hon. Friend's support removes that doubt and that makes my problem even greater.

Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen may laugh at what I say, and they may attribute my actions to all kinds of causes. But I have nothing to gain and nothing to lose from all this. I am a chap who has been here a long time and I have no ambitions. But I have seen more misery, unemployment, and horror in Southend on Sea over the past year than I have ever seen in my life—and I have spent most of my time in this place representing a Scottish constituency. Things are terrible. When I think of the money wasted on the EC, on fraud, and on forcing up food prices artificially; when I think of the horrors of the EC's loss of trade throughout the world, and the way in which step by step it is ceasing to compete in the world; when I think of the growing unemployment, I want to stop more money and more power going to the EC.

As has rightly been said, we have listened to the arguments year after year. In fairness I must say that the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) is one of the most conscientious Members of the House. He is always here—and he, too, has heard time and again people saying, "Perhaps things are not right. Just give the EC a bit more power. Let them sit round a table and allow them to control things, and somehow things will get better." Instead, things got worse and worse and worse.

Our trade with Europe is getting worse, and the amount that we pay into Europe is growing. The burdens on the poor people of Britain are getting infinitely worse. We must remember that the people who suffer from all this are not Members of Parliament, who have decent salaries and sometimes other incomes, too, but the poor people. It is they who are losing their jobs and cannot get them back. They are paying an extra £17·50 a week for their food, and the £4 membership fee. All this matters a great deal to them.

When the Government introduced the Maastricht treaty, I said, "No, this is wrong—wrong for Southend and wrong for Britain." All kinds of terrible pressures were put upon us, but I said no. I could not care less what they do —I shall vote against Maastricht because it is wrong.

I think that the amendment is bogus nonsense. I do not believe that the social chapter will make any great difference. But then the Minister, supported by my hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Duncan-Smith), who clarified the situation, says that if the amendment is accepted the treaty cannot be ratified. The treaty will be gone; it will be finished and they will have to start again. That gives me hope and expectation. I am delighted that, because of the rules of order, we shall not vote on the amendment tonight, and I hope that all hon. Members will think carefully about how to vote when the occasion arises. They will not be voting simply on the social chapter or the protocol; they will be voting whether they want to ratify the treaty.

My hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, North made a brilliant speech earlier today, in which he made his position absolutely clear. What he said clarified again the fact that we are dealing with something terribly important and significant. We shall vote on whether we ratify Maastricht.

Fortunately, there are several days, perhaps even several weeks, before we have to make the decision, but I hope that hon. Members will appreciate what they are voting about. We shall not be voting for the nonsense of party propaganda; we shall not vote for those silly Tories who say that red revolution will come from the social chapter; we shall not vote for stupid socialists who say that without the social chapter the employers will take over and screw down the workers. We shall be voting on the ratification of Maastricht. In those circumstances, I hope that all hon. Members will think most carefully and prudently before deciding how to cast their votes.

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): I should like to address the industrial aspects of amendment No. 7.

The hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) has made a point that is quite different from those made by most other Conservative Members. Most Tory Members have said that the reason for opting out of the social dimension is to protect British industry from the so-called burdens of the social chapter. Another argument has also been used: that if we were to increase the costs of industry, inward investment would probably be curtailed. I think that both those arguments are wrong, and my opinion in that regard is based on my own 25 years' experience in industry and commerce before I became a Member of Parliament. Matters are far more complex than these arguments suggest.

There is also the political dimension, which, in reality, has been excluded for the purpose of holding parts of the Conservative party together during the passage of the Bill. In other words, at the back of all this there is a cosmetic exercise.

The history of the Government's policy for industry, shows that it has been absolutely disastrous. The capacity of British industry has been reduced drastically, and the development of high-tech industries in particular has been impaired by lack of Government help. Investment in manufacturing industry in this country has been very poor, leaving it not only reduced in size but also in many cases out of date. The monetarist views that we had during the 1980s were based on the argument that the return from investment in British industry would be pretty low—3 or 4 per cent.—whereas in other sectors of the economy the return would be far greater. Thus, British industry was largely neglected.

There is no point in Conservative Members' thinking that, if we get an opt-out built into the legislation, nothing else will be needed for British industry. That is wrong. The package that we need is a complex one, but it certainly includes investment incentives. We need a well trained work force, we need people in the right places at the right time, and we need demand in the economy. There is a shortage of good policies for industry.

A good social policy for industry can result in greater profitability. The notion that simple reduction of costs is the only route to profitability is quite often fallacious. Much depends on what sort of industry one is in.

A few days ago, I had a meeting with a number of directors of BP. Many of the things that the social contract refers to are already done by such companies. They say, "What on earth are Members of Parliament talking about? These practices already exist in most modern, profitable, efficient industries." The assumption—it is one that has been made many times today—is that, on aggregate, low labour costs result in greater profits. That is a highly questionable assumption.

Let us take the high-tech industries. What one needs in the case of computers, information technology networks, and so on—value-added industries that can be highly profitable—is good working conditions and a work force who are well educated and well trained. In addition, there is a need for excellent management so that investment will be sensible and will yield good results. It is absurd to suggest that people working in industry should be screwed down by poor conditions. I suppose one could argue that in some cases—low-tech or no-tech industries—keeping workers in appalling conditions might work. But that is not where Britain ought to go. I want to see development in the high-tech area, which will lead to far greater prosperity and to reversal of the decline that we have had for so many years.

The European market is one of the most sophisticated, and certainly, with 350 million people, the largest in the world, and it provides extraordinary opportunity for Britain. It is nothing short of absurd to argue that the social conditions under which people so crucial to the well-being of the country are employed should be impaired.

Mr. Duncan-Smith: Surely the argument concerning the social chapter is about why the Opposition seek to have some other organisation bring in elements of what they want, as they no longer believe that they themselves are capable of doing so, whereas Conservative Members believe that it is for us to take those decisions.

8.45 pm

Mr. Randall: I do not think that that is the question at all. Our future is unquestionably in Europe. Industry, particularly some high-tech industries with very high development costs, including the costs involved in putting out new products, tends to cross national boundaries to a large extent. However, most jobs will be created not in the bigger industries but in the smaller and medium-sized industries. Article 2(2) refers to the directives that will be necessary to implement these social policies:

> "Such directives shall avoid imposing administrative, financial and legal constraints in a way which would hold back the creation and development of small and medium-sized undertakings."

That makes sense; I can live with it.

Mr. John Biffen (Shropshire, North): Does the hon. Gentleman think that social spending in this country would be higher under the social chapter than it would be if these matters were left to ourselves?

Mr. Randall: I am not sure. The question is whether, if there were higher costs, investment would be profitable. What I am saying is that investment in the types of industry in which Britain desperately needs to be involved in the future could be good. As I cannot assess the scale, I cannot give a definite answer to the right hon. Gentleman's question.

There is, for instance, the question of existing practices. The hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) made the point that many of these things are under way in any case. I am not fearful of improving the conditions and the productivity of people. Essentially that is what we are on about. We want British industry to be productive. Undertakings that are productive can compete in the value-added areas that, in turn, will create great prosperity.

Earlier there was a reference to China. I was in China a couple of months ago. In the area north of Hong Kong —in fact, throughout China—the aggregate growth rate of that great country is about 16 per cent. Indeed, down in the Hong Kong area it is about 20 per cent. There is no inflation, and there is no great debt. In addition, there is political stability, despite Tiananmen square and all that. But we shall not be competing with those people. As the average wage there is about £1,000 a year, it would be impossible for us to do so. That is out of the question. Our niche is in the high-tech areas where worker conditions, including training, must be enhanced.

I want to say something about inward investment. Today we have heard the phoney argument that businesses —for example, from Taiwan—that want to invest in this country are willing to come only because wages are very low. I do not believe that to be the case. A business will invest in Britain if it can do so profitably. What will determine profitability is the kind of work force that is available, as well as opportunities to market products in this country and throughout the Community. The idea that imposing a social dimension on British industry will result in inward investment plunging is nothing short of absurd.

Mr. Duncan-Smith: I was amazed to hear what the hon. Gentleman said a moment ago. He said that, because cost levels in the far east market were driven by the low wage levels there, western Europe and Britain in particular could give up competing with the far east. He implied that we should therefore set up walls round Europe and that we should just dabble around within them. That is the hon. Gentleman's logic, which is the logic of the social provisions. That makes no sense. We are a world trading nation and we should continue to be so.

Mr. Randall: The hon. Gentleman is wrong to draw that conclusion from what I said. I was talking about low-tech or no-tech areas such as textiles—making T-shirts or lace tablecloths—in which there is terrific labour intensity. One can buy such goods in China which are nothing short of exquisite. If we tried to make similar products in a British factory, we could not compete. I do not believe we should focus our attention on such areas.

I regret that during the 1980s, especially when Lord Lawson was Chancellor of the Exchequer, there was a lot of talk about us being, not high-tech or low-tech, but no-tech. We were attempting to compete in that area, which was not what we should have been doing. In that area, one is competing against countries where the wage costs may be one tenth of what they are in this country. It is absurd to contemplate that.

What we should do is co-operate with such countries in joint ventures and work with them on high-technology projects. That is how things work in practice. I will not pursue that point in greater depth. I hope that I have undermined the two key points made this evening by Conservative Members.

For the United Kingdom to opt out from the protocol, as amendment No. 127 would require, is wrong. All the elements of the policy are described on page 118 of the treaty, so I shall not attempt to summarise them. Any good business man would naturally and obviously want to implement those elements in practice. Improved working conditions and dialogue between management and labour are essential. If business people are not doing that these days, heaven forbid—they are dinosaurs and do not deserve to succeed. There is a two-way street involving the attitude of the work force as well as the attitude of management. Article 2.2 involves the gradual implementation of all the provisions. The implementation will not be carried out in a way that will inhibit business.

The Government's track record on industry is absolutely appalling. We have heard comments about the abolition of the wages councils. We are the odd ones out in Europe in terms of the implementation of this element of policy, and I regret that very much. I wish that we could all vote for that element of policy when we divide on amendment No. 127. That would be for the well-being of this country, for the well-being of our industrial base, for the well-being of the people and for prosperity in the future.

Mr. Cash: I was somewhat puzzled by some of the remarks made by the Minister of State about the implications of the matters we are discussing in the context of ratification of the treaty. In considering the nature of the opt-out purportedly given to the Danish Government and people, it struck me that enormous emphasis was given to ensuring that a system is devised by way of the so-called "informal" decision which would preclude the necessity for ratification. I mentioned earlier that Chancellor Kohl had made that very point. Apparently it has been claimed that ratification would not be required.

The provisions deal with economic and monetary union, among other things, which are most firmly within the aegis of the Court of Justice and appear prima facie to affect the treaty of Rome. There is a serious question—I put it at that level at the moment—about the nature of the distinction made by the Minister of State on the question of ratification vis-a-vis the social chapter on the one hand and the questions I am raising vis-a-vis the Danish so-called "opt-outs" and the issue of ratification as respects the treaty of Rome on the other.

Mr. Garel-Jones: It is perfectly clear, not just from the legal advice from the Council secretariat but from the legal advice of the Foreign Ministries of every other member state that the Danish decision is such that it will not require re-ratification. The decision that must be made by Conservative Members has nothing to do with ratification. The decision that must be made is clear.

The social protocol, in a sense, enshrines everything that the Conservative party has fought against and won over the past decade. That is why the Opposition seek to import it into the treaty. The decision for Conservative Members is nothing to do with whether this amendment affects ratification. That is a matter for Opposition Members who claim to be in favour of ratification of Maastricht. Our decision is simple. I think I had better leave it at that.

Mr. Cash: That may be as well. Some of us believe that there are profound and deep strains—indeed rich seams—of socialism which run through the Maastricht treaty. The cohesion funds are one example. I know that my right hon. Friend fought hard to keep them out—[Interruption.] He did not try to keep them out. He was obviously encouraging member states to keep them in. None the less, such arrangements are deeply socialist. There are many other aspects of the treaty which correspond to the social engineering to which my right hon. Friend referred just now and which we have been opposing for so long.

Mr. Garel-Jones: My hon. Friend is right in one sense—we have had this debate across the Floor of the House on several occasions. Each political party represented here would seek to use the treaty to pursue the same political ends that it seeks to pursue in the United Kingdom. Of course Opposition Members would seek to use it as an instrument for socialism; we seek to use it as an instrument for advancing the policies of the free and open market. As regards this narrow amendment, however—my hon. Friend and all of us on this side of the House must speak for ourselves—it would be extremely difficult for any Conservative Member to justify, in relation to our own party and to the basis on which we have conducted ourselves for the past decade, supporting the amendment moved by the Labour party.

Mr. Cash: I am simply making the point that I made just now about the European People's party, into which our own Conservative MEPs are subsumed by the agreement made on 11 April 1991, with the chairman of the Conservative party writing to Wilfried Martens, requesting membership, and clearly stating that the request for the incorporation of Conservative MEPs within the membership of the European People's party had the full support of the Prime Minister, no less; it could bear some examination in this context. As I understand it—I am open to correction—the European People's party, so closely related to Egon Klepsch and all these worthy Christian Democrats——

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. I had hoped to have an evening when I would not have to call the hon. Gentleman to order, but what he is saying has very little to do with the social fund or the amendment before us.

Mr. Cash: The Minister of State was making a point about the question of our party——

The Chairman: Order. The Minister of State was replying to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Cash: The question of what this particular provision does in respect of the political decisions that we make on the Government side of the House can be put very simply. That is what we are talking about. The European People's party has this view. It is a view shared by the Christian Democrats. I recall a conversation in June or July 1990 with an eminent Conservative who told me that, in the context of matters of this kind, it would be as well for people such as myself to understand that we lived somewhat in the past, that what we required now was a grey man's Europe, something administrative that we could just deliver, and that this would be in the interests of everyone in the United Kingdom. I remember that conversation very well. Perhaps the Minister of State remembers it too.

9 pm

Mr. Garel-Jones: My hon. Friend has given us the view of Mr. Egon Klepsch and the European People's party, but he will agree with me, will he not, that there is no doubt about the view of the Conservative party in the United Kingdom in this matter?

Mr. Cash: Without a shadow of doubt, so far as we are tied into the European People's party, as we are, it presents serious questions about the extent to which one can serve two masters.

Mr. Biffen: If my hon. Friend is going to conduct this valuable task of evaluating the range of opposition to and support for the social chapter, one should put on record the fact that in this Chamber my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) has regretted that the Government have not signed up for the social chapter.

Mr. Cash: I am indebted to my right hon. Friend for reminding me of that extremely important statement, and I am delighted to know that it is now well and truly on the record, because it tells us a great deal about what is going on.

Mr. Jenkin: Am I not right in saying that the National Union of the Conservative Party, or some other Conservative party body, accepts as an appointee a representative of the European People's party, which is committed to a federal Europe?

Mr. Cash: Yes, and that body is very determined to see a federal constitution brought in.

I want to get back to amendment No. 27. It would be misleading to describe this protocol as an opt-out for the United Kingdom from the social chapter. The whole thing works differently, because the social chapter is not part of the Maastricht treaty; instead, it is a separate agreement between the other 11 member states. In fact, the United Kingdom is not actually a party to it, and deletion of the protocol would not make the United Kingdom a party to it.

The effect of the protocol is simply to allow the other 11, as my hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Duncan-Smith) pointed out in an intervention, to make use of the Community institutions for administering their social agreement. The effect of the protocol is therefore that the 11 would no longer have permission to use the Community institutions for the administration of their social agreement.

There are further and wider effects of carrying the amendment. I see the Minister of State shaking his head, but—before another distinguished lawyer tries to develop an argument in an intervention—I am sure that he will appreciate that many of these matters depend on interpretation. Indeed, the extent to which the provisions of the social charter as they apply to the other 11 and the relationship of those provisions in law to what we have already acceded to under article 118a and so on of the Single European Act needs to be considered in this context. For example, the 48-hour working week has already reappeared in another guise, notwithstanding the fact that it is supposed to be a part of the social chapter.

I have asked Ministers, not over the past few weeks but repeatedly, even when the process was being negotiated, why we did not get these matters sorted out by amending and improving the Single European Act, as I have said with respect to many other provisions in the Maastricht treaty, in advance of the conclusions that were arrived at which have led to the difficulties that I see the Minister of State and the Government suffering from in respect of the social chapter.

Had we, for example, given ourselves the power by negotiation, or at least sought to give ourselves the power, to challenge what are blatantly ultra vires arrangements in respect of provisions in the Single European Act by procedural means such as an action for a declaration—I have repeatedly put this to Ministers—we could have avoided all the difficulties of subsequent interpretation when everything has been sewn up. We could end up with only a hope that we might be able to manage to get a little bit of a concession out of the argument at the end of the day. By the use of the existing powers, but without the opportunity to challenge them in the courts, we are put in an impossible position. That is effectively where we stand in this matter.

If article 118a within the Single European Act is used, in respect not merely of the 48-hour working week but of a range of other matters, we will find precious little difference between what is contained in the extended use of the existing legislative base and what is in the social chapter, anyway. My hon. Friend the Member for Chingford has already made that point.

If the amendment were agreed, the other 11 member states would no longer have permission to use the Community institutions to administer their social agreement. They would need to amend that agreement to set up their own institutions separate from the Community institutions, and the Maastricht treaty would almost certainly need to go back to an intergovernmental conference.

Much of the enthusiasm that I have heard from Conservative Members and, to some extent, from Opposition Members has come from that group of Members of Parliament who believe in what I generally describe as Disraelian politics. I have always been a great devotee of Disraelian politics. I have always believed in the social dimension. Indeed, even in the early 1960s I belonged to an organisation that was almost entirely devoted to the memory of Disraeli, for a very good reason.

There is nothing incongruous in having policies that are a mixture of some of the liberal policies of the late 19th century—the desire of people such as Bright to ensure that people in factories had proper conditions, and Disraeli's determination to improve the lot of trade unionists and people working in deprived circumstances in factories. In fact, Bright and Disraeli worked out a relationship—effectively a coalition—to ensure that the Reform Act 1867 went through. That Act gave us our democracy, and it is being undermined by the treaty. I profoundly believe that provisions of the sort in the social chapter have a resonance for those in the Conservative party and the One Nation group.

Mr. Wells: Can my hon. Friend explain the result of his arguments tonight? As I understand it, he said that article 118a, which was agreed in the Single European Act, will introduce a large measure of legislation of the sort that he anticipates under the social protocol dealing with the social chapter.

[Mr. Wells]

Is my hon. Friend arguing that we should include the social chapter in the current treaty because we will get it under article 118a or that we should embrace what our negotiators in Maastricht tried to do, which was to exclude the social chapter, so that we can put a stop to the events under article 118a which my hon. Friend and I resent?

Mr. Cash: I simply say that the provision, as with so many other provisions in the treaty, is like looking in a hall of mirrors. It relates to interpretation, assertion and whatever appears to be the sort of gearing and spin that people want to put on it at a given time. I am left with the severest doubts about the arguments that have been presented on the subject over time. I remain as doubtful about those arguments as I could be about anything.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): My hon. Friend will remember clearly that, when the Single European Act was going through this Parliament, we were given reassurances about matters that would not be affected by that Act and the advantages of it to the United Kingdom. Sadly, experience has shown, as it did with the 1972 proposals, that the outcome is different from what we were told in debates. That is why we are cynical today.

Mr. Cash: We have the continual problem of the shifting sands of argument and interpretation on these matters. I conclude simply by saying that one constantly finds that the arguments are distorted by the hall of mirrors, just as I find with the provisions of the treaty.

The same sort of confusion and uncertainty are created by our finding that the argument is put forward based on a good interpretation of the provisions in the social chapter by Ministers for the purposes of the United Kingdom, the Conservative party and its representatives in Parliament. The people whom I strongly supported when I was campaigning in the European elections in 1987 and who have joined the European People's party, adopt completely different positions. One cannot serve two masters. That is the point on which I am happy to conclude.

9.15 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Hoon (Ashfield): The first thing that needs to be said about the social chapter is that it contains nothing new in principle. Sometimes, when one hears Conservative Ministers talking about the social chapter, one would think that it contained agreements dreamed up by the Labour party and the Trades Union Congress over beer and sandwiches. But the European Community has always had a social dimension. That social dimension was clearly set out in the treaty of Rome. The Community has always sought to balance the centralising tendencies of the single market by protecting the interests of individuals directly affected by it.

Therefore, it is not surprising as we debate the social chapter today that the European Community, as it moves steadily towards the completion of the single market, should seek to strengthen the social dimension. I am almost tempted to say that such a process is historically inevitable, but I suspect that I had better not.

I assume that the Government agree with articles 117 to 122 of the treaty of Rome. They contain a series of social provisions. Article 117 says:

"Member States hereby agree upon the necessity to promote improvement of the living and working conditions of labour."

Article 118 calls for close co-operation in employment, labour law and working conditions. That also includes vocational training, social security, prevention of occupational accidents and diseases, occupational hygiene, the right of association and collective bargaining between employers and workers. That is all in the treaty of Rome. It is not a bad summary of what can be found if one looks at the detail of the social chapter. It has all been decided and agreed before by Conservative Ministers.

Even as recently as in the Single European Act, the Government accepted the competence of the European Community to introduce new European legislation dealing specifically with social issues. For example, article 118A of the Single European Act deals with new legislation on health and safety. Once again, the Government were happy and comfortable in approving European Community competence on social matters.

A fundamental misunderstanding by the Government of the implication of the Single European Act has got them into their present difficulty with the social chapter. The Government failed to appreciate how close was the connection between the creation of a single market and the consequential social protection that every other European country sees as the inevitable consequence of that single market.

Article 100A of the Single European Act was deliberately drafted to cover

"the establishment and functioning of the internal market."

That is not only the rules required to create a single market, but the consequences of that single market. In the context of the social chapter, it means the consequences for people. The social chapter simply sets out in more detail the consequences of that single market as it affects individuals throughout the European Community.

It was perhaps only when the Government woke up to those consequences and to what they had agreed in the Single European Act that Margaret Thatcher, as she then was, started being difficult. When the Heads of Government signed the Community charter of the fundamental social rights of workers in December 1989, only the United Kingdom Government found it impossible to accept a list of fundamental rights affecting freedom of movement—something to which the Government had already agreed by accepting the treaty of Rome—employment, working conditions, equal treatment for men and women, the protection of children, protection of the elderly and protection of the disabled.

I am sure that, if hon. Members tried to draw up a list of worthy causes, they probably could not do any better than the social charter. It would be difficult to imagine a set of people more deserving of protection and assistance. Yet, way back in December 1989, the Government found it impossible to accept that list, which forms the basis of the social chapter.

My argument therefore is that the list in the fundamental charter is already extensively covered by existing obligations under the treaty of Rome and the Single European Act and has been accepted by all the other European Community Governments—

Governments of the left, coalition Governments of the centre and Governments of the right—not once, but on a number of occasions.

Why do the Conservative Government in the United Kingdom find it so difficult to go along with the views of their parliamentary allies in the European Parliament and their political allies on the continent? The German Christian Democrats have been among the most enthusiastic supporters of the social chapter, as has every other major political party on the centre right of the political spectrum in the Community.

We have heard a great deal from the Conservatives about their commitment to Europe. We also heard a great deal about it when the Conservative Members of the European Parliament joined the European People's party. Tonight there has been some discussion of the fact that it is okay for Conservative Members of the European Parliament to support the social chapter because they are part of the European People's party in the European Parliament and it is permissible.

It will be interesting to find out the position of the Conservative party during the next European elections, which are not too far away in June 1994. The Conservatives will put up candidates and clearly they will be asked for their view of the social chapter. What will be the answer? Will they say that Conservative Members of the European Parliament have consistently supported the social chapter in that Parliament and that therefore it is okay to vote Conservative, or will they give the answer that we have heard this evening—that the Conservatives are against the social chapter and that they will all vote against it? They cannot have it both ways and say in the House that they are against the social chapter, yet allow their Members of the European Parliament to vote in favour of it consistently.

Mr. Wells: I venture to suggest that the difference between the hon. Gentleman's view and that of the Conservative party is not that we disagree about making certain that the social conditions of the workplace are properly conducted and that there are fair wages and working conditions, but that we believe that those matters should be determined at national level—or perhaps not even at national level. We believe, as the Labour party used to believe, that they should be settled between an employer and an employee, represented by his trade union and by free collective bargaining. What is at stake is whether such matters should be determined at supra-national level, disregarding the cultural and local conditions that apply in the workplace and make for harmonious management-worker relationships. It would be disastrous to lay down laws on such matters at international level.

Mr. Hoon: I had hoped that the hon. Gentleman would deal with my argument about the apparent discrepancy between the views of Conservative Members of the European Parliament and their counterparts here.

Mr. Bill Walker rose——

Mr. Hoon: To be fair to the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells), I should try to answer his question. The answer can be found in the documents that I mentioned: the treaty of Rome, the Single European Act and the social chapter, which does not achieve what the hon. Gentleman suggests. The social chapter does not prescribe all the terms and conditions affecting relations between employers and employees, but seeks to set out a framework, which is guaranteed at an international level. As more multinational corporations operate throughout the Community, the need for consistent standards will become inevitable. That was the point of my earlier argument. If we have a single market, it must regulate activities across all that market, on behalf of employees and businesses. That is the point of the social chapter.

Mr. Wells: When the Single European Act was introduced, we thought exactly as the hon. Gentleman describes: that it contained general statements of intent which would be settled in detail at local as well as national level. What has happened is that enthusiasts in the Community have, time and again, extended the meaning of articles 117, 118a and so on to which the hon. Gentleman referred. It was at that point that my colleagues and I on the Select Committee on European Legislation and others began to smell a rat and say that we should halt and go no further. We cannot agree to the social charter, and therefore we cannot agree to the social protocol.

Mr. Hoon: The difficulty with the hon. Gentleman's argument is that the enthusiasts to which he refers are the European Commission. It has the sole right of initiative to make law. There are two British Commissioners, one of whom is a Conservative, and they and their colleagues are responsible for putting forward legislative proposals. Those proposals are then discussed in the European Parliament and, ultimately, a decision is taken by the Council of Ministers—a Conservative Minister is, at all times, a member of that Council.

We are not talking about an alien body trying to impose things on the United Kingdom, but such is the language often used by Conservative Members. We are talking about Britain playing its full and effective role in the creation of the single market.

I had always assumed that Conservative Members saw the benefits of the single market in terms of benefits for business. They must accept, however, that it follows that those benefits must be extended to all those who work for those businesses. One cannot simply say that one will take advantage of the single market in favour of businesses and will not extend those benefits to their employees.

Mr. Bill Walker: I sought to intervene earlier when the hon. Gentleman drew attention to the fact that it would seem that Conservative Members of the European Parliament are not always in tune with the policies of the British Conservative party and Government. Can he reassure me that Labour Members of the European Parliament have always supported Opposition Front-Bench policy?

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman makes a fair point. In any political party there is a range of views, but I am sure that he would agree that there is something different between occasional disagreements over policy and something as fundamental as the social chapter. After all, his Government spent an extraordinary amount of time and invested too much political capital in opting out of the social chapter. They clearly thought that it was important and that it was in the national interests, as we have heard over and over again. In June 1994 the Conservative party will ask people to vote for its candidates in the elections to the European Parliament and I do not think that it is unreasonable for people to ask what those candidates stand for. They should know whether they stand for the policies of the European People's party or for those of the Conservative party of the United Kingdom.

The Chairman: Order. I do not think that electioneering comes under the terms of amendment No. 7.

Mr. Hoon: I was temporarily carried away by the enthusiasm of Conservative Members.

There is a difference between the attitude of continental businesses and Governments to the social chapter and that of the British Conservative Government. We have been told tonight and on countless previous occasions that the reason why the British Government are so keen to opt out of the social chapter is that it makes British business uncompetitive. Why is it that German, French and Italian companies appear to have no difficulty in accepting its provisions? There is no pressure on the Governments of those countries to opt out of the social chapter, but many of them are what we would describe as Conservative ones —they are supposed to share the philosophy of the British Conservative party. The reality is that those European businesses recognise the practical advantages of the social chapter to their operations. They know that without the guarantees of basic standards of social protection, their businesses could be fundamentally undermined in a single market by the deliberate driving down of such standards. Multinational corporations could play off one country against another.

German companies know full well that in a truly single market there will be a temptation for capital to move to those countries where the costs of business are lowest. That might well mean—[Laughter.] Conservative Members should hear my argument before gleefully seizing on the point that I am making. At present, the costs of doing business are lowest in countries like Greece and Portugal, where wage rates and standards of social protection are significantly lower than elsewhere in the Community.

9.30 pm

The German Christian Democrats—the political allies of the Conservative party—have accepted those arguments. That is precisely why they are so much in favour of the social chapter. They know that if one allows capital to move to countries like Greece and Portugal, the only way in which it is possible to compete for such investment is to continue the spiralling down of standards that that would necessarily involve. It caused some glee among those on the Government Front Bench when I made that point, but I think that British people would be interested to know whether the policy of the British Government in opposing the social chapter is designed to drive down levels of social protection, wages and the benefits available to employees to the levels that pertain in Greece and Portugal.

Is the argument against the social chapter that we want to compete for inward investment by reducing standards and wages to make us the cheapest place in Europe to do business? If that is the argument, it should be spelt out more clearly than it has been. If the Government want to turn Britain into an offshore economy, they should say so clearly. If they object to the social chapter because they want the lowest social standards in Europe because, at present, conducting business here is more costly than in Portugal and Greece, it is incumbent on the Conservative party to say so clearly.

Some support for the Government's position has occasionally come from employers' organisations. We have heard such organisations cited in the arguments of Conservative Members. Those organisations claim that it is impossible for them to meet the cost of the social chapter in the United Kingdom, but those same organisations—often the same companies—have operations in France, Germany and Italy. The same companies that complain bitterly that, in the United Kingdom, they cannot afford the social chapter, can apparently afford those costs in Germany, France and Italy. I have never been able to understand the difference and why it is that a multinational corporation can cheerfully apply the standards of the social chapter in Germany, Italy or France, but not in the United Kingdom.

We are witnessing the creation of a double standard, which means that those same multinational corporations, when negotiating terms and conditions with their work force on the continent, adopt a different approach from that which they take with their work force in the United Kingdom. Such a double standard will create significant legal confusion among the contracts of employment of those in the United Kingdom and those elsewhere.

The Government's refusal to accept the social chapter creates a curious legal position. By refusing to endorse that section of the Maastricht treaty dealing with the social dimension, the other 11 countries gave themselves an option. They could accept that, because they could not obtain unanimity on that part of the treaty, it should disappear. If some of the arguments made earlier were correct and there is already a groundswell of opinion on the continent against the social chapter, presumably those other countries would have decided that if all 12 member states could not agree to the social chapter, that part of the treaty should fall. However, that has not happened.

In agreeing to the social protocol, those countries demonstrated their determination to make that part of the Maastricht treaty law. They went to the trouble of agreeing a protocol that bound 11 member states rather than all 12. They need not have done so. In the past, they would probably have quietly abandoned the process. If the arguments made earlier in today's debate were true and there was real opposition to the social chapter, those countries should have done that. Instead, 11 countries, rather than all 12, agreed to bind themselves under the social protocol.

What does that mean in practical legal terms? It is that those 11 countries can make legislation under the terms of the protocol which will be binding and effective in those 11 member states. Presumably, it will not be binding or effective in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Garnier: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, despite the fact that the social chapter will be enforced only in the 11 countries that have agreed to it, if our Parliament thought that the principles in the social chapter would be good for this country we could pass a Bill to incorporate them into British law? Just because we have not agreed to the social chapter at the same time as the 11 other countries does not mean that we are forbidden to introduce similar domestic legislation. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would support such legislation, although we might disagree about forcing it on this country. His argument is based on a false premise.

Mr. Hoon: I accept that the Government could introduce such legislation, but that would rather defeat the purpose of opting out of the social chapter in the first place. If the Government intended to do that, presumably they would do so through the institutions of the European Community. That is what the other 11 member states wanted and expected the Government to do.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cirencester and Tewkesbury): If what the hon. Gentleman says is true, can he explain why Sir Michael Agnus of the CBI has said that 60 per cent. of all inward investment into the EC during the past 10 years has come to this country precisely because we do not have the sort of rules and regulations favoured by the hon. Gentleman?

Mr. Hoon: That argument cannot be sustained on any rational basis. The figure of 60 per cent. has not been worked out in any sensible way. The hon. Gentleman misses the point of what the single market and the European Community is all about. It is not about inward investment to one member state; it is about creating a consistent legal approach across the Community. The Conservative party has argued enthusiastically for the creation of the single market because it says that it is good for the very business described by the hon. Gentleman. Conservative Members cannot claim that somehow or other, because it is good for business, those benefits should not be extended elsewhere. That argument has caused the Conservative party the greatest difficulty. It failed to understand the implications of the single market for those self-same businesses, many of which have operations thoughout the Community.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I want to clarify what I said earlier. I meant to say that 60 per cent. of all Japanese and American inward investment in the Community came to this country. Is it not a fact that if we are to compete as an advanced western economy and if we are to create the maximum number of jobs, which I am sure the hon. Gentleman and the Labour party want, we must have a high-productivity and high-wage economy? The only way to achieve that is by reducing the barriers of trade, not by increasing them, which is what the social chapter would force on this country.

Mr. Hoon: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. I want this country to be an advanced western economy. My concern is that by objecting to the social chapter on the ground that we want to reduce the costs of employing people—which is really the argument—we will not become an advanced western economy because we will be competing with poorest countries of western Europe and, indeed, the world. How will we develop the training, education and skills required if the Government are constantly preoccupied with driving down the standards that we need to improve if we are to become an advanced western economy?

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): It is clear that there is concern about competitiveness. This country is nothing like as strong and as competitive as it should be. There is an obvious contradiction in the Government's policy. They felt that they could not accept a social chapter that would raise costs for British industry —that is inevitable as it would lead to an improvement in working conditions—because at the time they were committed to a fixed exchange rate and therefore could not make any alteration in relative costs by allowing the exchange rate to adjust itself to increasing costs. Is not that the real reason? Therefore, now that the Government have abandoned the exchange rate mechanism, surely their whole argument in favour of not accepting the social charter has collapsed.

Mr. Hoon: As ever, I am grateful to my right hon. Friend. However, I suspect that if I were to answer his question fully and talk about the exchange rate mechanism, you, Mr. Morris, would rebuke me once again for straying from the subject of debate. Therefore, I shall resist that temptation.

I have talked about the Government's double standards. They have consistently argued against the creation of a two-speed Europe. But, in conclusion, I invite right hon. and hon. Members to consider the legal regime that has been created in the EC as a result of opting out of the social chapter. We shall now have a two-speed Europe where other countries will be able, by virtue of the social protocol, to move ahead more quickly to protect their employees and their people, passing legislation that will apply in 11 of the member states, creating in the process not simply a two-speed Europe but a two-tier Europe with two separate legal systems within European law, one for Britain and one for the remaining members of the EC.

If Conservative Memberrs are puzzled about that argument, I shall develop it a little. Presumably, when new European law is made under the social protocol, it will bind only the 11 member states that have signed the social protocol. They will pass new legislation which will become binding within their own jurisdictions.

If there is then a legal dispute over the interpretation of a new directive or regulation, whatever it happens to be, the European Court of Justice will ultimately be responsible for interpreting EC legislation. Its decisions are binding on all EC member states by virtue of the treaty of Rome. Its decisions are binding on the United Kingdom by virtue of the European Communities Act 1972.

European Court decisions are usually a synthesis of a variety of different European legal materials. They will look at the treaties, at regulations and directives and at decided cases. They will then interpret the new directive under the social protocol and try to reach a decision on the case before them.

But in reaching that decision, where do we in the United Kingdom look for our case law? Do we look at all European Court decisions that do not involve the social protocol and say that that is European law in the United Kingdom, or do we look, as lawyers on the continent will look, at all the European Court decisions?

How can the Government agree when there are two separate legal jurisdictions? How do we decide what legal protection is available to citizens of the EC when there are two different standards based on the interpretation of legislation made under the social protocol? It is legal and constitutional nonsense to suggest that that can occur, but that is the reality of what the Government have achieved by opting out of the social protocol.

Mr. Marlow: One reason why hon. Members are told that they should agree to the Maastricht treaty is that, if we do not, and there is no Maastricht treaty, the other 11 will put their own Maastricht treaty together, excluding us. The the United Kingdom is a signatory to the treaty of Rome, which will still exist. Therefore, there cannot be a Maastricht treaty of 11 against the treaty of Rome, for exactly the same reason as the hon. Gentleman is putting forward.

Mr. Hoon: That is really the argument that I was developing in the specific area of the social protocol. There will be legislation under the social protocol which will be interpreted by the European Court of Justice, which will produce decisions. I invite the Minister when he replies to comment on the British Government's position. What exactly will they do when a case is decided by the European Court of Justice that has implications——

Mr. Cash: On a point of order, Mr. Morris. Would it be out of order to be put in a position of knowing what sort of discussion is currently going on with respect to the procedures that are being followed in the House and the movement towards the 10 o'clock motion——

The Chairman: Order. The Chair is not interested in movements in the Chamber, as long as they do not interfere with what goes on between the Chair and the hon. Member who is speaking.

9.45 pm

Mr. Hoon: I have talked about the position of a citizen on the continent who is concerned about the implications of the social protocol, or legislation made under it. It follows, however, that a United Kingdom citizen—working, perhaps, for a multinational corporation, with counterparts in other Community countries—might feel understandably aggrieved if his or her rights in relation to the employer were significantly different from those of employees in exactly the same position, in a country that had agreed legislation under the protocol.

Dr. Godman: It appears that the European Court of Justice, in terms of the Maastricht treaty, will have the jurisprudence to deal with precisely such complaints. An individual citizen will have the right to take his or her Government to court—a domestic court, that is—if he or she, and his or her legal advisers, believe that the Government concerned are failing to protect his or her interests.

Mr. Hoon: That, to date, has been the position in principle and it will remain the position until the Maastricht treaty and the social protocol come into force. But what will happen if a new directive is agreed under the social protocol and the United Kingdom citizen feels that his or her rights may be covered by that protocol? If we advise such people to take their cases to the European Court of Justice, the Government are likely to tell us that they are not bound by the directive. Clearly, the rights of United Kingdom citizens will be second rate in comparison with those of continental citizens.

Mr. Shore: That being so, is not it almost certain that appeals would be made to the European Court and the British position would be undermined?

Mr. Hoon: Unfortunately, I am not in a position to answer for the Government. I doubt, however, whether the Government will concede that, if a United Kingdom citizen takes to the European Court a case based on a directive passed under the social protocol, the case can be decided by the European Court on the basis of that directive. The Government will say, "We opted out of the social chapter and did not sign the social protocol; therefore, the European Court of Justice has no jurisdiction in this case."

Dr. Godman: May I put the social chapter to one side for a moment and refer my hon. Friend to directives established under the aegis of article 118a of the Single European Act? Surely such directives would allow an individual citizen, or a trade union, to take the Government to the European Court.

Is not it interesting that, in all his interventions, the Minister of State has chosen to ignore the growing power of the European Court of Justice and the power that is to be given to it?

Mr. Hoon: The Government have not opted out of article 118a. They cannot do so now; they accepted it when they signed up to the Single European Act.

My hon. Friend has made a fair point. It is interesting to note that article 118a will cover much the same areas as the social policy protocol in the treaty. Further interesting confusion will result if the citizen whom I have described challenges a directive under the social protocol. What will be the Government's reaction? In most cases dealt with by the European Court of Justice, not just one case or directive is cited, but a series of cases or directives. How do we disentangle the part of the European Court's decision which is outside the social protocol from that which is inside? How will it work in the United Kingdom?

The Government are creating a confused legal situation and are undermining the constitution and coherence of the European Community. They claim to be at the heart of Europe, but they are doing fundamental damage to the coherence of the Community; they have confused its constitution and are now producing a confused and confusing legal situation. They are failing in their duty to United Kingdom citizens.

Mr. Garnier: I begin by referring to an issue raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Milligan). The amendment and those who support it are in essence seeking to do nothing other than destroy the treaty. I am sure that I shall be corrected if I am wrong, but I believe that one must ratify the treaty as a whole or not at all.

Now that the negotiators have provided the House and the country with one treaty to be considered as a whole, it is not open to us to say that we like one bit and not another, that we shall take one bit and leave another. We must consider the document as a whole. The treaty includes the agreement on social policy concluded between member states of the European Community with the exception of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

The treaty of Maastricht contains the protocol that opts us out of the social chapter. We must not believe that there is one treaty for the 11 and one for us—it is one treaty. It just so happens—thank goodness—that, having negotiated at Maastricht in December 1991, my right hon.

Friends the Prime Minister, the Foreign Secretary and the Chancellor were able to bring to the House a treaty which does not contain the social chapter.

I assure the House that the textile workers in my constituency are gratified that we shall not have to suffer under the imposition of provisions that may be attractive to the other 11 but which are wholly foreign and unnecessary to us and, I believe, destructive of the economy of the east midlands. By bringing the Maastricht treaty into English law, the Bill provides that domestic decisions take precedence over the social chapter. We do not have to do what the other 11 member states wish to do.

Article 1 of the agreement on social policy states:

"The Community and the Member States shall have as their objectives the promotion of employment,"—

a very fine thing—

"improved living and working conditions,"—

again, very fine aims—

"proper social protection, dialogue between management and labour, the development of human resources with a view to lasting high employment and the combating of exclusion", whatever that means. It continues:

"To this end the Community and the Member States shall implement measures which take account of the diverse forms of national practices, in particular in the field of contractual relations,"——

Dr. Godman: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Garnier: I shall finish the sentence. Article 1 concludes its list of objectives thus:

"and the need to maintain the competitiveness of the Community economy."

They are no doubt wonderful objectives, but we have not agreed to them being included in the treaty. However, we do not need to prevent the other 11 member states from agreeing them. It is fortunate for us that we have not agreed to them on this side of the English channel.

Dr. Godman: I ask this question with no hidden motive: was the hon. Gentleman present to hear his hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Duncan-Smith)? If he was, he will have heard his hon. Friend say that the European Court of Justice may level out some of the bumps to be found here in the exclusion of the social charter. He suggested that under article 118a individuals or organisations may be able to approach the European Court of Justice to ensure that they are treated similarly to the way in which individuals or organisations in the other 11 countries are treated.

Mr. Garnier: The short answer to the hon. Gentleman's question is that, sadly, I was not here while my hon. Friend the Member for Chingford was speaking. No doubt I shall have the advantage of reading my hon. Friend's speech tomorrow morning.

I shall continue to deal with what the treaty actually says. As I said, it must be remembered that the treaty is to be looked at as one document. As far as the United Kingdom is concerned, it does not contain the agreement on the social chapter which the other 11 member states have signed.

Mr. Thomas Graham (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde): The hon. Gentleman read out a list of what he described as wonderful things. Surely that description was not genuine. I reckon that that list contains simple, decent honest aspirations for the working folk of Great Britain. Surely such things should not be described as wonderful; people should be entitled to them.

Mr. Garnier: If the hon. Gentleman had listened to what I said a moment earlier, perhaps he would not have said that. The aspirations that the other 11 countries have agreed should form part of the treaty may well be shared by many British people, for all we know. But the difference between us and the other 11 countries is that I believe that such matters should be decided domestically, not through the Maastricht treaty.

I argue from an unashamedly Tory point of view. I fully accept that the hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mr. Graham), being a full-blown socialist—[Interruption.]—or a full-blown something else, may well have other views. He may wish the EC and the Commission to interfere in the shape of his doorknobs and everything else. But neither I nor my constituents want the Commission to interfere in domestic employment law or the other matters set out in the protocol.

Mrs. Currie: Does my hon. Friend accept that much of our health and safety legislation, for example, is extremely good—well ahead of standards set elsewhere in Europe? Would not the Commission and the Council of Ministers be wise to consider the way in which we do things, instead of trying to impose other people's rules on us? Should they not accept that the way in which we do things should be the model for the rest of Europe?

Mr. Garnier: Not only do I agree with my hon. Friend, but I can think of no better person than her to go across to Europe to inform people exactly what we do here.

Mr. Enright: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Garnier: May I continue for one more moment?

As I said, my approach to the treaty is unashamedly Tory—and I am happy to say that that was also the approach of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and his colleagues at the Maastricht negotiations. What is more, our approach is also one of unashamed British national self-interest. [Interruption.] Perhaps we are hearing oohs and aahs from the Opposition because they are ashamed of being British, and rather ashamed of what the Government have done to advance the self-interest of this country.

Paragraph 1 of article 2 of the protocol suggests that

"With a view to achieving the objectives of Article 1", which I have already mentioned,

"the Community shall support and complement the activities of the Member States in the following fields:

—improvement in particular of the working environment to protect workers' health and safety".

As my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) has said, the British Parliament has already passed health and safety legislation well in advance of anything we can see elsewhere. Paragraph 1 of article 2 says:

"With a view to achieving the objectives of Article 1, the Community shall support and complement the activities of the Member States in the following fields".

Mr. Marlow rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put; but THE CHAIRMAN withheld his assent and declined then to put that Question.

Mr. Garnier: I repeat what paragraph 1 of article 2 says:

"With a view to achieving the objectives of Article 1, the Community shall support and complement the activities of the Member States"—

It being Ten o'clock, THE CHAIRMAN left the Chair to report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Committee to report progress; to sit again tomorrow.

PETITION

10 pm

Noise

Mr. Jim Dowd (Lewisham, West): I am pleased to present, on behalf of myself and my hon. Friends the Members for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock) and Lewisham, East (Mrs. Prentice), a petition calling upon this House to introduce new legislation to replace the ineffective enforcement procedures currently operative in England and Wales with regard to noise pollution and nuisance. The petition is from about 4,000 residents of the London borough of Lewisham and beyond, and it states:

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your honourable House introduce new legislation to establish a new offence of night noise nuisance, accompanied by a minimum fine of £500 for noise nuisance occurring between the hours 9 pm and 7 am, and institute a full review of the practical issues of noise law enforcement, involving local authority environmental health officers and police officers directly involved in noise abatement work and members of groups representing the victims of noise pollution.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

To lie upon the Table.

Defence Industries (Redundancies)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Greg Knight.]

10.2 pm

Mr. John Hutton (Barrow and Furness): British manufacturing industry is absolutely vital to our future if we are to be a successful trading nation. Two recessions in the past decade have caused enormous damage to our manufacturing base, and some of our finest companies have been forced to sack thousands of skilled workers—workers the country can ill afford to lose.

Within manufacturing, the engineering industry in particular has been badly hit. Until recently, one important sector of engineering largely escaped the ravages of the past 13 years—the defence sector, which in many ways represents the very best, the finest, of British engineering, with world-class design, development and production facilities, and with the finest skilled work force of its kind in Europe. Sadly, this vital sector of engineering is now at risk as a result of what I have to describe as the haphazard and random cuts being forced through by the Treasury. These cuts not only threaten huge additional redundancies amongst defence workers but also, I believe, call into question the maintenance of Britain's strategic defence industries and the ability of a future British Government to call upon our indigenous defence industrial base to meet our national defence requirements.

I do not believe that these are exaggerated claims. Redundancies announced recently by defence contractors largely make the point. In recent months we have had the declaration of 4,000 redundancies at Lucas Industries, 3,000 at British Aerospace and the closure of the works at Hatfield, nearly 600 at Rolls-Royce Aero Engines in Coventry, 400 at Marconi Underwater Systems, nearly 1,000 at Cammell Laird, and the closure of one of the finest British shipyards. Some 1,300 jobs have been lost recently at Royal Ordnance plc, 1,200 jobs have been lost recently at Swan Hunter on the Tyne and 400 jobs were recently lost in my constituency at the Vickers shipyard in Barrow.

The list is dismal and it spells misery and insecurity for thousands of defence workers and their families. The combined total of job losses in the defence industries over the past two years reaches the staggering total of almost 80,000.

Let us consider some of the consequences of those redundancies in the defence communities. Some of the findings are truly startling. In my constituency, the consequences and effects of unemployment have already had a devastating impact. The number of people claiming sickness benefit is rising rapidly in my constituency—twice as fast as in other comparable towns in the northern region. The figure has risen by 30 per cent. in the past 18 months. There are almost 100 new claims for sickness benefit every week, which is three times the national average. Stress-related illnesses have risen and the suicide rate has increased fivefold among young men in my constituency. More tranquillisers are prescribed in my constituency than anywhere else in Cumbria.

Why should defence workers be forced to pay the price for the peace dividend? Their contribution to the nation's defence has always been exemplary. Now that the cold war is over—hon. Members of all parties welcome that—it is completely unacceptable that their service to the nation is being rewarded in this way. It is being rewarded by unemployment and ill health, as the experience in my constituency has clearly shown.

The Opposition recognise the need for defence spending to reflect the new security requirements of Britain and of our NATO allies. I am sure that that is common ground between us. My criticism of the Government is that there is no sign and as yet no evidence that they have appreciated the need for strategic planning in phasing down present levels of defence spending or that they have any coherent approach towards dealing with the surplus capacity in the industry.

We may have arrived at the kernel of the problem. It is not true to say that there is surplus capacity in the defence industries. I argue that we now have released capacity. We have under-utilised capacity in this sector of the engineering base. It is tragic that the Government are not able to develop any coherent policy for dealing with the extra capacity in the defence industries. With imagination and resolve, that under-utilised capacity could be saved for the benefit of the United Kingdom engineering and manufacturing industries and, most importantly, for the long-term future of many defence-dependent communities.

Two years after "Options for Change", there are significant redundancies in the defence industrial base of Britain. Major redundancies are still to come. It has been estimated that as many as 125,000 further defence workers will lose their jobs over the next five years. That is appalling. To date, the Government have shown no strategic ability to plan for the future of the British defence industrial base.

There is a real risk that we are coming close to a melt-down. Strategically important British defence companies are shedding workers at an alarming rate. European defence companies are not shedding workers in the same numbers as British defence companies are.

Mrs. Ann Winterton (Congleton): I commend the hon. Gentleman on choosing this subject for his Adjournment debate tonight. He briefly mentioned Royal Ordnance. Is he aware that I have a small arms manufacturing capacity at Radway Green in my constituency? Is he aware that it is a strategically important industry? If the Government do not provide orders for that factory, we shall not be able to manufacture small arms ammunition any more in this country; we shall have to rely on being supplied from overseas. Is he aware of the importance of orders coming to Radway Green so that the factory can plan its production and capacity for the future?

Mr. Hutton: I absolutely agree with the hon. Lady. There is no doubt that Royal Ordnance lies at the centre of Britain's defence industry; it is impossible to imagine an indigenous defence industry in this country without a buoyant and vibrant Royal Ordnance, with sufficient orders and employing the skilled workers in their factories. In particular, I know the importance of the establishment in the hon. Lady's constituency. So we are in complete agreement about the significance of Royal Ordnance and its central role in Britain's defence industries.

It is worth pointing out—I am sure that the hon. Lady is fully aware of this—that there have been more than 10,000 redundancies at Royal Ordnance since it was privatised in 1987, despite significant improvements in productivity and the increased ability of Royal Ordnance to turn orders into deliveries in a short time. I hope to deal with Royal Ordnance in greater detail shortly.

We are in a serious situation. As I have said, we are close to a melt-down, and I stick to that. The British defence industry has suffered significant and heavy losses of its key, skilled industrial work force, particularly Barrow and Furness where we have lost more than 6,500 workers from the VSEL shipyard since October 1990. My understanding of the redundancies from Vickers leads me to conclude that it is the most important and highly skilled engineering workers who are the casualties of the heavy job losses from that work force. It is impossible to imagine shipyards like VSEL and Swan Hunter on the Tyne being able to survive into the next century while sustaining the present high level of redundancies amongst its key industrial workers.

In the context of Royal Ordnance, it is very important that there is a speedy renewal of the ammunition and equipment purchasing agreement. In the past five years, Royal Ordnance has demonstrated its ability to change, and it is worth pointing out that there is full co-operation between the trade unions at Royal Ordnance and the management of the company in trying to achieve some of the new targets facing them in very difficult trading circumstances.

Therefore, I hope that the Minister can give some assurance tonight to the House and to many thousands of workers throughout the country that a speedy renewal of the agreement is imminent because, without it, there is a real fear among the Royal Ordnance work force of further substantial and, I believe, unjustified redundancies. As the hon. Member for Congleton (Mrs. Winterton) has made clear, that will result in an increased reliance by the British armed forces on equipment and supplies from foreign contractors. On defence grounds, quite apart from social and employment considerations, that is an extremely unhealthy situation for the British armed forces to find themselves in.

I hope that the Minister can also make some clearer commitment to the House tonight about the state of various important naval procurement decisions that need to be taken without further delay, and, in particular, three decisions that many Opposition Members expect shortly —the launch platform helicopter vessel and the two launch platform docks.

Mr. Stephen Byers (Wallsend): May I take this opportunity to congratulate my hon. Friend not just on his selection of this topic for debate on the Adjournment but on the way in which he has addressed the concerns of many people in many constituencies and not just those of his own constituency, Barrow and Furness. Having said that, I make no apology for addressing my remarks solely to Swan Hunter, in my constituency of Wallsend. My hon. Friend referred to the helicopter carrier that we are all aware is a vital order. It is particularly vital to the future well-being of Swan Hunter. Swan Hunter has sought to diversify into the merchant shipbuilding sector but has been denied access to European Community intervention funding; it must, therefore, rely on Ministry of Defence orders.

We know that, for the Royal Navy, the helicopter carrier is a top priority. It is also a top priority for the people of the north-east, and we want an indication from the Minister tonight that the order will be placed as soon as possible, because we are confident that it will be won by Swan Hunter and thereby keep jobs in Wallsend and bring new hope to the riverside communities on the Tyne.

Mr. Hutton: I agree with my hon. Friend. The Swan Hunter shipyard on the Tyne is without doubt a centre of world-class engineering excellence. Many of my hon. Friend's constituents will be anxiously awaiting what the Minister has to say about the landing platform helicopter order.

It is also worth bearing in mind the importance to the Navy and to what is left of the British naval shipbuilding industry of the orders for landing platform docks. That matter is of concern to my constituents, as too is the order for the batch 2 Trafalgars. Many of my hon. Friends and I are concerned that one of the changes resulting from "Options for Change" is the substantial reductions in the number of submarines serving in the Royal Navy. Many hon. Members will be concerned that 12 SSNs—nuclear-powered submarines—might not be sufficient for the Royal Navy in future.

Will the Minister give an assurance that the very minimum order for the Batch 2 Trafalgars will be sufficient to replace all the aging Swiftsure class of SSNs? That is a matter of great and direct interest to the future prosperity of my constituents. Without any doubt, the VSEL shipyard in Barrow is the finest manufacturer of submarines in the world.

In addition to those decisions on naval procurement decisions, there should be some help for companies that now find themselves without any MOD work at all or with declining volumes of MOD work. I have noted the responses that the Minister's right hon. Friends have given in response to questions in the House on this matter, but it is not good enough for the Ministry of Defence to say that it is up to defence contractors to respond to their changing needs on their own without any assistance from the Ministry of Defence or other Government Departments.

Many of those suppliers have provided equipment for the defence of this country, often at very short notice—for example, during the Falklands crisis. It is not the proper reward for the service that those companies have rendered to the country over many decades for Ministers now to say that it is up to those private companies to sort out the problem on their own. Those companies have been sole suppliers for the MOD, often for decades—for generations in many cases, as is the case with the shipyard in Barrow. They therefore look to the Ministry of Defence and, legitimately, to the Government to provide them with practical assistance at this moment.

There is a crisis for many important engineering defence contractors. We simply cannot make many of those necessary changes and adjustments on our own. I ask the Minister to consider seriously that it is not a reasonable response for him and his right hon. Friends consistently to say to defence contractors such as VSEL in Barrow, "You are on your own." People in my constituency do not consider that that is anything like a sufficient response from the Government.

The Minister and his Department should be developing a policy in conjunction with other Government Departments to manage the painful process of change before irreversible damage is done to the foundations of Britain's engineering defence industries.

10.17 pm

Dr. John Reid (Motherwell, North): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Hutton) for raising this subject and also for giving me a short period—I promise—in which to make one important point. I shall be brief, because the Minister will want to respond to a number of points. The issue that I raise is the state of the royal ordnance factories, and in particular two outstanding contracts which, quite frankly, the Government have dithered over for a considerable period. The first issue is the L106, which is the contract for fuses. Last week, I visited Chorley and Blackburn factories. The management and the work force there as well as at other factories throughout the country are desperately worried. The management of Royal Ordnance factories and their workers and I expect an extremely early announcement. I hope that the Minister is able to respond tonight.

On the L106, if the Minister provides only a contract or a tender for a 12-month period, it will place Royal Ordnance plc at a tremendous disadvantage as it will have to spread the load of reduced expenditure and reduced purchasing over a five-year period at least to avoid the worst effects of the decline in defence procurement for the RAF.

The second and more general issue is an even greater scandal. It is the replacement for the explosives, propellants and related products agreement five-year contract which was placed with Royal Ordnance just after privatisation about five years ago. In other words, for five years the Government have had the full knowledge that the contract will finish in March. Anyone who knows the industry is well aware of the importance of putting a contract out to tender early. Royal Ordnance plc is not frightened of competition.

The contract should be for another five years to give Royal Ordnance the opportunity to compete on an even playing field. It should also be comprehensive, as was the EPREP contract. That would give Royal Ordnance the opportunity to tender for a range of ammunition. If the contract is short term and for specific pieces of ammunition, rather than comprehensive, Royal Ordnance will be placed at a disadvantage to its foreign competitors.

The hon. Member for Congleton (Mrs. Winterton) mentioned the difficulties which her factory at Radway Green will face. There is a reduction in the demand for ammunition from that factory of more than 70 per cent. We cannot possibly expect a Royal Ordnance factory to base its future projections merely on next year's figures. When there is a 73 per cent. reduction in the demand for ammunition and no comprehensive, long-term offer for a range of ammunition over five years is put out to tender, Royal Ordnance will be competitive.

I am sure that I speak for hon. Members on both sides of the House when I say that the Minister should be able to give a definite response to our questions. In one case there have been delays for months. In another case, the Government have had five years in which to decide what they will do. If they do not know now, they will never know.

The Minister of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. Jonathan Aitken): As is traditional on these adjournment debates, I begin by congratulating the hon. Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Hutton) on his good fortune in raising such an important subject for debate today. The hon. Gentleman represents a higher proportion of constituents who are involved in the defence industries than any other hon. Member in the House. He has certainly been a most assiduous and energetic Member in championing their cause in debates and in representations to Ministers.

Some of the points which the hon. Gentleman made verged on the exaggerated and the melodramatic. It was totally uncharacteristic to hear such a tremendous trumpeting, even from the new, modern Labour party, of the need to spend taxpayers' money on defence in the ways suggested by the hon. Gentleman. I should not be surprised. The first time that I heard of the hon. Gentleman was during the election campaign when, with a great flash of excitement, he described the Opposition spokesman on defence as ignorant and ill-informed.

Dr. Reid: Not defence, foreign affairs.

Mr. Aitken: It was the Opposition spokesman on foreign affairs. There was a small choice in rotten apples, as Shakespeare used to say. The particular rotten apple to which the hon. Member for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid) was referring was the Opposition spokesman on foreign affairs. On one occasion when the Opposition spokesman on foreign affairs was speaking on defence matters, he got it entirely wrong and was condemned.

One would not think that one was addressing a party which had voted at its national conference for swingeing cuts in defence expenditure which would be equivalent to £6 billion. There is a remarkable difference between the quiet voice in the Adjournment debate of an hon. Member representing defence constituencies and the noisy voice of the Labour party conference bellowing for greater cuts.

Mr. Hutton: Surely the Minister is not saying that I have a quiet voice on such matters. He described comments which I made previously in another context.

Mr. Aitken: I certainly do not accuse the hon. Gentleman of inconsistency. I was simply saying that there are great splits and inconsistencies in the Labour party. I also suggested that there was a touch of exaggeration in some of the language he used.

It is not correct to say that a meltdown is taking place in our defence industries. The hon. Gentleman painted a picture of suicides, tranquillisers and a meltdown. The reality is that our defence industries face difficult times. With the changed security environment, we must reduce our defence budget by some 10 per cent. over three years. That is a serious reduction, but it is not such a dramatic reduction as that with which many other industries have had to cope.

As some compensation for those industries, we have a booming defence export side. British companies are showing satisfactory successes around the world. They now secure some 20 per cent. of the world export market, which is equivalent to about £4·5 billion a year. If one adds together our total domestic defence spending of some £9 billion on equipment and the burgeoning success of our exports at £4·5 billion, that is a £13·5 billion-a-year defence industry, which is a long way from a meltdown creating suicides and the melodramatic scenario sketched by the hon. Gentleman. Having said that, of course there are real problems. Several perfectly valid and fair points were raised tonight and I shall do my best to answer them in the short time that remains to me.

I was asked several questions about Royal Ordnance. In addition to the points made by the hon. Member for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid), my hon. Friend the Member for Congleton (Mrs. Winterton) raised a valid point. She came to see me with several of our hon. Friends and made some effective representations, to which I listened carefully.

Royal Ordnance is a fine British company which has been given the benefit of the explosives, propellants and related products agreement for the past few years. I have considerable sympathy with the difficult position that it will face as expenditure on defence equipment reduces by some 10·5 per cent. in the next three years. The force levels on which our planning is based mean that a reduction in ammunition orders is unavoidable.

A rationalisation of the facilities of Royal Ordnance was recently announced by the company. That is a matter for the company, but I have noted that British Aerospace has said that it remains committed to a strategy of extending the scope of its presence in the defence market, with Royal Ordnance playing the lead role in the land systems sector. I am sure that, if Royal Ordnance continues to make good progress in increasing its competitiveness, its products will continue to win orders from both the Ministry of Defence, its domestic customer, and overseas customers.

On the specific question of the EPREP agreement, I informed the House on 8 December that we did not intend to negotiate a successor agreement. The EPREP agreement was acknowledged from the start to be an interim agreement designed to give the newly privatised company a degree of certainty about its future business for five years. That was done so that it could achieve economies by rationalising and modernising its factories. That policy has been successful. It is now time for my Department to move, as was always the intention, to fully commercial arrangements with the company in accordance with our long-standing procurement policies.

To this end, as I said in the House on 24 November, we have investigated the possibility of placing longer-term ammunition contracts. That is the very point which the hon. Member for Motherwell, North raised today. I am pleased to announce to the House that I have decided to follow that route. The Ministry of Defence contracts bulletin to be published on 3 February will include details of a package of ammunition requirements for delivery over a five-year period from 1993 to 1998. I expect that the majority of those orders will be won by competition.

The quest for value for money remains at the centre of our approach, but the longer-term contracts will help to secure the armed forces' sources of supply of key types of ammunition, as well as giving industry and particularly Royal Ordnance much greater confidence and greater opportunities to plan ahead with security. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Congleton and other hon. Members who have raised the matter will be encouraged that we have moved in the direction that they sought.

Next, I was asked about some naval orders. The hon. Member for Wallsend (Mr. Byers) asked me for the current position on the landing platform helicopter, which I acknowledge is of great interest to the fine company of Swan Hunter, many of the employees of which work in the hon. Gentleman's constituency.

Tenders for the LPH were received by 1 October last year. An announcement of the outcome of the tender exercise will be made following the full evaluation of the tenders received. That is not likely to be before the autumn this year. That is the normal time that it takes to evaluate such major tenders. That amount of time is needed because we must make a proper evaluation to ensure fair competition and best value for money.

I am afraid that it is highly unlikely that the order will be advanced. The LPH is expected to enter service in the second half of the decade.

Mr. Byers: The Minister will understand the importance of the timing of the order. I hear what he says about the need to evaluate properly the tenders that have been received. May I urge him to make haste in evaluating the tenders. It is important to Swan Hunter that the date is brought forward, if possible from autumn this year. Will he give an undertaking that he will at least consider the possibility of proceeding with greater haste in order to bring forward the placing of the order?

Mr. Aitken: I shall consider the hon. Gentleman's request, because it is fair. We have a duty to be fair to other competitors, but I know of the great importance of the order to the shipbuilding industry and to Swan Hunter and we shall do what we can, although I cannot hold out any great hope at this stage of making unduly remarkable, or particularly rapid progress.

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): Will the Minister confirm, once and for all, that the Government will definitely make that order and that it will be for a new-build vessel?

Mr. Aitken: No Defence Minister can announce an order in advance of consideration of the tenders and of studying the financial position of the Ministry of Defence's budget at that moment. We have entered into the tender process in good faith and I have no reason to be anything other than positive about it.

I think that I have dealt with the LPH situation. I was also asked about the submarine force, which is of particular interest to the hon. Member for Barrow and Furness, who is the Member of Parliament for the great Vickers Shipbuilding and Engineering Company Ltd. As he is aware, the Government are determined that the principles of competition and sound procurement practice will apply to the future order of submarines. We are already planning for the replacement of the Swiftsures and VSEL has completed its contract for design option studies for a second batch of Trafalgars, known as the batch 2 T class, or sometimes B2TC, and we are considering the results of those studies.

Under sound procurement practice we must place a contract with a capable prime contractor and we think that that practice should be applied to the programme. We need and intend to have an adequate submarine force for the 21st century and we envisage the batch 2 Trafalgar class playing a crucial role in that process. We are now evaluating the studies produced by VSEL.

After some sound remarks about shipbuilding and Royal Ordnance, the hon. Gentleman switched to a familiar litany of the need for practical assistance—which decoded, means taxpayer's money—for defence diversification policy. I have to be very cautious and hesitant here, because the swords into ploughshares policy that the Labour party has espoused at various stages is not the business of Government or of taxpayer's money. The question of how we should respond to diversification——

Oral Answers to Questions

NORTHERN IRELAND

Inward Investment

1. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what were the levels of investment from abroad in 1991-92.

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. Robert Atkins): In 1991-92, 430 new jobs were promoted from new green field investment, with negotiations under way on a number of additional projects. I am delighted that announcements about some of these additional projects have since been made and that others can be expected shortly.

Mr. Arnold: Given the unfortunate perception abroad of the situation in Northern Ireland, is not it important that approaches to foreign investors be made on a co-operative and in many ways a joint basis? In view of that, will my hon. Friend comment on the recent initiatives in that regard by the hon. Members of Belfast, North (Mr. Walker) and for Belfast, West (Dr. Hendron)?

Mr. Atkins: My hon. Friend is right. The hon. Gentlemen to whom he refers will know the success of their trip. It highlights the fact that the communities can work together and the importance of investment from other parts of the world and shows that aims that are important to the whole Province can be achieved by parliamentary colleagues as well as those in industry.

Rev. Martin Smyth: Will the Minister enlarge on his answer? We welcome the 400 new jobs. Were they created by new firms or are the expansion of existing firms? How many foreign investment firms folded in Northern Ireland in 1992?

Mr. Atkins: I cannot give the hon. Gentleman a detailed answer to his second question withour prior notice, but I shall, of course, write to him with the details. As everyone is aware, during the recession Northern Ireland, like everywhere else, has had a hard time. Not as many jobs were created in 1991-92 as one would have wished, but I am sure that the hon. Gentleman knows that in the latter part of last year and already in the early part of this year good news has been announced. I have hopes of more in the future.

Rev. William McCrea: Does the Minister appreciate the extent of the deprivation and unemployment in my constituency? Does he accept that it will take tremendous Government help and initiative to encourage people from abroad to come to the Province and especially to the west of the Province? Will he assure the House that, to that end, he will give every encouragement and assistance to hon. Members?

Mr. Atkins: Of course, I assure the hon. Gentleman that we will not let up in our attempt to get investment to all parts of Northern Ireland. The hon. Gentleman will recall that my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State was in the hon. Gentleman's constituency recently and I have fond memories of that visit there. I shall continue to do my best not only for the hon. Gentleman's constituency but for all the Northern Ireland constituencies.

Mr. McGrady: The Minister will be aware that inward investment should be available to all areas of Northern Ireland. I draw his attention to the novelty by which, in the past three years, of 875 first visits only 10 were to South Down. That is less than 1 per cent. If we are to have equal opportunity and fair employment, new inward investment must, as far as possible, be directed to the rural areas. Does he agree that the excuse that inward investment inquiries require urbanised areas does not hold water because South Down is only 10 miles from the centre of Belfast and the docks, and the southern half has a new modern dock facility of its own?

Mr. Atkins: The hon. Gentleman never lets up in fighting his corner for his patch and quite right, too. That is true of all Northern Ireland Members. I am aware of his concern and I have taken it up with the Industrial Development Board. The hon. Gentleman is an understanding chap who appreciates these matters and knows that it is sometimes difficult to attract companies to rural areas, even those as beautiful as his constituency. We take his caution to heart. I know that the hon. Gentleman does an enormous amount of work trying to establish a link with Chicago and I have hopes that we may be able to attract companies from that great city to his constituency. I am happy to help the hon. Gentleman in achieving his objectives.

Political Initiatives

2. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on new political initiatives in Northern Ireland.

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Sir Patrick Mayhew): The Northern Ireland parties that participated in last year's talks agreed with the two Governments that further dialogue was desirable and necessary. I am continuing informal consultations with party leaders about the way ahead. I expect to meet Mr. Dick Spring, Tanaiste and Minister for Foreign Affairs in the new Irish Government, tomorrow. There is important unfinished business to be addressed.

Mr. Skinner: Does the Secretary of State ever get in touch with the United Nations about sorting out the problems in Northern Ireland? Every time that I am in the Chamber for Foreign Office questions, I hear that Britain is poking its nose into or is supporting peacekeeping forces in several countries throughout the world, including Croatia, Bosnia, Somalia and Iraq. Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman ever consider that one fine day someone might suggest, now that Clinton has been elected, that the United Nations should sort out the problems in Northern Ireland? What would be the right hon. and learned Gentleman's answer?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: The hon. Gentleman is an occasional supporter of United Nations intervention and now he suggests that it should intervene in Northern Ireland. I am a strong supporter of the human rights that the United Nations was founded to preserve. It is because I am determined to uphold the human rights denied to so many people by the terrorists that I support the British Government's policy in the way that I do. I believe that with the support of the people of Northern Ireland, there will be no need to trouble the United Nations or anybody else.

Mr. Peter Robinson: In his controversial speech in Coleraine, the Secretary of State described Government policy as being that of a facilitator—they would facilitate Northern Ireland remaining in the United Kingdom if that were its wish, but with equal joy and alacrity they would support a united Ireland if that were the wish of the people of Northern Ireland. Will the Secretary of State come down off the fence long enough to say whether his is still a Unionist party?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I have sometimes thought that the controversy associated with my speech in Coleraine is a manufactured one. Nothing of substance in that speech had not been said by my distinguished predecessor at least two years ago. There was nothing in my remarks concerning the Union to occasion surprise to anyone. I said that as long as the greater number of people living in Northern Ireland wanted to continue being a part of the United Kingdom, that would be warmly, solemnly and sincerely respected and upheld. If, on the other hand, the day should come when the majority wanted some other citizenship, the British Government would not stand in the way. I find it difficult to see any point of principle that would be supported in the House which would lead to a contrary conclusion.

Mr. Maginnis: Does the Secretary of State agree that during the previous round of talks on the political future of Northern Ireland, we pretty well exhausted the process whereby all parties sit round one table and that the next stage must inevitably be a bilateral approach? Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman further agree that at the very end of the previous talks, the Ulster Unionist party put a fair and generous proposal on the table which has yet to be addressed and to receive a response from the Irish Government? Is not it the Secretary of State's wish that the Irish Government should respond positively to the matters that were placed before them? Until they do, it will be extremely difficult to move any process forward.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: There were times when I thought that the process was exhausting ourselves, but I do not believe that we exhausted the opportunities for meeting all together round a table. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that much useful work was done in a more informal format towards the end. It is certainly true that the hon. Gentleman's party put forward a paper on 9 November and the hon. Gentleman heard me say a moment ago that we have unfinished business to address.

Sir James Kilfedder: The Irish Foreign Minister, Dick Spring—who has a distinguished record as a rugby player—has now become a powerhouse in Dublin politics. When the Secretary of State meets Mr. Spring tomorrow, will he welcome Mr. Spring's promise of a new dawn in relations with Northern Ireland, while urging him not to make it a false dawn that would give further encouragement to the IRA and any other terrorists in Northern Ireland?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I do not believe that any member of the new Irish Government wishes to give any encouragement to the IRA. In that regard, the Irish Government are absolutely in line with Her Majesty's Government. I am greatly looking forward to tomorrow's meeting; I think that I had better leave it to take place, rather than going with extracts from what Mr. Spring or anyone else may have said particularly in mind.

Mr. Mallon: The Secretary of State will agree that much solid and analytical work was done during the recent talks. We all welcome that. Does the Secretary of State also agree, however, that, if we are to achieve a far-reaching, comprehensive agreement that will bring permanent peace to Northern Ireland, we must face the real, positive, intractable problems?

May I suggest that, in any future talks, those problems are put at the top of the agenda and faced head on? We should not put them lower down on the agenda and hope that they will go away. If we take such action, we shall be starting from a positive viewpoint, rather than simply postponing the day when a further end will come to further talks, thus inflicting more damage on the whole political psyche in Northern Ireland.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: The good sense of the hon. Gentleman's remarks augurs well for future talks and for the contribution that he himself will make.

Mr. Hunter: May we be more specific? Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that more flexibility on the part of the Government of the Republic regarding articles 2 and 3 would greatly help the prospect of a resumption of meaningful constitutional talks? If so, will he make specific reference to that in his dialogue with the Government of the Republic?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who takes a close interest in the Province. Having just endorsed the principle enunciated by the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon), I think that I would be unwise to allow myself to be led into discussion of particular applications of that principle; but I shall bear in mind what my hon. Friend has said.

Mr. McNamara: I am sure that the House appreciates the wisdom of that last comment. We do not want to start discussing the Government of Ireland Act 1920.

Does the Secretary of State expect, following tomorrow's meeting with Mr. Spring, to be able to announce the date of the next intergovernmental conference? Will he be able to discuss with Mr. Spring not only the unfinished business to which he referred, but a firm programme of work in regard to the Anglo-Irish Agreement?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: As the hon. Gentleman knows, the Government stand by the Anglo-Irish Agreement, which provides for intergovernmental conferences at frequent and regular intervals. I do not doubt that we shall arrange for such a conference to take place at an early stage.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: One of the most welcome political initiatives is the letter that the Prime Minister sent to the leader of the Social Democratic and Labour party about the events that took place in Derry just over 20 years ago. Would not it be a welcome move towards justice—even in retrospect—for my right hon. and learned Friend to announce at some stage that those people should not have been shot and that, following the shooting, the tribunal should not have allowed any slur or cloud to remain over them?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: We are approaching the anniversary of a very sad occasion. I am afraid that the history of Ireland is littered with occasions of great sadness which—because they involve deaths—cause regret to all sensible people. I think it unwise, however, to reopen discussion of matters that were subject to a judicial inquiry many years ago and I do not propose to do so.

Travel Links

3. Ms. Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to improve travel links between Northern Ireland and the rest of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Atkins: Over the period 1989-93 almost £180 million will have been spent on improvements to Northern Ireland's ports, airports, railway and roads systems, with the primary objective of improving Northern Ireland's transport links with the rest of the United Kingdom and the continent. The Northern Ireland transportation operational programme, which is administered by the Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland, is contributing £120 million towards these works by way of grant from the European regional development fund.

Ms. Hoey: The Minister will agree that it is becoming increasingly difficult for people in Northern Ireland to travel to the rest of the United Kingdom because of the expense involved and the lack of sea crossings. Most people have to travel by air. Does the Minister agree that it is nonsense that I should pay £198 return to go to Belfast with British Airways while, on the same day, someone else pays £196 return to travel to Boston with Virgin Atlantic Airways and Richard Branson? Might not it be a good idea to call in Richard Branson to sit round a table with British Airways and British Midland to work out a cheaper fare to Belfast, so that people can travel more easily to and from the rest of the United Kingdom?

Mr. Atkins: I have considerable sympathy with the hon. Lady's remarks in the context of air fares both regional and international—a matter with which I had something to do when I was a Minister with responsibility for transport in Great Britain. It is a difficult problem because to reduce fares one needs the agreement of other countries as well as the country from which one wishes to fly. I do not entirely agree with the hon. Lady that transportation between Great Britain and Northern Ireland has deteriorated—indeed, the SeaCat service from Belfast to Stranraer is now so popular that the company has announced that it will be introducing another such service in the spring to meet the demand. That is a sign that not all links are quite as difficult as the hon. Lady suggests.

Cross-border Co-operation

4. Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will arrange to meet representatives of the new Government of the Republic of Ireland to discuss cross-border co-operation.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I look forward to meeting the Tanaiste and Foreign Minister, Mr. Spring, tomorrow.

Mr. Canavan: Is not it self-evident that the best form of cross-border co-operation would be to work for the creation of conditions that led to the disappearance of the border? Will the Secretary of State make it absolutely clear that he will restart a meaningful dialogue in that respect, involving all parties interested in a non-violent solution? Will he also make it absolutely clear that if any party or parties should threaten to boycott the talks, meaningful dialogue will nevertheless proceed? I say that because any party unwilling to participate in democratic debate should not have a veto on democratic constitutional change.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: The hon. Gentleman knows that I wish talks to take place. I take comfort from the fact that, at the conclusion of the previous talks on 10 November, all parties agreed with the statement of the independent chairman that the objectives were valid and achievable and that it was desirable and necessary that further talks should take place. I am very glad about that.

As to working for the removal of the border, I am afraid that that is a proposition whose simplicity—not to say its quality of being simplistic—has in the past characterised rather too many English ideas for the solution of Irish problems.

Mr. Molyneaux: As British subjects have been under fire from the territory of the Republic, will the Secretary of State place at the top of his agenda for his meeting with Mr. Spring the need for greatly increased security co-operation along the frontier—especially at a time when there is much misunderstanding about the removal of certain controls and frontiers elsewhere in Europe?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: The right hon. Gentleman refers to the disgraceful incident at Mullan bridge in County Fermanagh a fortnight or so ago. It is right to recall that, on that occasion, there was close co-operation between the Garda Siochana and the Royal Ulster Constabulary and that, shortly after the incident, a man was arrested by the Garda Siochana in connection with it.

There is close co-operation although, of course, it can always be improved. That is one of the matters that I am looking forward to discussing—as we generally do—at the intergovernmental conferences. I agree that there is much misunderstanding about the effect of the Single European Act and the arrival of the single market. That has no bearing on the need for really close security control over crossing points at the border.

Dr. Hendron: When the Secretary of State meets Mr. Dick Spring and other members of the Irish Government, will he use those meetings to try to encourage some of the top 500 companies in the Republic to set up in Northern Ireland and, in particular, in deprived areas such as west and north Belfast?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I warmly support all ideas for investment in Northern Ireland. I was very surprised at how little trade to and fro, between north and south, there had been until quite recent years. That situation is improving and I want to encourage it.

Mr. Stott: To follow the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, West (Dr. Hendron), the Secretary of State will be aware that the whole of the island of Ireland has category 1 status and that the Republic of Ireland has access to the cohesion fund. Given that the internal market in Europe is now fully operational, what proposals will the Secretary of State be making to the Government of the Republic so that the whole of the island of Ireland can benefit from the new arrangements and not suffer as a consequence of its peripherality to mainland Europe?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: Objective 1 status is extremely important and I am very pleased that our representations resulted in that status being retained for Northern Ireland. Although Northern Ireland is peripheral to the mainland of Europe, it none the less represents just as effective a gateway to the common market as any location, for example, in the centre of France or Germany. There is much to be said for co-operation between the Republic and the United Kingdom to ensure that we get the best advantage from our common membership of the European Community. That lies behind a very important part of our policy.

Statutory Development Plans

6. Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on progress in having up-to-date statutory development plans for all areas.

Mr. Atkins: With the exception of the Craigavon district council area and the rural areas of Newtownabbey and Castlereagh, all parts of Northern Ireland are covered by statutory development plans. A plan for the Newtownabbey area is being prepared at present and it is intended to start work on plans for the Craigavon and Castlereagh areas later this year.

Mr. Trimble: We have had a statutory framework for town and country planning in Northern Ireland for 20 years. However, as the Minister said, there is still no statutory development plan in Craigavon. Does the Minister agree that informal, non-statutory plans of dubious standing are no substitute and that we need a formal plan as soon as possible with a clear Government commitment to the development of Craigavon and especially the regeneration of Lurgan town centre?

Mr. Atkins: The hon. Gentleman has been assiduous in representing the cause of his constituents, particularly following the damage to Lurgan after that dreadful bomb. He has been to see me and, as he knows, I have met representatives of the council. I am very conscious of the deficiency to which I referred in my main answer and I will do what I can to ensure that the problems of the hon. Gentleman's constituents, and of Lurgan in particular, are addressed as soon as possible.

Home Ownership

7. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about the level of home ownership in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Atkins: By the end of May 1992, the total number of owner-occupied properties was 358,500 or 66 per cent. of the total housing stock. More than 52,000 of those owner-occupiers have bought their houses from the Northern Ireland Housing Executive under its voluntary sales scheme while a further 11,800 have entered home-ownership through the co-ownership scheme operated by the Northern Ireland Co-ownership Housing Association.

Mr. Marshall: May I congratulate my hon. Friend on that answer which demonstrates that Government policies have enabled many people to enjoy home ownership for whom 15 years ago it was only a dream? Does he agree with me, however, that, important as home ownership is, it is also important to help those in the lowest income groups? Will he therefore welcome the additional finance made available to the Northern Ireland Office for that purpose?

Mr. Atkins: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He is right to point to the increase in home ownership. In 1986, not very long ago, the figure was 59 per cent., so a rise of seven per cent. to 66 per cent. is quite noticeable. My hon. Friend's point about the Northern Ireland tranche of the £750 million made available by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer is very important. It is in the process of providing homes for those in desperate need and will, to an extent, help the Housing Executive in its treatment of this particularly intractable problem.

Political Talks

8. Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the latest talks he has had with Ministers in the Irish Republic concerning progress in the political talks relating to Northern Ireland.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I am meeting Mr. Spring tomorrow.

Mr. Winnick: The whole House will welcome the fact that these talks are to take place, and one hopes that further discussions will take place with the new Irish Government. When they do, will both Governments make it clear how they deplore the continued killings such as, for example, that of the woman last weekend in Northern Ireland who was murdered for no other reason than that she happened to be a Catholic and those of the many who are murdered for no other reason than that they happen to be Protestant? Is not such ethnic cleansing as unacceptable and as much a crime against humanity as what is happening, albeit on a far larger scale, in what was Yugoslavia?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: The hon. Gentleman, who is invariably humane and balanced in his interest in Northern Ireland, is absolutely right: the killings that take place, whether caused by terrorists from one quarter of the community or another, are inexcusable, indefensible and fundamentally inhumane, and I do not doubt that my colleagues in the Government of the Republic take precisely the same view and will express it. What we must do is bear down, through the Royal Ulster Constabulary and with the Army in support, upon all organisations that are committed to the use of violence to gain political ends and always call upon people in the community to have the courage to come forward and, when they have the information, to tell the RUC what they know. These people will be defeated in the end, not simply by the security forces but by the people of Northern Ireland—and defeated they will be.

Mr. Bellingham: Will my right hon. and learned Friend be raising with the new Irish Foreign Minister the point about articles 2 and 3 of the Republic's constitution? Will he agree with me that until these two articles are reviewed, the chance of political talks succeeding is very slim?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I do not wish to be drawn into speculation about the chances of success or failure. I think that the whole House wants these talks to succeed and recognises that, in the matters to be discussed, articles 2 and 3 will play an important part.

Mr. William Ross: Surely the Secretary of State will now realise that the expression that nothing is agreed until everything is agreed is no more than a bit of flotsam left behind the talks that ended last year, so that there is now no reason why progress should not be made where progress is easily possible.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: The hon. Gentleman has always taken a rather uncharacteristically morose view about the talks process, or so it seems to me; it is not a view which was shared by those taking part—and I am sorry that he was not of their number. I think that all the participants will want to consult together as to how best to take the talks forward, what formation and so forth, but I do not think that we will share the hon. Gentleman's rather gloomy view.

Water and Sewerage

9. Mr. Clifford Forsythe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what capital investment was spent on water and sewerage services in Northern Ireland during each year since 1988-89.

Mr. Atkins: The capital investment for new construction and improvement on water services during the years in question was £13·9 million, £16·2 million, £20·6 million and £21 million respectively. The corresponding figures for sewerage services were £12·6 million, £12·4 million, £12·4 million and £16·2 million.

Mr. Forsythe: I thank the Minister for his information, but, in view of the well-known and total outrage at the idea of privatisting water and sewerage services in Northern Ireland, may I assure him that while, during all the talks, cross-community support could not be found for many things, in this case there will be total cross-community opposition to any proposals to privatise water and sewerage services in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Atkins: I am not unaware of the hon. Gentleman's view on this matter, or indeed of the views of other hon. Members from Northern Ireland. As he knows, the Government commitment is that we will privatise as soon as practicable—by 1995 or 1996—but, of course, no firm decisions have been taken on the detail and I am open to consider any views that hon. Gentlemen may wish to put about the methods by which we privatise the water service.

Mr. McNamara: Nevertheless, can the Minister confirm that the proposed sale will be a trade sale—that is, that the people of Northern Ireland will not have the opportunity to buy individual shares if they should so wish? Will he, after he has given figures to the House of the amount of public investment that has already gone into the water and sewage industry, indicate to the House that, in terms of moneys being charged, this valuable Northern Ireland asset will not be sold for less than £500 million?

Mr. Atkins: I cannot confirm what the hon. Gentleman implies, that any decision at all has been made on the method of sale. We are still awaiting the feasibility study and when we get the results of that we shall be in a better position to judge. We have already said that we will consult. So far as capital investment is concerned, we have a rolling programme of investment, as required not only by the European Economic Community but by the need to modernise and bring up to date. We are committed to spending, over the next three years, £49 million, £79 million and £83 million in total on these most important services.

Electricity Supply

10. Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if the regulator for electricity in Northern Ireland will prepare a report on how he envisages supply competition to being available to large users within Northern Ireland after the transitional introductory period of the new bulk supply tariff; and if he will make a statement on the report provided to him by the regulator.

Mr. Atkins: The Director General of Electricity Supply for Northern Ireland has complete responsibility for the development of competition in the supply of electricity. I have therefore arranged for him to write to the hon. Gentleman directly on this matter.

Mr. Beggs: I shall await with interest the reply that is on the horizon. Is the Minister aware of just how serious the situation is, in that the higher electricity costs facing large users threaten the viability of some companies, which may be forced to relocate to Great Britain? With the resultant job losses, that would be disastrous. Will he take note of the fact that the failure by the Secretaries of State for Northern Ireland and for Scotland to extend the Non-fossil Fuel Obligation Renewables Order 1991 to Northern Ireland and Scotland is preventing expansion and job creation in my own constituency, where a company has an outstanding record in manufacturing hydro-generating plant?

Mr. Atkins: The hon. Gentleman has raised this matter with me on numerous occasions and he knows what the Government's view is. I hope that he realises just how sympathetic the Government are to the concern that he expresses. I have also been in constant contact with a number of the large users in the Province, who have represented their concerns to me in terms not only of their own businesses, but of potential inward investment or development of the particular processes to which he refers. I can assure him that I shall continue to take this matter most seriously and to consider it as a matter of importance to ensure that the concerns that he represents are addressed in any way possible.

Lady Olga Maitland: What assurances will my hon. Friend give to the major users of electricity in Northern Ireland that the new price regime will not undermine the profitability of their businesses?

Mr. Atkins: It is fair to say that the large users in Northern Ireland have benefited from the arrangements over many years, but they have been paid for by domestic and smaller commercial users, to their detriment. Clearly, therefore, the resolution of this difficult imbalance has caused some heartburn among the very large users, but is pleasing those further down the scale. As I have indicated, I am very concerned about this matter and I have represented those views, as put to me by hon. Members and industrialists, to my colleagues within the Department of Trade and Industry. I hope that in due course we may be able to see some alleviation of the position, but in the short term it is still a difficult problem.

Mr. Foulkes: If the Minister is genuinely worried about the high cost of electricity in Northern Ireland, why is he promoting the interconnector with Scotland, which will provide high-cost electricity, instead of the Ballymoney lignite proposal or Kilroot phase II which will provide much cheaper electricity as well as jobs in Northern Ireland? Is it not the Minister's job to provide cheap electricity as well as jobs in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Atkins: I would say to the hon. Gentleman, who has waged war on this issue with a great lack of success so far, largely because he flies in the face of the facts, that Kilroot phase II was tendered for against the lignite and lignite lost because of its not being the right price. The lignite to which the hon. Gentleman referred would take much longer to develop than is his contention and would not be available to meet the shortfall of power to which he referred.

The hon. Gentleman should be aware of the environmental consequences of building a substantial opencast mine in the middle of Ballymoney with the effects on the water table, the roads and the environment. It is convenient for the hon. Gentleman to sit there representing a seat in Scotland and tell Northern Ireland that it should scour its countryside for the benefit of his constituents.

Terrorism

11. Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps he is taking to counter terrorist activities; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. Michael Mates): Since my right hon. and learned Friend answered a similar question on 26 November 1992, there have been nine deaths as a result of the security situation in Northern Ireland, including eight civilians and one soldier from the Royal Irish Regiment.

The determination of the Government and the security forces is unequivocal: terrorism will be defeated through the vigorous, impartial and effective actions—within the law—of the police, supported by the army and the general public. The security forces continue to deter and prevent many attacks and bring the perpetrators to justice.

Mr. Thurnham: Can my hon. Friend confirm that security co-operation with the Republic has improved since—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman will resume his seat. One of his colleagues is on his feet.

Mr. Thurnham: Can my hon. Friend confirm that security co-operation with the Republic has improved since the signing of the Anglo-Irish Agreement? Will he ensure that the terrorists never win, despite the attitude of the Labour party?

Mr. Mates: I do not speak for the Labour party. Many Labour Members are as determined as the Government to resist all forms of terrorism within the United Kingdom and anywhere else.

To answer the first question, I can confirm that there has been a major improvement in security co-operation between the forces of law and order, north and south, on the island of Ireland since the signing of the Anglo-Irish Agreement. The agreement has resulted in several major successes against the terrorists, their finances and some of the rackets that they run as well as against those who plot to bomb and kill.

Mr. John D. Taylor: Does the Minister accept that terrorism is defeated by security policies and political leadership from the Government? Does he recognise that there has been a rapid increase in loyalist terrorist violence every year since the imposition of the Anglo-Irish Agreement in 1985? Last year, loyalist terrorists killed more people than the republican terrorists. Does the Minister accept that the controversial speech made by the Secretary of State in Coleraine in December has done nothing to reduce support for loyalist terrorism, which we condemn?

Mr. Mates: No, I do not accept that my right hon. and learned Friend's speech could in any way have been interpreted as giving any comfort to terrorists from either side of the divide. I confirm that there is simply no military solution to the problem. There must be a political progress, which is why my right hon. and learned Friend has made such superhuman efforts to achieve some form of progress between the political parties. Those efforts are due to continue throughout this year.

I agree strongly with the right hon. Gentleman that the upsurge in loyalist violence—the fact that the loyalists are becoming more ruthless when they pick their targets at random and murder people simply because of the religion they hold, without having anything whatever to do with any form of paramilitary organisations—is worrying. The Chief Constable is concerned about it and is taking steps to arrest those people and bring them to justice. We will continue to support him in all that he does.

Local Authorities

12. Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to increase the responsibilities of local authorities in Northern Ireland.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I have no plans to address this in isolation. I believe, however, that there is considerable scope to transfer greater responsibility to locally elected representatives in Northern Ireland. Any proposals regarding regional or local government would need to be widely acceptable and accordingly are best considered in the context of further political talks.

Mrs. Gorman: My right hon. and learned Friend will be aware that all planning applications in Northern Ireland have to be referred to the Secretary of State or to the Northern Ireland Office, whether it is for a chicken shed, a conservatory or whatever? Does he agree that local councillors in Northern Ireland—increasing numbers of whom are Conservative, incidentally—would like to be able to settle such matters locally because they relate to local domestic disputes?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I warmly agree with my hon. Friend. It is absolutely absurd that planning matters of relatively slight importance in the overall scheme of things should be dealt with by Ministers at Stormont. I should like to be the last Secretary of State charged with that responsibility. However, one cannot deal with that aspect of political advance in isolation. If it is to work, it has to be founded on a basis that is widely acceptable. That is why I believe that it should be considered in the context of the political talks.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. McAllion: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 21 January.

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. McAllion: Is the Prime Minister aware that the murderous attacks on Iraq, which he supported, have killed at least 45 Iraqis—who were themselves innocent of any violation of international law—have made international lepers of Britain and the United States and have, in the eyes of the democratic opposition in Iraq, served only to strengthen the position of the tyrant Saddam? Does he understand that the crimes that he has committed against innocent Iraqi people may have been undertaken in his name, but were not in my name or in the name, I believe, of the vast majority of the British people?

The Prime Minister: I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman. From the expressions on the faces of most of his right hon. and hon. Friends, neither do they.

Mr. Faber: Given that yesterday was the inauguration of President Clinton, will my right hon. Friend confirm that the United States remain our strongest ally, as indeed we do theirs? Will he take this opportunity to reaffirm that the special relationship is greatly valued by Britain, as President Clinton has already done?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I can certainly confirm that to my hon. Friend. There has been a very close relationship between the United Kingdom and the United States for many years. It is a practical relationship, quite apart from the political and military relationship. For example, the United Kingdom is the world's largest overseas investor in the United States and our exports to the United States last year were some £12 billion. I know that President Clinton will have the good wishes of the entire House and I know that he knows that he can look to this country and this Government as firm friends of the United States.

Mr. John Smith: In view of the horrendous rise in unemployment announced today—almost 61,000 in one month—when will the right hon. Gentleman recognise that his economic policies have failed the nation and are now blighting the lives of millions of British families?

The Prime Minister: Today's figures on unemployment are clearly deeply disappointing. They reflect the job losses in the pipeline that were announced last autumn and have now come through. I do not doubt the concern about unemployment that the right hon. and learned Gentleman voices, for I share that concern; so does everyone on this side of the House. We wish to see unemployment falling and people getting back into secure and lasting jobs. That is my objective, just as much as it is the right hon. and learned Gentleman's. But there must be a dual strategy for long-lasting solutions to unemployment. First, there must be solid foundations for economic recovery—low inflation predominantly among them—and secondly, wide-ranging help for the unemployed. That is in place.

Mr. John Smith: The Prime Minister expresses concern for the unemployed, but is he not the same right hon. Gentleman who told us that if it is not hurting it is not working? Is he not the Prime Minister whose first reaction to the announcement of the pit closures was that they had to be closed "cleanly and quickly", and whose Chancellor believes that unemployment is a "price well worth paying"? How can we believe that his expressions of concern are genuine when we take all those factors into account?

The Prime Minister: One of the principal causes of unemployment in countries around the world as well as here is the difficulty faced with inflation. It is this Government who have had the courage to stick with policies to get inflation down, and the reality is, despite all his rhetoric neither the right hon. and learned Gentleman nor his hon. Friends have set out a coherent policy for dealing with unemployment. When they produced their phoney budget, they knew that it was a budget that would increase taxes and put up jobs. The right hon. and learned Gentleman still has not responded to the question that he could not answer on Tuesday. How much money would his new tax on windfall profits raise? If he cannot tell us, how can he make the claims for it that he does? Can he guarantee that it will last only a year? No, he cannot. The fact of the matter is that he has no policies other than to complain about the Government, and no idea how to deal with the economy or unemployment.

Mr. John Smith: Does not the right hon. Gentleman realise that the nation is tired of feeble and lame excuses? It is also tired of the right hon. Gentleman blaming everyone in the world but himself. When, at long last, will he give the attack on unemployment the priority that the nation demands?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. and learned Gentleman has to accept economic reality. He should recognise that economic reality requires that you get inflation down and competitiveness up and those are the policies that we are pursuing. He should recognise also the effect of his policies: crushing profits does not create jobs; tax structures that drive away inward investment do not create jobs; piling burdens on business does not create jobs; the social chapter will not create jobs. Those are the policies of the Labour party; they are policies which would deliberately drive up unemployment and not create the conditions for lasting employment.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: Further to what my right hon. Friend said, does he agree that one of the best ways of helping British industry would be to cut the red tape bureaucracy and regulation with which it has been overburdened for far too long? Does he agree that a new deregulation drive would help industry to create new jobs?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is entirely right about the consistent need persistently to bring down the level of regulation and red tape. The more we can rid business of red tape and regulation, the more British business can get on with creating wealth and generating new jobs. As my hon. Friend will have heard last week in the House, I propose to hold a seminar at the beginning of February—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The House must come to order. The Prime Minister must be heard. We cannot—[Interruption.] We cannot make progress—[Interruption.] I like good humour, but there are times when we have to keep quiet and listen. The Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister: —at which every Department in Whitehall would come along with regulations that Opposition Members would support and which we propose to remove from business to increase competitiveness.

Q2. Mr. Gapes: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 21 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Gapes: In the light of today's report by the Employment Select Committee, will the Prime Minister apologise to the House, to the British people and to the miners for saying on 16 October that it was better to sack 30,000 mine workers "quickly and cleanly" than to institute a full review of the pit closure programme?

The Prime Minister: I think that the way in which the hon. Gentleman phrases his question tells us a great deal about him. What we are seeking to do is to create a viable coal industry with a fitter future. The hon. Gentleman might recall how many mining jobs were lost under Labour Governments, for there were more lost than there ever have been under Conservative Governments—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. Having asked his question, the hon. Gentleman should not bawl and shout from a sedentary position.

Q3. Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 21 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Pawsey: Is my right hon. Friend aware that 642 schools have already applied and balloted for grant-maintained status? Does he agree that that is a formidable expression of public and parental opinion? What advice does he give to Opposition Members who persist in their ill-conceived hostility to grant-maintained schools?

The Prime Minister: In fact, as at the end of last afternoon there were 648—another six have decided to become grant maintained. That is because parents are increasingly seeing the benefit of independence from local authority control. They are voting for grant-maintained schools in increasing numbers and the reason for that is entirely clear. Since opting out they have discovered that they can employ more staff, take on more pupils, enhance special needs provision and provide more books, because they have the freedom to put the money in the classroom where it belongs, and are not subjected to unnecessary control from county hall.

Q4. Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 21 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Marshall: Does not the Prime Minister realise the catastrophic consequences for unemployment if either Devonport or Rosyth dockyards closes? As well as the folly to the nation of concentrating defence work on one site, does he accept that 18,000 jobs are at risk in Rosyth, and that there is a solution that will keep both dockyards open? Does he agree that that solution is to give Devonport the surface ship work that it does best and to give Rosyth the submarine work that it does best? Will he support that solution? If not, why not?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman belongs to a party, many of whom would abolish nuclear weapons, and nearly all of whom would dramatically reduce defence expenditure. I think that the hon. Gentleman should bear that in mind before he criticises this Government for their defence policies.

Q5. Mr. Mans: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 21 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Mans: Will my right hon. Friend assure the House that his Chancellor of the Exchequer has no intention in his Budget of introducing a windfall tax on the privatised utilities, as that would deal a body blow to the 10 million people in this country who have invested in those utilities and would discourage the wider share ownership that we all want in the future?

The Prime Minister: I can certainly offer that assurance to my hon. Friend. As he rightly says, there are 10 million shareholders, many with very limited shareholdings, with a stake in the utility industries in this country. We understand that it is investment which ultimately creates jobs and that taxation on investment destroys jobs.

Q7. Dr. Berry: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 21 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Dr. Berry: May I draw the Prime Minister's attention to early-day motion 330, which calls for the early introduction of a Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill? Is the Prime Minister aware that this early-day motion has substantial cross-party support—in fact, the greatest volume of support of any early-day motion submitted this Session? Does he accept that disabled people want action —very speedy action—and can he confirm that he will respond positively to the early-day motion?

The Prime Minister: For a year I was, of course, the Minister of State responsible for disability, and I am well aware of the Government's excellent record in increasing the benefits for disabled people and providing a much wider range of facilities for them. That is a record unmatched by any other party in the House.

Q8. Mr. French: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 21 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. French: Is my right hon. Friend aware that this country's privatisation programme has been widely applauded and copied in many parts of the world? Can he confirm that, notwithstanding the current criticisms of the British Rail proposals, he will forge ahead with the privatisation programme and will bring forward other candidates, including the Post Office, at an early date?

The Prime Minister: We propose to proceed not only with the programme of privatisation but with programmes of more contracting out and more market testing. In the current year Government work worth about £1·5 billion will be market tested and, where appropriate, put out to the private sector if that sector can deal with it more efficiently.

Business of the House

3.30 pm

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): Will the Leader of the House state the business for next week?

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): Yes, Madam. The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 25 JANUARY—Second Reading of the National Lottery etc. Bill.

Money resolution (No. 2) relating to the Education Bill.

Money resolution (No. 2) and Ways and Means resolution (No. 2) relating to the Housing and Urban Development Bill.

TUESDAY 26 JANUARY—Opposition Day (9th allotted day). There will be a debate described as "The Crisis in the National Health Service" on an Opposition motion.

Motion relating to financial assistance to SCA Aylesford Ltd.

Motion on the Food Protection (Emergency Prohibitions) (Oil and Chemical Pollution of Fish) Order.

WEDNESDAY 27 JANUARY—Progress in Committee on the European Communities (Amendment) Bill, eighth day.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Described as progress.

Mr. Newton: I shall give the hon. Gentleman that one, and continue with the business statement:

THURSDAY 28 JANUARY—Further progress in Committee on the European Communities (Amendment) Bill, ninth day.

FRIDAY 29 JANUARY—Private Members' Bills.

MONDAY 1 FEBRUARY—Yet more progress in Committee on the European Communities (Amendment) Bill, tenth day.

The House will also wish to know that European Standing Committees will meet on Wednesday 27 January at 10.30 am to consider European Community documents as follows:

Standing Committee A—Document No. 8066/92 relating to the creation of a combined transport network.

Standing Committee B—Document No. 8403/92 relating to the utilisation of immovable property on a timeshare basis.

[Wednesday 27 January:
European Standing Committee A
Relevant European Community Document
8066/92 Combined Transport
Relevant Report of the European Legislation Committee
HC 79-x (1992-93)
European Standing Committee B
Relevant European Community Document
8403/92 Timeshare
Relevant Report of the European Legislation Committee
HC 79-vi (1992-93).]

Mrs. Beckett: I thank the Leader of the House for his statement.

It is becoming apparent that, with the concentration of parliamentary time on the Maastricht Bill, there is a growing danger that other matters of considerable importance will be neglected. I remind the right hon. Gentleman, for example, that both sides of the House have an interest in an early debate on the revenue support grant, and Opposition Members at least had anticipated that that debate might take place before the end of January, particularly in view of the predicted job losses in local authorities of all political shades.

I should like to press the right hon. Gentleman for an assurance that there will be a debate, in Government time, on the full public expenditure programme—a debate that we should normally expect to be scheduled for the near future.

Will the Leader of the House please ensure that there will be an early statement on the reorganisation of health authorities? This seems to be taking place almost by the back door. I understand that recent remarks by, I think, an Under-Secretary of State for Health indicated that the Government expect that the original figure of about 190 will ultimately be reduced to 85. A structural change of that magnitude should surely be reported properly in a statement to this House, but it has not been so reported.

Now that we have the report of the Select Committee on Employment and hope shortly to have the report of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry, the House expects the right hon. Gentleman to find time soon for a debate on the future of the coal industry.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Lady is perhaps overstating her case in raising the first point in a week in which we shall be dealing with two important matters as well as the European Communities (Amendment) Bill and a week in which the Opposition have been provided with a further Supply day.

The hon. Lady specifically asked about the revenue support grant orders. While, as she observed, they are not in the business for next week, I do not think she will have an infinite time to wait before she has the opportunity for which she evidently craves.

The answer to her public expenditure programme question is that there was a two-day debate on that matter in Government time before Christmas. In the coming few weeks, the departmental reports flowing from that will be published. It is perhaps in the wake of those publications that further consideration might be given to the point that she raised, but I cannot give a definite undertaking.

I was surprised at the hon. Lady raising the point about health authorities, not because it is not an important issue but because, as it happens, next week an Opposition day debate is to be devoted to health service matters, and on that same day the Secretary of State for Health will be answering questions, which should provide some opportunity for those points to be raised.

I note what the hon. Lady said, perhaps predictably, about the Select Committee reports on coal. I would prefer not to add to what my right hon. Friend and the Minister of State said in answer to questions on that subject yesterday.

Mr. William Powell (Corby): I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to early-day motion 1129 relating to war crimes in Yugoslavia and the need to establish an international court so that those who have committed crimes against humanity in the former Yugoslavia can be brought to trial.

[That this House notes the evidence of war crimes and crimes against humanity in the former Yugoslavia provided by the Reports of Sir John Thomson, Ambassador Correll and his colleagues, Mr. Tadeusz Mazowiecki, the former Prime Minister of Poland and Dame Anne Warburton; welcomes the Statement of 51 Foreign Ministers of the

CSCE on 15th December 1992 calling for 'proposals . . . including the possibility of the establishment of an ad hoc tribunal', as well as the Statement of 16th December 1992 by Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger calling for a 'second Nuremberg' which was followed in December 1992 by the United Nations General Assembly resolution urging 'the Security Council to consider recommending the establishment of an ad hoc International War Crimes Tribunal to try and punish those who have committed war crimes in the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina when sufficient information has been provided by the Commission of Experts'; and urges Her Majesty's Government to promote in the Security Council such a tribunal and to instruct the existing Commissioner of Experts to prepare the statute for such a tribunal.]

In view of today's report by Amnesty International confirming some of the most distressing evidence about rape being committed on a wide scale, and apparently with official sanction, in Yugoslavia, will my right hon. Friend make time available to enable the House to discuss how we can make further progress to establish an international tribunal, which is now accepted by Her Majesty's Government?

Mr. Newton: I cannot give my hon. Friend an immediate undertaking about a debate, but he will be well aware of the concern, to put it very mildly indeed, that the British Government have expressed about those matters, and we very much understand the views that my hon. Friend expresses. The United Nations commission of experts is due to report its findings and recommendations for further action to the United Nations Secretary-General at the end of this month. The British Government will take a close interest in what follows from that.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): May we have an early debate about hill livestock farming in view of the dismay in many parts of the country where hill sheep farming is the predominant agricultural activity at the cuts announced by the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in hill livestock compensatory allowances? Will the Leader of the House look at early-day motion 1208 and other motions which draw attention to the seriousness of the situation?

[That this House calls on Her Majesty's Government to withdraw the Hill Livestock (Compensatory Allowances) (Amendment) Regulations 1993 (S.I., 1993, No. 70) dated 18th January 1993 pending the report of the Select Committee on Agriculture and further consultation with the industry on their level and effect, in the light of the clear evidence of depressed incomes in this sector and widespread impact on the fragile local economies of the hill areas concerned.]

Mr. Newton: I seek to keep abreast of early-day motions and others, but I cannot add to what I said on the subject this time last week. I acknowledge the right hon. Gentleman's concern, but he may agree that it is reasonable to expect him to acknowledge that, in view of the background to the matter, hill sheep farmers can expect to be considerably better off this year.

Mr. John Butcher (Coventry, South-West): May we have a debate on the engineering industry and the role of the engineering profession in safeguarding our economic future and spearheading the recovery? Does my hon. Friend agree that, as part of that debate, it is important to examine the announcement made by the Jaguar Car Company today about the investment of £700 million in three new models, which will safeguard great tranches of the industrial engineering sectors not only in the midlands but nationally? Does he further agree that the proposals should be welcomed and examined for their significance?

Mr. Newton: I agree with my hon. Friend, and his sentiments extend over a longer period than the announcement today to which he referred. Decisions about motor car investment, and not least decisions about investment involving overseas firms coming here to make cars, have been an encouraging feature of the fundamental strengthening of Britain's manufacturing base.

Mr. Derek Enright (Hemsworth): Will the Leader of the House undertake the Herculean task of finding the Secretary of State for Education, who these days seems to be skulking like Achilles in his tent? Will he bring him to the House to explain why, at a time when he is attempting to put through major education proposals, he so underestimates teachers that he offers them a rise of between nought and 1·5 per cent. and promises that they will never catch up on their pay. Is that not a disgrace?

Mr. Newton: It seems to me that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education is very much in evidence, with a series of announcements much welcomed by the public and very foolishly, in my view, opposed by Her Majesty's Opposition.

Mr. David Evennett (Erith and Crayford): Will my right hon. Friend arrange an early debate on local government expenditure? We hear so often, particularly from councils run by the Labour party, that they are short of funds and they have not enough money to run the necessary social services and so forth, but we read in the newspapers that in Sheffield, for example, they are funding political offices for their Members of Parliament.

Madam Speaker: Order. May I tell the entire House that we are questioning a statement about business for next week. I shall not tolerate further questioning that does not relate strictly to the business statement; but perhaps the Leader of the House would like to make some comment.

Mr. Newton: As the question has been asked, Madam Speaker, perhaps I might be allowed to make the point that of course local authorities must act within the law and they are answerable to various bodies, including the Audit Commission, which will no doubt take a keen and critical interest in the point to which my hon. Friend has adverted. I assume that, if this sort of help is being made available to some Members of Parliament in the city, it will be made available to all, including my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick), who is sitting not far from me.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): May we have a statement next week on Government intentions about pornography and obscenity, particularly in the light of developments in telecommunications and the possibility of our having videophones with a line into the home and sex lines that have been perturbing parents? It would be better to shut the stable door before the horse bolts.

Mr. Newton: I think that I would be right in saying that important aspects of that matter would be the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for National Heritage, who will be answering questions on Monday next week.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): On Monday's business, does my right hon. Friend agree that a national lottery will bring great benefits to the arts, sport——

Madam Speaker: Order, Order. Is the hon. Gentleman asking for a change in Monday's business because we are not debating the benefits, the merits or the demerits of anything but are dealing with the business for next week?

Sir Anthony Grant: Madam Speaker, I entirely accept that. My purpose is to obtain a little bit of clarity because, while recognising that there are strong views held the other way would my right hon. Friend not agree with me that what is entirely feeble and wet is to be undecided. Does he know whether the Opposition are still giving——

Madam Speaker: Order. That is a disallowed question. We must make some progress on these matters.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): Has the Leader of the House seen early-day motion no. 1010 standing in my name and those of more than 60 of my hon. Friends referring to the report on the transfer of petroleum engineering division from London to Aberdeen?

[That this House notes that the Government's commitment to open government is proving to be paper thin as evidenced by Ministers' refusals to reply to legitimate letters from honourable Members as witnessed by the letter of 9th October from the honourable Member for Aberdeen North to the Minister of Energy asking for the publication of the Ernst and Young Report into the transfer of the PED from London to Aberdeen, which elicited the reply that a decision on the transfer would be made soon, but did not even mention the request for publication of this Report and the honourable Member for Aberdeen North's letter to the Prime Minister on 16th November drawing his attention to this error by the Minister for Energy and calling for the publication of the Report, which attracted the reply that the letter had been referred back to the original source of the dissatisfaction, namely the Department of Trade and Industry, for reply, which in turn elicited the reply from the President of the Board of Trade dated 30th November that a decision would be made soon on the transfer, but again ignoring the question as to publication; therefore believes that this sorry saga of continued failure to answer a straight forward question makes the Prime Minister's and the Government's commitment to open government farcical; and calls upon her Majesty's Government to publish the Ernst and Young Report immediately and in full.]

That independent report has been in the hands of the Minister for Energy since 5 October, more than three and a half months ago, and he will not say whether he will publish it or not. He keeps promising that a decision will be made soon. In view of the importance of this matter to the economy of Aberdeen—which needs more employment prospects, lest people think otherwise—will he ask the President of the Board of Trade or the Minister for Energy to make a statement next week so that we can resolve this matter and, in the interests of open government, get this report published as soon as possible?

Mr. Newton: I do not know whether the hon. Member was frustrated in asking that question yesterday, which is when he would have had an opportunity to address it to my right hon. Friend or my hon. Friend the Minister of State. I am not in a position to add to what has been said previously, but, as he knows and has been told, decisions will be announced as soon as possible.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Does my right hon. Friend accept that, whatever line one takes, there is unanimity in the House that the situation in Bosnia should be debated? I asked my right hon. Friend to try to arrange a debate before Christmas. He was exceptionally courteous and on one occasion said that he hoped to be able to arrange a debate before too long. How long is too long?

Mr. Newton: I am not able to give my hon. Friend the undertaking that he requests, and certainly not today. He will know that time has been provided this afternoon for a substantial debate on the deployment of British forces in relation to the middle east and on the Royal Air Force generally. It is not beyond the bounds of possibility that my hon. Friend will be able to work in a reference in that debate; but, of course, that would be subject to your view, Madam Speaker.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): Would the Leader of the House like to save the Select Committee some time and help to alleviate unemployment by getting the Secretary of State for Transport to announce next week that common sense is prevailing and he is abandoning rail privatisation?

Mr. Newton: That sounds like a triumph of hope over experience. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport is presenting his Bill today and expects to publish it tomorrow. I expect it to be debated not long after the period covered by today's business statement.

Mr. Graham Riddick (Colne Valley): During which debate next week will I be able to say that Sheffield city council is sacking thousands of its employees and at the same time paying £55,000 to some hon. Members for office costs? Is that not another example of Labour waste and profligacy in local government?

Mr. Newton: I would be pushed to suggest to my hon. Friend a debate next week in which that would readily be in order. However, I draw his attention to the fact that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment will be answering questions on Wednesday. My hon. Friend may find that a useful steer.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): Will a Minister from the Department of Employment be present for Monday's debate to answer the many questions that hon. Members will wish to put about the employment implications for Liverpool, Glasgow and Cardiff of the proposed national lottery legislation?

Mr. Newton: I cannot give the hon. Gentleman an instant promise, but I shall make sure that his point is drawn to the attention of my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Department of Employment.

Mr. Rod Richards (Clwyd, North-West): During the substantial amount of time that has been allocated to the European Communities (Amendment) Bill, will there be time to discuss the fact that the MEP for Sheffield is not paying rent or rates for his office in that city?

Mr. Newton: I cannot find time for a debate on that matter, but I have already suggested the possibility of its being raised during Department of the Environment questions on Wednesday.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Will the Leader of the House arrange for a Home Office statement to be made next week on the law on wheel clamping? Early-day motion 1110 makes it clear that the law in Scotland is applied quite clearly and properly.

[That this House expresses concern at the growing practice of private and public organisations employing firms, often with a dubious background and whose employees have no adequate identification, which place wheel clamps on parked cars and then extort large sums of money for releasing the vehicle; acknowledges that this can be a frightening experience especially on dark nights for single women; and urges the Government to make clear that wheel clamping is illegal, extortion a criminal offence, and threats to remove vehicles a serious breach of the peace on which the police should take appropriate action.]

However, in this country spivs are going around clamping cars on land that is often used for car parking and the land owners are co-operating with them to extort sums of £50. There are threats to tow cars away, with the cost of returning a car being another £200. That is often happening to single women, and in a recent case a woman with a blind——

Madam Speaker: Order. All that the hon. Gentleman needs to do is to ask for a debate; he does not need to go into details. We are all fully aware of the situation, I think.

Mr. Cryer: I am grateful to you, Madam Speaker, for endorsing what I am saying—that a debate is necessary and urgent, because the Home Office is delaying action.

Mr. Newton: I am sure that you, Madam Speaker, would wish me on your behalf to say that your words did not warrant quite the interpretation placed on them by the hon. Gentleman—at least, I hope that they did not.

On the basic issue, my right hon. Friend will shortly issue a consultation paper setting out the legal position as we understand it and seeking views on possible options for dealing with bad practice, which undoubtedly exists, in this area. Perhaps a statement could be considered at that time, although obviously I cannot give a commitment now.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher): My right hon. Friend mentioned that on Tuesday there will be an Opposition debate entitled, I believe, "Reporting progress on the success of the NHS reforms". Will he have a word with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health to ensure that, in addition to other points in her speech, she will refer to the excellent work and contribution of the hospice movement? In particular, will my right hon. Friend note that in my constituency tomorrow the Princess Alice hospice will have its inaugural conference, "Palliative care through education", and is successfully opening its new education wing?

Mr. Newton: I am not sure that the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) would wish me to validate my hon. Friend's rewrite of her description of the Opposition's debate, although of course it is one more acceptable to me.

As to the purport of my hon. Friend's question, the hospice movement is an important and often underestimated area in which we have greatly advanced public policy in recent years. Something that gave me great satisfaction when I had related responsibilities was the amount of additional support and help that we were able to give the hospice movement, with great success.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): Has the attention of the Leader of the House been drawn to a report in the first edition of The Daily Telegraph today that the President of Germany has been unable to ratify the Maastrict treaty because Herr Brunner, the former chief of staff of Herr Bangemann, has brought an action in the constitutional court claiming that the treaty is in breach of the German constitution? That report disappeared from later editions of The Daily Telegraph—[HON. MEMBERS: "What has this to do with next week's business?"] Well, the President of Germany cannot sign the Maastricht treaty until that matter is resolved. Can the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs be invited to make a statement before we resume the debate on the Maastricht treaty Bill next Wednesday and Thursday?

Mr. Newton: I gather that there have been some reports of that kind over a long time. I cannot undertake that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will make a statement. I do not need to rehearse my earlier remarks about next week's business for the House to know that there will be full opportunities for airing European issues.

Mr. James Paice (Cambridgeshire, South-East): Notwithstanding tomorrow's business, may I impress on my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House the need for the Government to publish soon their own Sunday trading Bill? Whatever the widespread range of views on how to resolve that issue, there is a clear consensus that something must be done. Although we recognise that the Maastricht Bill is taking up a vast amount of the time of the House, we all look forward to the opportunity of having a free vote, as outlined by my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary.

Mr. Newton: We all recognise the importance and difficulty of that issue, apart from the fact that the consensus that something must be done is not matched by a consensus on what needs to be done—and that presents some difficulties. My right hon. and learned Friend outlined his intentions in a very full statement a month or so before Christmas. Work is now proceeding on turning the three kinds of proposals to which my hon. Friend referred, with their varying effects, into legislative form. However, that is a time-consuming business. It involves a lot of consultation and discussion, and I cannot promise that I expect that Bill to be published in the near future.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): In view of the unanimous and critical report of the Select Committee on Employment on the proposed pit closures that was published today, cannot the House immediately debate that subject? The Government would then have the opportunity to say that they made grievous mistakes, will follow the Committee's recommendations, will abandon the closure programme, at least in its present form, and will put an end to the agony of some 100,000 families who have been waiting for a decision for a very long time.

Mr. Newton: I understand the hon. and learned Gentleman's reasons for making that point, but the sensible course will be to discuss the report to which he has referred and others at a time when my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade has himself been able to study them and to produce his suggested conclusions.

Mr. Eric Pickles (Brentwood and Ongar): Will my right hon. Friend arrange for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment to make a statement in the House next week on priorities in local government spending? Will he urge my right hon. and learned Friend to make it clear that the Government's priority is social care and not the provision of plush offices for Labour Members?

Mr. Newton: I believe that my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment will be the next to have an extremely lively time in the House when he answers questions next Wednesday.

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus, East): Is the Leader of the House truly aware of the anger felt in agriculture over the abolition of the Potato Marketing Board and the effect of hill livestock compensatory allowance reductions on hill and upland farmers? Given the continuing confusion over the detail of common agricultural policy reform and of the GATT negotiations, will the right hon. Gentleman urgently institute a full debate on agriculture?

Mr. Newton: I note the hon. Gentleman's request, but I am obviously not in a position to make an immediate and positive response. I cannot add to what I said earlier about HLCAs. As for the Potato Marketing Board, as I am sure that the hon. Gentleman knows, the Government's objectives remain to ensure competition on equal terms for potato production and to ensure that the United Kingdom industry can both meet the needs of the domestic market and contribute to the export drive in agricultural produce.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Will my right hon. Friend arrange for a debate or statement early next week about the sickening and apparently growing practice of mutilating horses? It is causing widespread concern and distress. A statement is needed so that the House and the country can get to grips with a very sick and wicked practice.

Mr. Newton: I note my hon. Friend's concern for animal welfare—which, indeed, is well known and long running, and is shared by most if not all hon. Members. I cannot promise either a statement or a debate, but my hon. Friend may wish to try to raise the matter in an Adjournment debate.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Members' interests.

Mr. Newton: Let me add a little to what I told the hon. Gentleman last week, in case I inadvertently misled him. I have had some discussions with the Chairman of the Select Committee on Members' Interests, my hon. Friend the Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith), and have asked him to consider one or two points that would help us to decide precisely how to proceed. I have no doubt that he will get back to me before long.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley): In view of the momentous political changes now being initiated by President Clinton in the United States, should we not, as a matter of urgency, debate the significance of those changes in relation to United Kingdom politics? In particular, should we not give the Leader of the Opposition a chance to come to the House, following his attendance at a lavish bash at the Dorchester——

Madam Speaker: Order. As I said earlier, hon. Members must restrict their questions to next week's business, and their questions must relate to the business statement. The hon. Gentleman's question is wide of the mark.

Mr. Oppenheim: Can we give an opportunity to hon. Members who support the policies to which I have referred to specify the policies that they consider relevant to the United Kingdom? Do they, for example, support President Clinton's——

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is out of order. He has had a second bite at the cherry. I now ask him to resume his seat.

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle): Will the Leader of the House arrange a debate about the Royal Mail? For the past 300 years, my constituents in Carlisle and the rest of Cumbria have lived peacefully alongside their Scottish neighbours; their only differences have been cultural, and related to the existence of a border. On Monday, the Royal Mail is to introduce a new postmark for Cumbria, Galloway and Dumfries. Surely that is nonsense, and the House should have an opportunity to debate it.

Mr. Newton: I hear it suggested that that matter might be raised in an Adjournment debate. The hon. Gentleman may wish to seek such an opportunity. Beyond that, I think that this is a matter for the board of the Royal Mail rather than for my right hon. and learned Friend; but I shall ensure that he is aware of the hon. Gentleman's complaint, as we must assume it to be.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): Will my right hon. Friend consider again the request by the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) for a debate about revenue support grant? Would not such a debate enable us to discover why local taxpayers in Sheffield now find that their school crossing patrols have been slashed so that £55,000 of their money can be dished out to Labour Members of Parliament?

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend has added an interesting point to what I said earlier about revenue support grant. It is clear from what I said—that the details of RSG will be presented to the House before much longer—that hon. Members will have at least two opportunities to raise the matter, as well as the opportunity presented by next week's questions to the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is the Leader of the House prepared to reconsider his decision about a debate on coal, given that we have recently been informed that, at some collieries, the pumps used to pump water from workings closed in years gone by cost £250,000 each to operate, which means that, if British Coal and the Government have their way, pits that are economically on the borderline will be closed on the ground that they are baling out water five, 10 or 15 miles away. If we cannot have a debate, will the right hon. Gentleman at least have that put on the agenda for the seminar?

Mr. Newton: I shall not attempt to add what I said earlier about the possibility of a debate. I imagine that the hon. Gentleman had the opportunity to raise the matter with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State yesterday; in any event, I shall certainly ensure that my right hon. Friend knows that it is on the hon. Gentleman's agenda.

Mr. Anthony Coombs (Wyre Forest): I congratulate President Clinton on his inauguration. Is my right hon. Friend aware, however, that there is great concern among hon. Members about recent remarks made by the new special trade representative of the United States, Mickey Kantor, regarding the EC-American farm subsidies agreement, upon which GATT depends? Given the importance of GATT for the world economy, may we have a statement next week so that we can emphasise the importance of achieving a GATT agreement on the fast-track approach by 2 March?

Mr. Newton: I cannot undertake to arrange for a debate, but I certainly re-emphasise the importance that the British Government attach—as has been very clear in the activities of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and others—to the achievement of a GATT settlement. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for underlining that point.

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): The Leader of the House will be aware of the hardship and health hazards that result from the disconnection of a household's water supply. In view of the urgency of the matter, will the right hon. Gentleman ask the Secretary of State for the Environment to arrange to make a statement at an early date—possibly next week—so that we can address ourselves to it?

Mr. Newton: The list of questions for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment is already long. I reiterate that my right hon. and learned Friend will be here to answer questions of that kind and others on Wednesday.

Mr. Gary Streeter (Plymouth, Sutton): May I encourage my right hon. Friend to change the business for next Wednesday so that, instead of discussing the Maastricht treaty again, we can have an emergency debate on unemployment in the far south-west? My right hon. Friend will probably have seen the early-day motion that I tabled recently pointing out that Plymouth has unemployment of 14·5 per cent., which continues to rise alarmingly. An emergency debate would allow west country Members to draw attention to the importance to Devonport dockyard of winning the all-important contract to refit the Trident boat.

Mr. Newton: I cannot undertake to arrange a debate along precisely those lines, although I appreciate the reasons why my hon. Friend has felt it right to ask for a debate. I draw my hon. Friend's attention to the important comments made about the Government's general approach to both those questions at Prime Minister's Question Time not long ago.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): Is it not unsatisfactory that there is to be neither a debate nor a statement on the alarming increase in unemployment? Is he aware that Wales is afflicted by the loss of manufacturing jobs in coal, steel and aerospace? Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that there should be a debate or a statement, bearing in mind the fact that Wales is top of the league for low wages?

Mr. Newton: In the light of the argument advanced by the hon. Gentleman and other Opposition Members, those on the Opposition Front Bench may wish to reconsider the subject that they have chosen for their time on Tuesday. Clearly that is a matter for them.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Will the Leader of the House arrange for a special debate on the problems facing this capital city of London so that emphasis can be placed on the problems of homelessness, buses and trains, the health service and education spending and on the serious social crisis resulting from high unemployment and the lack of a unified local authority for London that can tackle these serious problems?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman is overplaying his hand somewhat. I remind him that, if he wishes to refer to the health service in London, he can use the opportunity that will be provided to him on Tuesday by his right hon. and hon. Friends.

Mr. Stephen Milligan (Eastleigh): Now that more than two months have passed since the Chancellor's autumn statement, may I ask the Leader of the House whether there will be an opportunity next week to discuss the impact of the measures that the Chancellor announced to help the homeless? Is my right hon. Friend aware that in my constituency of Eastleigh, which had a severe homelessness problem, those measures have enabled more than 200 families—accounting for nearly everyone living in temporary accommodation—to find new homes?

Mr. Newton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving us that encouraging information. I suspect that it is only one item on a growing list of good pieces of information flowing from the important proposals that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor made in his autumn statement.

Mr. Roy Hughes (Newport, East): The Chairman of the Welsh Grant Committee and a number of hon. Members have expressed to me their concern about the fact that that body has not met recently. It would appear that the usual channels have become gummed up. Will the Leader of the House take whatever steps are necessary to unravel things?

Mr. Newton: That point was raised with me last week. I will ensure that it is drawn to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales. In addition, a number of people have expressed the wish that the Welsh Grand Committee should meet in Wales. That would require a change to Standing Orders, which raises rather different issues.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): Petrol companies are ripping off service stations which are contracted to them. That is especially the case with Esso. May we have a debate on that serious matter so that we can discuss the situation at the Heath service station in my constituency where the problem will arise tomorrow and where it is likely to continue? We should have an early debate on that topic.

Mr. Newton: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will not expect me to attempt an off-the-cuff comment on his general point or on the specific case to which he referred. However, I will draw the matter to the attention of my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): Will the Leader of the House have a word with the Prime Minister in order to widen the subject of the debate on Monday so that the Prime Minister can explain how high unemployment must rise before it becomes a price that is not worth paying and perhaps offer the country practical solutions to the unemployment problem which would be more effective than his two present solutions, which are to hold a seminar and a raffle?

Mr. Newton: I understand why the hon. Gentleman felt it appropriate to ask that question. However, I am bound to say that I find it impossible to see how I can widen a debate on the National Lottery etc. Bill to embrace that point.

Points of Order

4.7 pm

Mr. Richard Caborn (Sheffield, Central): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I wish to raise a point of order with regard to the conduct of hon. Members. I note that in today's Hansard at column 378, a question was raised by the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick) about my activities.

I hope that my point of order will be helpful to me and to the rest of the House. I received a note from the hon. Member for Colne Valley at 1.10 pm yesterday after the Select Committee on Trade and Industry had finished its morning deliberations. As you will know, Madam Speaker, a resolution of this House requested the Select Committee to deal with the pit strikes.

Madam Speaker: Order. May I offer the hon. Gentleman a little guidance? If he raises a direct point of order with me, I must deal with it. If he reads column 378 of yesterday's Hansard, he will see that I dealt very adequately with the points of order that were raised at that time.

Mr. Caborn: I am sure that you dealt with that point of order very adequately indeed, Madam Speaker, but I would like to refer to a further point surrounding that particular issue. I wrote to the hon. Member for Colne Valley, as I think I informed your Office, Madam Speaker, that I would be chairing the Trade and Industry Select Committee at 2.30 pm. That letter was placed on the Letter Board at the same time that I deposited the letter in your Office at 1.45 pm. I would have expected the hon. Member for Colne Valley not to have raised the matter. Indeed, I would have expected him to comply with the request in my letter that he should raise it when I was able to be in the House.

I suggest that it was more important for me to Chair the Select Committee than to be in the House at 3.30 pm, which would have been impossible. May I therefore ask you, Madam Speaker, for guidance about the conduct of hon. Members when they raise points of order of that nature about other hon. Members?

Madam Speaker: It is my understanding that the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick) in fact did his utmost to inform all the hon. Members to whom he wished to refer. As far as I am concerned, I dealt with the matter yesterday. There is just one small matter outstanding. May I take it that the hon. Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn) has informed the hon. Member for Colne Valley that he was about to raise the matter today?

Mr. Caborn: It was not about the hon. Member for Colne Valley. Madam Speaker, I am asking for your guidance about any hon. Member who intends to raise the integrity of another hon. Member, when the House has instructed such hon. Members to be in Committee. Is it right that hon. Members should proceed when other hon. Members are not available to be in the House to answer such an allegation?

Madam Speaker: Several hon. Members were involved and, as the hon. Member for Colne Valley did inform them, in my view he was perfectly entitled to go ahead with attempting to raise a point of order, which was not, as the hon. Member for Sheffield, Central will see, a point of order that was acceptable either to me or to the House.

Mr. Caborn: On a further point of order, Madam Speaker. Are you saying that in future we adjourn any Committee of the House to make sure that we can be present on the Floor of the House to answer personal allegations? Is that the guidance that you are giving to hon. Members?

Madam Speaker: These are occasions when hon. Members must determine their own priorities. It is not for the Chair to do so. Once one hon. Member has informed another hon. Member that he is going to raise an issue, it is for that hon. Member to determine what his priorities are.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): On a different point of order, Madam Speaker. I pay tribute to the way in which you have chaired the House, particularly during Northern Ireland questions, but my point of order arises out of today's and previous Northern Ireland questions. In the first 10 questions today, three Northern Ireland Members had questions and were ready to be called. I happen to believe that this is the House for the whole of the kingdom; on the other hand, we in Northern Ireland have this rare opportunity to bring specific issues to the House.

Today, when the first question had been answered, the hon. Member asking it left the Chamber, and another hon. Member withdrew his question. Bearing in mind that there are only 16 hon. Members who can come once a month for Northern Ireland questions, and also that, on the law of averages, we find it quite difficult to come up when we table other questions, is there any way that a greater proportion of Northern Ireland Members may have an opportunity of asking their supplementary questions rather than allowing certain hon. Members, as happened today, to farm out questions, thereby ensuring that we are down the list?

Madam Speaker: As the hon. Gentleman knows, it is the luck of the draw where questions fall on the order paper. I understand his frustration and that of all hon. Members from Northern Ireland who would like to come out very high on the paper as a result of the ballot; but I see from my notes that I called the hon. Gentleman on question No. 1.

I think that the hon. Gentleman is making another point, which I understand and which I have mentioned before. There are occasions when hon. Members put their question, listen to the answer and then leave the Chamber. They are perfectly entitled to do so ; I simply happen to believe that it is a matter of courtesy to the House to stay for five or 10 minutes at least, until the House has moved on to other questions, but that is a purely personal opinion, because I would like to bring a little more courtesy into our dealings in the House.

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I do not want to detain the House, but further to the point of order raised earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn), and agreeing entirely with the point that you have just made about courtesy in the House, will you confirm that it would make your task easier, bearing in mind the difficulties that arise, if hon. Members on both sides could have heed to exchanges such as those which are made more difficult when hon. Members are chairing Select Committees or other major Committees? After all, there are plenty of opportunities to raise matters in the House when the hon. Members referred to are present.

Madam Speaker: I am sure that it would be helpful all round if, as the hon. Lady said, when matters like that are raised by hon. Members, they take into account the other responsibilities of hon. Members.

BILL PRESENTED

RAILWAYS

Mr. Secretary MacGregor, supported by the Prime Minister, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Heseltine, Mr. Secretary Howard, Mr. Secretary Hunt, Mr. Secretary Lang, Mrs. Secretary Shephard and Mr. Roger Freeman, presented a Bill to provide for the appointment and functions of a Rail Regulator and a Director of Passenger Rail Franchising and of users' consultative committees for the railway industry and for certain ferry services; to make new provision with respect to the provision of railway services and the persons by whom they are to be provided or who are to secure their provision; to make provision for and in connection with the grant and acquisition of rights over, and the disposal or other transfer and vesting of, any property, rights or liabilities by means of which railway services are, or are to be, provided; to amend the functions of the British Railways Board; to make provision with respect to the safety of railways and the protection of railway employees and members of the public from personal injury and other risks arising from the construction or operation of railways; to make further provision with respect to transport police; to make provision with respect to certain railway pension schemes; to make provision for and in connection with the payment of grants and subsidies in connection with railways and in connection with the provision of facilities for freight haulage by inland waterway; to make provision in relation to tramways and other guided transport systems; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow, and to be printed. [Bill 117.]

The Gulf and RAF

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Arbuthnot.]

[Relevant documents: The Second Report from the Defence Committee on Procurement of Advanced Air-to-Air Missiles, HC 115 of Session 1991-92, the Second Special Report containing the Government's Reply thereto, HC 350 of Session 1991-92, the Sixth Report on the European Fighter Aircraft, HC 299 of Session 1991-92, and the Fourth Special Report containing the Government's Reply thereto, HC 262 of Session 1992-93.]

Madam Speaker: May I say at the start of the debate that I have had to impose a time limit of 10 minutes on speeches between 7 pm and 9 pm.

4.15 pm

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): The House last debated the Royal Air Force in May 1991, soon after the Gulf conflict. Operations mounted by coalition air forces over the past week have shown once again the exceptional standards of quality and professionalism which the service maintains and explain why we are combining this year's RAF debate with a debate on recent events in the Gulf.

My main themes this afternoon will be challenge and change. The RAF faces the challenge of mounting operations in Europe and the middle east when it is in the midst of an unprecedented period of restructuring as a result of changes in the strategic environment. I intend to deal with the changes being experienced by the RAF before turning to the wider issues of the Gulf.

Since our last debate, we have made considerable progress with the implementation of the plans announced for Britain's defences for the 1990s. In Germany, RAF Wildenrath closed at the end of last year and RAF Gutersloh will be handed over to the Army at the end of 1993. Three Tornado GR squadrons have been disbanded and one Tornado reconnaissance squadron has moved to the United Kingdom. The remaining four RAF Germany Tornado squadrons will be based at RAF Bruggen. The two Germany-based Harrier squadrons have moved from Gutersloh to Laarbruch, with the composite squadron of Chinook and Puma support helicopters due to follow in March.

In the United Kingdom itself, RAF Marham and Lossiemouth will be the main operating bases for our Tornado reconnaissance and anti-shipping forces.

The main thrust of United Kingdom air defence will continue to be provided by Tornado F3 squadrons based at RAF Leuchars, Coningsby and Leeming—as well as by ground-based systems. The Phantom and Shackleton fleets have been withdrawn, the latter being replaced by a Sentry E-3D AWACS squadron at RAF Waddington. The Nimrod maritime reconnaissance force, comprising three squadrons, is now collocated at RAF Kinloss.

We announced our plans for the future development of the search and rescue force in October, in the light of the reduction in military flying. The RAF in the future will have an all-Sea King SAR fleet.

There will also be major changes for the RAF Regiment, reflecting the adjustments to aircraft basing.

These major changes in our front line capability will be matched by a streamlining of the support area. Since the middle of 1991, we have announced the closure of 13 RAF stations in the United Kingdom, most of which house support units. In addition, last November, we proposed that the RAF ground training organisation should be rationalised from six stations to three, with major savings in running costs. We also need to streamline our headquarters structures. Next year, two new RAF headquarters will form: logistics command at Brampton/Wyton, and personnel and training command at Innsworth, near Gloucester. This will lead to reductions in RAF HQ manpower of at least 20 per cent.

We have also embarked on an ambitious programme to market-test RAF support activities with a total annual running cost of over £200 million. This is a very significant commitment to the Government's plans to extend competition for the supply of public services.

These changes will have a profound impact on our service personnel, their families and the civilian staff who support them. It will be of paramount importance to ensure that the morale and commitment of our people are maintained as the restructuring is carried through. The RAF has risen to this challenge, as we would expect, with its customary eelan and esprit de corps.

We are making every effort to ensure that manpower reductions are achieved as far as possible by natural wastage and voluntary redundancy. Some compulsory redundancies are inevitable, but all the 960 or so RAF redundancies necessary up to 1 April 1994 will be filled by volunteers. A second phase will be necessary during 1994 and 1995, details of which will be announced in due course.

The restructuring process is happening when fewer people are leaving the RAF. Our manpower intakes are at historically low levels. But it is vital for the future that we ensure that the RAF continues to be seen as a top-grade employer. As the economy improves and our manpower requirements stabilise, we shall need to improve and increase our recruiting. Hon. Members will be aware of steps being taken by the services in the equal opportunities field. In the RAF, women are now employed in almost all branches and trades, without significant restrictions. Since the last RAF debate, all aircrew roles have been opened to women, including those on fast jets. Two female pilots and nine female navigators have entered squadron service. A further 29 female pilots and 13 female navigators are undergoing training.

Our policy is that the new force structure should be well equipped, highly trained and properly manned and supported. The keystone of the RAF's future capability is the European fighter project. The project enjoys support from all the main political parties, industry and the trade unions. I am grateful to hon. Members on all sides of the House who have given their support in a very effective and successful fashion in recent months during the period of uncertainty with regard to the future of the European fighter aircraft.

This broad basis of consensus has been of immense help in the recent difficult negotiations. Throughout the uncertainties of the past year, the Government have held to the view that there is a clear and continuing need for an aircraft broadly of EFA's capabilities, both for the defence of the United Kingdom homeland and for operations in other theatres. The programme is the only advanced fixed-wing military aircraft under development in the United Kingdom. It is important and, indeed, vital in terms of United Kingdom employment and technology, but its essential rationale is to meet a military requirement.

The aircraft will be in service throughout the first quarter of the next century. As present events in the Gulf and elsewhere remind us, there is considerable and growing instability in areas adjacent to NATO, both inside and outside Europe. There are uncertainties about how the world will develop. We face the reality of risk and conflict. The aircraft that we procure must be able to defeat the aircraft of any potential adversary that our pilots might be called upon to face during its operational service.

Our current air defence aircraft—the Tornado F3—was designed to intercept bombers at long range. Even if it were updated with more modern missiles and sensors, the F3 would not be a satisfactory counter to agile fighters such as the MiG 29 and the SU27—let alone any future upgrades of those types, or more modern aircraft. We also need an offensive support and tactical reconnaissance capability.

As many hon. Members will know, in the 1950s, the RAF had 12 different types of combat aircraft. We now have five. When the Eurofighter 2000 comes into service that will reduce to three: the Eurofighter 2000, an upgraded Tornado GR1 and the Harrier GR7. The multi-role capability of the Eurofighter will provide operational flexibility and should yield savings in support costs. I am glad that the Select Committee on Defence —which I commend for its excellent report in March last year—shared our view that there remained a requirement for a technically advanced multi-role fighter.

Despite the importance of the Eurofighter, it must be affordable. The production costs which were quoted by industry in April 1992 were higher than expected. As a result, industrial studies for a range of design options were commissioned by the four Defence Ministers from Spain, Italy, Germany and the United Kingdom at our Madrid meeting. The studies concluded that a family of aircraft, based on the existing airframe and engine, was the most cost-effective solution to the budgetary and military requirements of all the four partner nations.

At our meeting on 10 December 1992, the four Defence Ministers agreed with the four chiefs of staff that some relaxations in the operational requirement were possible in the light of the changed international security environment. While some differences remained in national requirements, we reached agreement that these could be accommodated in a single collaborative programme, based on the existing airframe and engine. We also agreed that significant cost reductions were achievable with no change to capability, that further savings were possible with some reduction in performance and that the resulting aircraft should be renamed Eurofighter 2000. Deliveries to the United Kingdom and Italy will commence in the year 2000, and to Germany, and probably Spain, in 2002.

Considerable work remains to be done. We need to agree a revised programme and the differing standards of national variants. Detailed technical and financial negotiations with industry will be required, but our agreement means that the Royal Air Force can look forward with confidence to getting the aircraft that it needs to meet its operational commitments well into the next century.

Flexibility and mobility are the hallmarks of the new NATO strategic concept. Air power is well able to meet these challenges and the Royal Air Force will be making a significant contribution to the air element of NATO's new reaction forces.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): The House is delighted to hear what the Minister is saying. Could he give an assurance that the Government will never flinch from increasing manpower if necessary?

Mr. Rifkind: Of course that is the case. We remain committed to ensuring that the forces have the manpower. Such manpower must be capable of dealing with any of the obligations that may be imposed on it without unreasonable stress and strain. That is an important obligation, and we must keep it carefully under review.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): I am sure that the House welcomes the commitment to ensuring that Britain possesses an adequate air defence capacity. Clearly, the Air Force must have high-quality combat aircraft. If the Air Force is to fulfil its continuing international obligations, it is essential that it has adequate transport and communications aircraft. Does the Minister accept that, although the Hercules may be superbly well maintained, it is an aging aircraft and it is in heavy use serving throughout the world? It cannot be many years before the Secretary of State or his successor will have to order a new aircraft to replace it.

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman is right to pay tribute to the Hercules. It has, indeed, served Britain and continues to serve Britain in a superb fashion. But it is also right that we should give thought to the long-term replacement for Hercules. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that thought is being given to precisely that question.

The forces that I have described will enable NATO to respond rapidly and effectively to any crisis within Allied Command Europe. A total of up to 80 RAF aircraft will be available to the air reaction force. They will provide a broad range of capabilities for both the immediate and rapid reaction components of the force. Contributions will be drawn from the Tornado, Harrier and Jaguar forces. Rapier surface-to-air missiles will also be assigned.

The relevance, and immediacy, of this shift of emphasis to more mobile forces is amply demonstrated by the range of operations in which the RAF is currently involved. I should mention here the RAF's continuing contribution to the anti-terrorism campaign in Northern Ireland. As the House knows, the RAF Regiment provides vital ground defence for RAF Aldergrove. Wessex, Puma and Chinook helicopters provide support for the security forces and the Northern Ireland Office.

The RAF is making a key contribution to our support for the United Nations Security Council resolutions on the former Yugoslavia. Hercules aircraft contribute to the UN airlift of relief supplies into Sarajevo. These operations have had to be suspended whenever there is a risk that the aircraft will come under attack from the warring factions which surround Sarajevo. The most serious such incident, as the House will know, was the tragic loss of an Italian transport aircraft due to a missile attack on 3 September. But despite the dangers, the operation has continued whenever possible. So far, 310 flights by RAF Hercules aircraft have been successfully completed, bringing 4,152 tons of much needed aid to the people of Sarajevo. This is an important humanitarian role, which has been conducted with bravery and skill. Other Hercules undertake resupply sorties in support of the United Kingdom contribution to the UN protection force in Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina.

[Mr. Rifkind]

Following NATO's agreement to the United Nation's request to assist in first monitoring and then enforcement of sanctions and the arms embargo, RAF Nimrod aircraft have been involved in a 24-hour surveillance operation to identify embargo-breaking vessels to the naval task force. The aircraft are currently deployed to Sicily as part of these operations. E3-D aircraft have joined a multinational force monitoring the air space of the former Yugoslavia in support of the United Nations resolution banning military flights over the area.

We have also deployed two Hercules aircraft, together with about 90 RAF personnel, to assist in Operation Restore Hope in Somalia. The aircraft are currently based with United States forces in Mobasa in Kenya. Since 12 December they have been engaged in the transport of humanitarian relief stores to affected areas inside Somalia. They have so far delivered over 3 million pounds of stores.

I turn now to recent events in the Gulf. Given the RAF's contribution in that region throughout the momentous events of the past few years, it is particularly appropriate that we should do so in conjunction with the annual debate on the RAF. Since the Gulf conflict ended in February 1991, RAF aircraft have been deployed again to the Gulf on two seperate operations. In both cases the aim was the same: to help protect the civilian population of Iraq from the brutality of the regime in Baghdad—first, the Kurdish people in the north of Iraq from April 1991 and then the peoples of the marsh area in the south from August last year. The United Kingdom joined our United States and French allies in a coalition which established no-fly zones over the north and south of the country in support of United Nations Security Council resolution 688, which called on Iraq to cease repression of its civilian population. I should like to make it clear that the coalition is committed to the territorial integrity of Iraq, which is not threatened in any way by the existence of the no-fly zones.

Eight Jaguar aircraft and two VC10 tankers, based at Incirlik in Turkey, mount reconnaissance patrols over the northern no-fly zone. A similar function is performed by six Tornado GR1 and two Victor tankers in the south. Hon. Members will be aware that the Turkish Government recently agreed to extend the basing arrangements at Incirlik for a further six months. We are seeking the agreement of the Turkish authorities to base Harrier GR7 aircraft there from April in place of the Jaguars.

We should not let current preoccupations obscure the valuable contribution which the RAF has made to the no-fly zones in quieter times, when the attention of the world was elsewhere. The civilian populations of northern and southern Iraq have gained great comfort from the presence of coalition aircraft overhead. They appreciate more than anyone what Saddam Hussein might have thrown at them but for the existence of the no-fly zones. We expect RAF patrols to continue over the no-fly zones for the foreseeable future.

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann): I agree with the Secretary of State entirely about the work that the RAF has done in policing the no-fly zone. He will recall that recently there was speculation that it might be necessary for the United Kingdom to deploy ground forces in Kuwait. That danger may have receded over the past few days, but it may recur. In the event of that happening, and while we are so heavily involved in Bosnia, can the Secretary of State be sure that it will not be necessary to withdraw from Northern Ireland either of the additional battalions that have been deployed there recently?

Mr. Rifkind: I am aware of the reports to which the hon. Gentleman refers, but we have not yet received any requests from the Government of Kuwait for the deployment of any forces to Kuwait. Obviously, only if such a request were received would it be necessary to consider it. In any event, I can assure the hon. Gentleman that we would not allow a request from any other part of the world to determine our obligations to the need for security forces to operate within the United Kingdom. Our commitments within the United Kingdom must always take precedence over any other international obligation, however important.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): Does the Secretary of State intend to comment on the substantial change in the attitude adopted worldwide towards the decision to resume bombing last week? Is he aware that the Russian Government have expressed anxiety, that the Arab League has come out against it, that representatives of the Iraqi opposition, the Shi'ites and the Kurds, have come out against it, that the French Government have expressed anxiety and that carefully filtered statements have been released from No. 10 about six prime ministerial telephone calls to President Bush. What I and my right hon. Friends said on the night of the statement has turned out to be absolutely correct. The bombing has strengthened Saddam Hussein and has undermined the authority of the United Nations Security Council and the policy that the right hon. and learned Gentleman announced so proudly only eight days ago is in shreds.

For that reason, many hon. Members will vote against the Adjournment tonight because we have been denied the opportunity to express our views against a properly framed Government motion.

Mr. Rifkind: The right hon. Gentleman is profoundly mistaken. No one is enthusiastic about military action, but the right hon. Gentleman should reflect on the fact that in the immediate aftermath of the three operations conducted by the coalition countries Saddam Hussein has now allowed United Nations inspection teams back into Baghdad—the first team was allowed in this morning—the attempts by the Iraqis to interfere with the frontier with Kuwait have been suspended and the allied countries are now able to operate in the no-fly zones without attack. The right hon. Gentleman might not like the fact that that has been the direct consequence of the recent action.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Can the Secretary of State tell the House who was responsible for the attack on the Al-Rashid hotel? Was it planned or was it an accident? In either event, will it now be the subject of an inquiry? As he will know, a large number of delegates were attending an Islamic conference in the hotel and they included my constituent, Liaqat Hussain, the president of the Bradford Council for Mosques, who had gone to Iraq to press for the release of two Britons imprisoned there. Will the Secretary of State tell the House who was responsible for that reckless, irresponsible and ill-advised attack?

Mr. Rifkind: The fact that the hon. Gentleman is even prepared to contemplate that the missile which struck that hotel might have been aimed at it deliberately shows the nature of his prejudices. It must be obvious to him that, whatever the source of the incident, it would not have been the deliberate desire of any country to inflict damage on a civilian hotel—[Interruption.] So far as the consequences are concerned, I have not the slightest doubt that if the United States Government conclude that a cruise missile was responsible for the incident, they will wish to take all the necessary steps to try to identify the reasons why that might have happened, but the ultimate responsibility for an incident——

Mr. George Galloway (Glasgow, Hillhead): They have accepted that it was.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. I should be grateful if the hon. Gentleman would contain himself.

Mr. Rifkind: Responsibility for any incident that has taken place in recent times must lie with Saddam Hussein, whose behaviour caused the necessity for coalition operations in support of United Nations resolutions.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Rifkind: If I may be allowed to continue a little longer, I shall happily give way to other hon. Members.

I have already reported to the House the details of the coalition action against Iraqi air defences on 13 and 18 January and paid tribute to the service personnel involved. The House will be aware that the operations in which the RAF participated were undertaken in self-defence, to protect coalition aircraft patrolling the southern no-fly zone. The right of self-defence is enshrined in international law.

The United Nations Secretary General said on 14 January that air raids against Iraqi air defences on the previous day had a sufficient mandate from the Security Council. The legal position is quite clear. The Government are in no doubt that the actions in which the RAF has participated have been necessary and proportionate to the threat.

Dr. Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak): On the issue of self-defence, is the Secretary of State aware of the comments by the United States Defence Secretary on 5 January to the effect that Iraqi surface-to-air missile systems are to obsolete and clapped out that they pose a greater threat to the Iraqi troops handling them than to the western allies' aircraft, and that that fact is backed up by the 19th edition of "Jane's Weapons Systems"? Does the Secretary of State still justify the action taken on 17 January? Was it not an over-reaction on the part of the western allies to Saddam Hussein's sabre rattling, which was an attempt to boost his position in Iraq?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Lady must realise that the coalition action was taken for two reasons: first, in the days following 5 January Saddam Hussein moved new air missile defences into the southern no-fly zone; and, secondly, he permitted, indeed required, Iraqi fighter aircraft to penetrate into the air space over the southern no-fly zone. That dual threat to the coalition aircraft policing the no-fly zone made the action necessary in not only our view but that of the UN Secretary-General.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): Does the Defence Secretary accept that there is concern among the allies? The French Government are concerned about the extent to which missile strikes—as opposed to air strikes—to enforce the no-fly zone can be termed to come within the United Nations mandate? Does he accept that concern and will the United Kingdom Government take any action to clarify the extent of the UN mandate under which we are acting?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman must be careful before referring to the views of the French Government. On Tuesday this week the French ambassador to the United Nations indicated the full support of that Government for the operations that have taken place, and they were fully involved in the decisions that led to the events in question.

I should like to take this opportunity to update the House on our assessment of the success of the coalition actions against Iraqi air defences. Information that is now available confirms our initial assessment that the actions were highly successful. Severe damage has been inflicted on key targets. Despite the limited nature of the operations, they have significantly degraded the air defence network in southern Iraq. That means that coalition aircraft patrolling the no-fly zone, in support of UN Security Council resolution 688, can do so in greater safety, to the benefit of the civilian population below.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Either force—very limited and measured, bearing in mind the danger of civilian casualties—is used when appropriate, or the allies simply decide that Saddam Hussein may break all the provisions of the ceasefire agreement and may be encouraged by the absence of any response from the allies to go further. Is not that the basic dilemma? Does the Secretary of State agree that it is almost certain—perhaps the word "almost" is not necessary—that, if force had not been used in the first instance, Kuwait would still be under enemy occupation?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman is correct—and not just in regard to what would have happened to Kuwait. If the coalition countries had not responded over the past two weeks, Saddam Hussein's aspirations would not have been satisfied. If he had found that the dispatch of fighter aircraft into the southern and northern no-fly zones and the introduction of new missile defences did not invite a firm and determined reaction from the international community, he would soon have taken further action to reduce the international community's impact. The northern and southern no-fly zones would gradually, but inevitably, have become inoperative. Saddam Hussein would then have started his aggression against Kuwait proper and at some stage the international community would have been required to take action of the sort that we have taken to preserve the independence and integrity of Kuwait.

Opposition Members who have attacked these operations must ask themselves what Saddam Hussein would have had to do to make them recognise the need for firm and decisive action to curb his aggressive instincts. In the past week, it has become clear that, following the firm action that was taken, the international position has been restored. That is something that should be welcomed by all hon. Members.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman agree that, in all this, there is another "if"? If Switzerland, Germany, France, Russia and this country had not, since 1975, absolutely poured the most sophisticated arms and arms-making equipment into Iraq, the situation might not have turned out as it has. What will now be done about the pouring of arms to people who may well do the same as has been done by Saddam Hussein? Cannot we learn the lesson that something must be done about the exporting of nuclear weaponry in particular? We do not know how attacks on nuclear installations—if there are nuclear installations—would be monitored.

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman is quite right to emphasise that enormous care must be taken with regard to the sale of arms to any country. On the question of the approvals that are required before arms sales are permitted, the United Kingdom has tougher controls than virtually any other country.

Mr. Bernie Grant (Tottenham) rose——

Mr. Rifkind: Many hon. Members want to take part in this debate. The more interventions I accept, the less will be the chances of other hon. Members to contribute.

With regard to the three operations that have been mentioned, I have heard a figure of 50 per cent. success being loosely quoted in the media. Such figures are meaningless. A mission that achieves its objectives and brings home all its aircraft and aircrew safely is a success. I should emphasise that military operations are not some sort of video game. Anyone familiar with high-technology equipment knows that it is not simply a matter of pressing a button and destroying the target. Modern bombing missions are carried out at high speed, involving split-second decisions and, of course, real people. In fact, the recent coalition action against Iraqi air defences has been highly successful, and I believe that the Iraqis know it.

In this context, the nation can be rightly proud of the contribution made by the RAF. The RAF Tornado GR1 more than lived up to its reputation as a potent and effective attack weapon system. Using the new TIALD pods, and dropping 1,000 lb laser-guided bombs, four Tornado GR1 were successful in severely damaging the precise air defence and control facilities they attacked, first at Al Amarah and later at An Najaf. This is a remarkable performance by any standards.

I wish to dwell for a moment on the matter of collateral damage, which I know is of concern to the House. The coalition went to great lengths to avoid accidental damage to unintended targets. As I told the House on Monday, when the crew of an RAF Tornado aircraft could not clearly identify its target at An Najaf, weapons were not released, in order to avoid collateral damage. I can think of no clearer illustration of the fact that we do not just say these things for public consumption but do something about it, even if it risks failing to attack the target.

It was therefore with genuine regret that we learnt of the explosion at the al-Rashid hotel on Sunday night, during the United States cruise missile attack on a nuclear-related facility. This was a tragic accident involving the loss of civilian life. However, we should not lose sight of Saddam Hussein's persistent defiance of United Nation's Security Council resolution 687—the mandatory resolution establishing the ceasefire following the Gulf conflict—which led to this attack. He alone must bear the responsibility for not conforming to the will of the international community before force became necessary.

The operations against Iraqi air defences have been a success. They have significantly enhanced the safety of coalition aircraft and ensured the continuation of effective no-fly zones, which provide protection for the civilian population of northern and southern Iraq. Despite rhetoric to the contrary, the Iraqis have steadily been abandoning their defiance of resolutions over the past week. Their border incursions have ceased and they have removed their police posts from the demilitarised zone on the border with Kuwait. They have also conformed to the requirements of the United Nations for unrestricted flights for United Nations special commission inspectors into Iraq. These are welcome developments, but clearly not the end of the road. It is a matter of great regret that Saddam Hussein could not simply do what the United Nations requires of him without being forced to it.

Once again the international community has thwarted the designs of Saddam Hussein. In the last few years he has seen the collapse of his efforts to annex Kuwait, to acquire weapons of mass destruction and to crush minorities within his own people. Now his open defiance of the United Nations has been confronted and rebuffed again. The Government remain resolute in their determination to ensure that Iraq will comply with all relevent United Nations resolutions and that Saddam Hussein will not again threaten peace and security in the Gulf region. The Royal Air Force will continue to play a key role in putting this policy into practice.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): The Secretary of State has mentioned the question of Saddam Hussein's acquisition of weapons of mass destruction. Does he recall that in April 1990, when I pressed the Government to increase the number of inspections by the International Atomic Energy Agency, I was told that they would not press for more inspections as Saddam Hussein had signed the international non-proliferation treaty and they had full confidence that he would abide by his international obligations and would not develop nuclear weapons? That was five months before Saddam Hussein attacked Kuwait.

Would not it be appropriate today for the Secretary of State to engage in a little act of contrition following the Government's sins of commission and omission? We did not have proper intelligence—I use the word literally—about what was going on, although the rest of the world seemed to know, and we were supplying Saddam Hussein with a vast number of products that enabled him not only to build his nuclear arsenals but to make chemical and biological weapons.

Mr. Rifkind: I am not sure that the hon. Gentleman was successful in predicting Iraq's invasion of Kuwait. The entire international community, including the hon. Gentleman and all other hon. Members, should take account of the experience of the past few years, which has demonstrated that Saddam Hussein's word is of very little value and that we must judge his regime by its deeds rather than by its words. That is precisely why the action that has been taken was necessary.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): With regard to the supply to Saddam Hussein of arms and the means of manufacturing them, the Secretary of State will recall that the inspection teams operating in Iraq discovered a great deal of material relating to suppliers. Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman prevail on the United Nations to publish that material so that we may know the identity of the arms exporters in this country who were the friends and allies of Saddam Hussein and the extent of the support that they received from within the ranks of the Government?

Mr. Rifkind: It will be for the United Nations to decide whether to publish any information that it has. In that regard, we are quite happy to abide by its view.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Rifkind: Several hon. Members wish to speak in this debate, and I have had the indulgence of the House long enough.

This year marks the 75th anniversary of the formation of the Royal Air Force. The House will wish to join me in congratulating the force on reaching that landmark and for the great achievements of the past 75 years.

The House will wish to know that the occasion will be marked by a royal review at RAF Marham on 1 April, at which Her Majesty the Queen will present a new Queen's colour to the Royal Air Force. The review will include a full wing parade, a fly-past of some 150 aircraft, exhibitions and a static aircraft display reflecting the past achievements, present activities, and future aspirations of the RAF.

Mr. Bernie Grant rose——

Mr. Rifkind: The massive shifts in the world order which we have witnessed over the past few years have thrown up a new strategic situation which requies much greater flexibility and mobility from our forces than ever before. The United Kingdom will continue to require the services to respond—as we have seen in Iraq—to a whole spectrum of unpredictable possible threats and contingencies. It is fitting that, in the 75th anniversary year, we should pay particular tribute to the manner in which the RAF has been able to meet the new challenges it has faced.

RAF aircraft are flying daily sorties over northern and southern Iraq; they are committed to the NATO and United Nations military efforts in the former Yugoslavia; and they are playing a valuable role in the humanitarian role in the distribution of aid to the suffering communities in the former Yugoslavia and in Somalia. Nor should the longer-standing commitments in Belize and the Falkland Islands be forgotten.

The RAF is in transition. The restructuring in which we are currently engaged will ensure that the service continues to be able to meet the requirements placed on it. The men and women of the Royal Air Force have shown how admirably they can cope with the most difficult circumstances. I pay tribute to them for their bravery, commitment and professionalism. With well-trained and well-motivated personnel and with modern equipment—particularly now that the future of Eurofighter 2000 has been assured—I believe that the RAF can look forward with hope and confidence to its next 75 years.

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): We are pleased to be having this debate because it gives us an opportunity yet again to register our full support for the Royal Air Force in its efforts over Iraq and elsewhere in the world. As the Secretary of State reminded us, the RAF is deployed throughout the world. It also gives us an opportunity to discuss the way forward in the Gulf, as we believe that we should be discussing not only the recent activities but the ways forward.

Having said that, I must stress to the Secretary of State that today's debate is no substitute for a full-scale debate on the RAF. Hon. Members in all parts of the House wish to raise constituency matters relating to the RAF and operational and logistics aspects of the service. I remind the Government that we have not had an RAF debate since 2 May 1991. I trust that, when he replies to the debate, the Foreign Secretary will confirm that, in the 75th year of the RAF, the Government do not want to be discourteous to the RAF by not providing a full-scale debate in the House of Commons. It would be an insult to the RAF and the House if we did not have such a debate.

In essence, this debate is concerned with the recent raids involving the RAF over Iraq. That is where the public interest lies and the subject on which we must question the Government. Those raids were about the enforcement of no-fly zones over the north and south of Iraq. When those zones were established, they met with almost universal approval. We called for them, we supported them then and we support them now. I pay tribute to the RAF personnel and our allies who have daily patrolled the dangerous skies and whose courage and skill has, for the last 18 months, protected thousands of Shi'ites and Kurds from death and injury.

This is an opportune time to recall why it was necessary to impose those no-fly zones. Saddam Hussein has an atrocious record on human rights. Like most dictators, he has shown the utmost brutality towards minorities and especially against those who disagree with him. He began to use his aircraft to carry out much of that programme of genocide. In the north against the Kurds, he waged chemical warfare in which thousands of innocent men, women and children perished. It is estimated that, in the town of Halabja, 5,000 people lost their lives. In other areas, refugees were gunned down as they tried to flee.

A United Nations official report on the situation in the south speaks of the use of phosphorus and napalm bombs. Reports of chemical warfare were rife. I must add that chemical warfare—indeed, much of the rest of the warfare—was made possible in many instances by equipment supplied by western companies. As the House knows, the British Government have clearly been shown to have treated the United Nations arms embargo against Iraq with a Nelsonian approach, turning a blind eye to breaches.

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam): I welcome the hon. Gentleman's remarks of support for the action in Iraq. Does he agree that the comments of CND—the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament—of which he was a member for five years, are regrettable, particularly the remark that the course of action was regrettable? Will he confirm that he resigned from CND in the light of those remarks?

Dr. Clark: I wish that I had not given way to the hon. Lady [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."] She wastes the time of the House and squeezes out other hon. Members who wish to make a contribution to the debate. I do not think my position in the debate over the issues in Iraq is to be doubted.

[Dr. Clark]

Because Saddam Hussein waged wanton genocide, the United Nations was forced to pass resolution 688 demanding that he stop persecuting minorities in Iraq. Later, to ensure that that resolution was implemented, no-fly zones were imposed, a move which at the time met with universal support. I have heard it suggested that they were illegal. No less a person than the United Nations Secretary-General gave approval for their establishment in August 1992 and said that the Security Council had given the allies the necessary mandate.

That was the position then and I take the view that, if it was, and is, good enough for the United Nations Secretary-General, it is good enough for me. It goes without saying that unless those no-fly zones were enforced, they were unlikely to be of any use. Thus, allied aircraft have been deployed to ensure that no Iraqi aircraft can fly in those zones and perpetrate their dreadful crimes on the Kurds and the Shi'ites.

When Saddam Hussein began to install ground-to-air missiles and their associated radars in the no-fly zones—occasionally they locked on to patrolling allied aircraft—he had only one object in mind. That was to deter the patrolling aircraft and make nonsense of the no-fly zones. That could not be tolerated. In effect, he was threatening not only the lives of the pilots but the lives of thousands of innocent people in the north and south of Iraq.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that a United States Air Force Wild Weasel aircraft today fired a missile at an Iraqi battery which had directed its laser beam against a French Mirage aircraft? Such a provocative act is further evidence that we cannot place any validity on statements made by Iraq.

Dr. Clark: I was aware of that, having heard about it on the 4 o'clock BBC world news. I gather that further details of the incident are awaited. It seems that the Iraqis locked on to an allied aircraft.

Mr. Winnick: Would my hon. Friend agree that we should be deeply concerned, whatever side we take, about civilian casualties? We should not otherwise be in this House, and certainly not on the Labour Benches. The last person to give lectures about casualties is the criminal dictator in Iraq who is not only responsible for what my hon. Friend has been describing but it should also be remembered that he initiated that eight years war with his neighbouring country, a war which cost the lives of tens of thousands of people on both sides and no gain was made. That is apart from the gassing of his own people and all the other crimes and atrocities that this evil tyrant has committed.

Dr. Clark: I accept and acknowledge the sincerity of my hon. Friend who feels very strongly about this and I thought he made his point very well. He reinforced the argument I was trying to deploy, that this man has murdered thousands upon thousands of his own citizens and we must never forget that. Even now there are British citizens languishing in the gaols of Iraq. I think of Michael Wainwright, from the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon), and I think of Paul Ride from the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard). They are languishing in those gaols for no other reason than that they inadvertently crossed the border. They committed no crimes, yet we do not know in what conditions they are being held. I hope that when the Foreign Secretary winds up he will be able to give us some more information about that.

Sir Jim Spicer (Dorset, West): May I return to the point which the hon. Member made about the safety of our own aircrews? He will no doubt have read that in the north, a definite ambush was set up and MiG fighters were deployed to try and draw our fighters into an ambush so that those ground-to-air missiles could hit them. Does that not emphasise the fact, which if I may say so has not been emphasised from his own Benches, that we have to do something, if only for the safety of our own people, apart from all the points that he has been making.

Dr. Clark: I hoped that I had made the point that that is basically what it is all about and it was because of that that it was right to target purely military targets, not civilian targets and the bombing raids were necessary and justified, if we were going to enforce the no-fly zones. There have been questions as to whether the actions—the western reaction of the past week—were in accord with United Nations resolutions.

Mr. Bernie Grant: As the Secretary of State would not answer my question and my hon. Friend appears to be a friend of the Secretary of State, perhaps he will answer my question. I specifically asked the Secretary of State last Wednesday about targeting and he gave the impression then that all the targets would be in the no-fly zones. We now learn that the British Government supported the Americans when they launched the cruise missiles at Baghdad, which is outside the no-fly zone. Could my hon. Friend explain why there has been this change of mind by the Secretary of State and has the Secretary of State misled Parliament in what he said last Wednesday?

Dr. Clark: My hon. Friend was less worthy than he normally is in his initial comment, but I honestly cannot say what the Secretary of State thinks. His mind is beyond himself, let alone me. I cannot interpret that.

Mr. Malcolm Chisholm (Edinburgh, Leith): I accept that my hon. Friend cannot speak for the Secretary of State, but can he give his own opinion and will he take this opportunity to condemn the American cruise missile attack on Baghdad, which clearly had nothing to do with the defence of the no-fly zones?

Dr. Clark: Yes. We have made clear our position with regard to the justification for those raids. We have said that, if they are in accord with United Nations resolutions, if they are within international law and within the level of proportionality, they are justified. In the case of the American raid we say clearly, and said immediately after the raid, that enough was enough of that sort of raid and that the whole issue should be referred back to the United Nations. That was our position on Monday. It is our position now and I hope that that is clear.

If I might continue about the legality of these raids. The custodian of those United Nations resolutions is the Secretary General of the United Nations, Boutros Boutros Ghali. He has made the position clear about the legality of the no-fly zones. He repeated the position about the latest raid last week and said:

"The raid was carried out in accordance with a mandate from the Security Council under resolution 678, and the motive for the raid was Iraq's violation of resolution 687, which concerns the cease-fire. As the Secretary General of the United Nations, I can tell you that the action taken was in accordance with the resolutions of the Security Council and the Charter of the United Nations."

That is pretty clear to me. It is not like the Secretary of State's mind. We understand it clearly. We are therefore completely satisfied that the raids in which we were involved were covered by the United Nations mandate and were in accord with international law. As such, they have our full support, but we also feel that it is now appropriate to pose the question as to which is the best way forward. Where do we go to? One thing is clear: no matter how important this affair is—and it is important—we must not allow Saddam Hussein to dominate the world political stage. He is not the most important person in the world, and there are considerable problems elsewhere. I think of Cambodia, Bosnia, Somalia, and of Mozambique, and I could go on. There are other problems. We must not get this out of proportion.

We all know that Saddam Hussein is a chancer as well as a bully. Of course he resented the ceasefire terms imposed on him by the United Nations and he thought he had a chance. He saw a window of opportunity in which he could rid himself of some of those obligations. He thought that Europe was preoccupied with the Bosnian situation. He knew that the Americans had 30,000 troops trying to provide relief aid in Somalia. They had their hands full. He looked at the presidential changeover period in the United States and thought that that would blur decision-making so he took a chance. He thought it was an opportunity to ease some of the burdens of the United Nations resolutions and he has been shown in no uncertain terms that he cannot do so.

His actions and the United Nations' response have sparked a debate which raises many pertinent questions, not least of which is how the United Nations enforces resolutions in the new world order, following the end of the super-power confrontation.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): Will my hon. Friend confirm that the incursions that took place before these raids and were used as justification for them, took place in land that was clearly in Iraq before the commencement of the invasion of Kuwait and the subsequent Gulf war? Will he also say how the Iraqi regime was to negotiate about the borders when those in the west were not interested in negotiating with them about that?

Dr. Clark: I can confirm that what my hon. Friend has said is a fact. That land used to be Iraqi. It was declared a demilitarised zone until last Friday when it became part of Kuwait. That is my understanding of the situation. He is right. I am not justifying our attacks within the no-fly zone on the incursions into Kuwait, serious as they were, but justifying trying to save the lives of thousands of Shias and Kurds who would suffer if those no-fly zones were lost.

Mr. Mike Gapes (Ilford, South): Is my hon. Friend aware that the radio of the Voice of the Kurds which broadcasts from the organisation, the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan, which is the socialist party within Kurdistan which has 49 per cent. of support within the democratically elected Kurdish Parliament, elected last year, has called on the Iraqi people and Iraqi army to rise up and overthrow Saddam and his brutal dictatorship? Is he also aware that despite some calls from some quarters in the Arab world against this action, there are large numbers of people including the Iraqi democratic opposition who believe that it is time that the United Nations and the international community started to give its aid and assistance to that democratic opposition? The humanitarian aid should no longer go through Saddam's regime: it should go directly to those who need it so that Saddam and his forces are not reinforced by it.

Dr. Clark: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention, because it accords with the information that I have been receiving over the past 24 hours. I have been on the telephone to people connected with the Iraqi National Congress—the official opposition forum for Iraq, and other groups who have been involved with the Kurds and the Shias and Iraqi opposition in general. They told me, "The response was appropriate." That was their reaction to the bombings.

On Monday, I said in the House that after three raids, it was perhaps time to take stock of the situation. I felt it appropriate for the matter to be referred back to the Security Council, not with a view to weakening our resolve or stance against Saddam Hussein but to reassess what had been achieved and to develop a more long-term and coherent strategy of how he could be forced to comply with UN resolutions. We were delighted when that course was followed but disappointed that the Government did not take more of a lead.

Of necessity, the Security Council discussion on Tuesday was somewhat restricted in its terms, and we still feel that a further discussion would be useful. A discussion in the Security Council would have the advantage not only of taking stock, but would allow us to maximise support in the coalition ranged against Saddam Hussein. We felt that any misunderstanding could lead to disagreements with our Arab friends and allies. That must be avoided if our longer-term objectives are to be achieved in the middle east.

The Gulf affair raises the whole prickly issue of how United Nations resolutions are to be enforced. As we enter a new era without the two super powers and their client states there is clearly a new enhanced role for the UN, but the UN must be more than a mere debating chamber. Its resolutions need to be enforced. Our experience of the League of Nations shows that the will of the international community needs to be enforced and not merely expressed. What may be appropriate in one situation may not be appropriate in another. Different situations demand different solutions. We need flexibility and, of course, the cardinal rule must be that force must always be the weapon of last resort.

In the past individual nations or groups of nations have taken on the responsibility to ensure that United Nations resolutions were enforced. Last week the United States, Britain and France, with the backing of Russia, did that. They had little option if Saddam Hussein was not to continue to flout vital resolutions. We should remember that he had installed missiles in a no-fly zone, and invaded the Kuwait border/demilitarised zone and taken missiles. I am sure that my hon. Friends will agree that that was not in accord with the United Nations resolution.

He also refused permission for United Nations weapons inspectors to fly in and perform their task. That task is vital to ensure that Saddam Hussein does not continue to build up his chemical and nuclear warfare capacity. That task had to be enforced. However, we accept that the sensitivities of some of our middle east allies were affected. That can be overcome in the longer term by the United Nations being given the means to work through other regional groups as was envisaged in chapter 8 of the United Nations charter.

In the new world order, the United Nations must be modernised to accommodate its burgeoning peacekeeping and peacemaking operations. I am always surprised by the number of places in which the United Nations is trying to keep the peace, to keep warring groups apart and, sometimes, to make peace. It is appropriate to consider rejuvenating the military staff committee. We should debate the establishment of a joint military planning group within the United Nations.

There is an urgent and immediate need for a high technology communications unit in the United Nations to help co-ordinate military operations. Military units operating under the United Nations should be able to communicate as effectively with the the United Nations as with their national Governments. Without such facilities, it will be difficult for forces to continue to operate effectively under the aegis of the United Nations. The Secretary-General has produced a report on that and other issues, and I hope that the Government will press for some reform along those lines.

The United Nations must pursue non-military means with even more vigour, especially in relation to their use in Iraq. Should not we consider a resolution spelling out that if Iraq had a Government who would abide by the ceasefire conditions, did not persecute their minorities and accepted all the pertinent United Nations resolutions the economic sanctions imposed by the United Nations would be lifted, making life much more tolerable for the ordinary people of Iraq with whom we have no quarrel?

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Clark: No. I should like to continue.

Over the past few weeks, many young men in the RAF and their colleagues in allied air forces risked their lives in raids against Saddam Hussein. Let us not forget that. They took no pleasure in that, but they did it in an attempt to force him to comply with UN resolutions. They were spelling out that he could not flout the wish of the rest of the world. Thankfully, they all came back and we have edged away from the immediate prospect of out-and-out hostilities into which we seemed to be drifting on Monday. The position is now much more hopeful.

Saddam Hussein—if I dare say it—has declared a ceasefire; President Bush has been replaced by President Clinton; and the United Nations inspectors are being allowed back into Iraq on UN terms. That is a much more hopeful scenario than the one that prevailed seven days ago.

Mr. Brazier rose——

Mr. Cormack rose——

Dr. Clark: No, I will not give way.

We must build on those positive aspects. We must work within the UN to make it more effective in carrying out its resolutions. While we are doing that we must tell Saddam Hussein that we will not tolerate his persecution of his minorities or his threats to his neighbours. It must be made absolutely clear that he cannot renege on the ceasefire terms and that United Nations resolutions will not be broken with impunity.

5.17 pm

Sir Edward Heath (Old Bexley and Sidcup): I fully associate myself with what the Secretary of State for Defence said about Her Majesty's Royal Air Force. As one who benefited greatly from the support of the Royal Air Force during the tramp across Europe in the second world war, I appreciate it as much as anybody.

I should like to raise two issues in relation to the far east. I agree with the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) about seeking a way forward, because as far as I can see no one is doing that. People are still dwelling in the past. In the past few days the situation appeared to deteriorate into a personal vendetta between the American president and Saddam Hussein. One must try to find a solution.

I also agree with the hon. Member for South Shields about the Secretary-General's views on the necessity for a proper communications system. The previous Secretary-General told me that his greatest regret was that he saw no signs beforehand of the Iraqi attack on Kuwait—that it was impossile for him to do so because no satellites or intelligence services were at his disposal and the powers did not give him any information about their expectations in international affairs, in respect of conflicts between nations. Obviously that should be remedied as quickly as possible.

One understands the attacks on President Saddam Hussein perfectly well. He was attacked because he started the war against Iran, but one must remember that in that respect he was supported by the whole Arab world, which regarded Iran as its greatest threat, and by a large part of the western world—which took the same view and proceeded to supply President Saddam Hussein with all the weaponry of war necessary for his purpose. In condemning President Saddam Hussein for the damage that he has brought upon his people, one must remember also what happened in Iran under the last regime and the destruction that it brought to the people of that country. Both are equally worthy of condemnation.

As to the future, with the change in the American presidency we have reached the stage where the United nations Secretary-General can himself be called in to deal with the hopeful signs mentioned by the Opposition spokesman, and identify whether there is a genuine policy behind them or whether they were made purely for propaganda purposes. The matter can no longer be dealt with by the four powers, who are already beginning to break up. The United Nations is really in the hands of the four powers mentioned today. That cannot continue if we are to find a way forward, because they are all so committed to their past. That applies to our own Government as well.

I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs is now prepared to step back and to take an entirely fresh look at how the situation can be dealt with in the future. I note that the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) has a grin on his face, as he so often has at any suggestion of that kind. His views would carry a little more weight if he told Israel to implement the United Nations recommendations and suggested that force be used against Israel to get it out of the occupied territories and that Israel take back the 400 helpless people who, in the cold of winter, it threw into territory that it does not occupy. If the hon. Gentleman did that, I might pay some attention to his views.

Mr. Winnick: The right hon. Gentleman is right to attack Israel's action and the people whom he mentioned should never have been deported. That was not in accordance with international law and I cannot disagree with the right hon. Gentleman on that. However, does he recall his earlier speeches, and in particular an article of his that was published in The Independent just before Christmas 1990, in which he defended and justified Saddam Hussein's position towards Kuwait, and to which I replied at the time?

Before I take any lectures from the right hon. Gentleman about Israel or the middle east, I remind him that when he was Government Chief Whip at the time of the Suez crisis, I and many other Members of Parliament demonstrated against British aggression in Egypt, which —as we knew at the time—was done in collusion with France and Israel. Instead of resigning, as Edward Boyle and Anthony Nutting did, the right hon. Gentleman kept himself in government.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is outside the scope of the debate.

Sir Edward Heath: The hon. Gentleman did not deal with my point that he is not prepared to say that force should be used against Israel to make it carry out United Nations recommendations. He never—not for a moment —deals with that point.

There is also a lesson to be learnt from Suez. Today, Governments still expect to get rid of President Saddam Hussein. I never justified his conduct, but I explained how he had made such a complete misjudgment because of the support he previously received from the Arab and the western world—and, as we are now learning, right up to the last minute from President Bush and the American ambassador. However, that did not justify his actions in any way.

The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) mentioned 1956. Afterwards, everyone said that the thing to do was to get rid of Abdel Nasser. We never did; he was there for another 14 years and died of a heart attack. For the powers to say, "We must get rid of President Saddam Hussein," does no more than give him additional publicity and strengthen his country. I wish that my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence had acknowledged that in his speech.

Furthermore, recent action has alienated us from the rest of the Arab world.

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Douglas Hurd) indicated dissent.

Sir Edward Heath: There is no use my right hon. Friend shaking his head. He is just not in with the Arab world. I did my best to get him there when he was one of my Private Secretaries. I took him around the Gulf with me, but it will take more than that to get him to understand that recent action has alienated a large part of the Arab world. That alienation lessens our influence and damages our economic and trade position with the Arab world. Meanwhile, the rest of the European countries are getting on with it and gaining a lot of benefit while we lose. That is why we must abandon the idea that we must get rid of President Saddam Hussein before anything else can be done.

Mr. Hurd: I gladly acknowledge that I owe a large part of my education to my right hon. Friend. It has moved on a little in some respects since those days, but I certainly acknowledge the debt. I hope that we are reasonably in touch with the Arab world. I believe that it would have dismayed the Arab world much more—even those who utter some discontent now—if we had allowed Saddam Hussein to exploit what he saw as a moment of weakness and uncertainty in the western world. If, as a result, we were today in a position in which the integrity of Kuwait, with its new boundaries, had clearly been violated; in which the United Nations had conditions imposed on it before any inspection teams were allowed into Iraq to examine and destroy chemical and nuclear weapons; and in which allied planes that are helping to protect the Shias and the Kurds had in effect been bullied out of the sky, the tremors of nervousness, dismay and accusation directed from the Arab world reaching their friends in the West would have been overwhelming and very dangerous.

Sir Edward Heath: My right hon. Friend is perfectly entitled to his view, and I would not challenge part of it. The damage has been caused by the attack on the alleged arms factories outside Baghdad which alienated public opinion. There is no use my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence saying, "In any case, it is all Saddam Hussein's fault," because that is not accepted. If we decide to bomb targets where there are questions of legal justification and that action does undesirable harm, of course we lose out. That is where the whole question arises of how the situation should be handled and it is a question of utmost importance. There is far too much of, "Whatever happens, it is all President Saddam Hussein's fault." That is not how the rest of the Arab world sees it.

Another factor left out of the account in looking to the future is the action of Iran, which has not been mentioned by either my right hon. and learned Friend or Labour's Front-Bench spokesman. There is undoubtedly a desire on the part of Iran, and the opportunity, to penetrate the southern area of Iraq, as it has tried to do for decades and centuries and against which we must guard. No action has been taken and I would like assurances on that aspect.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence said that Kuwait has made no request for British forces to be sent there. I am reassured by that, but I want a reassurance from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs that if any such request is made, it will be turned down at once. We cannot become involved in having ground forces in Kuwait against any possible threat from Iraq. We cannot accept that for one moment. [HON. MEMBERS: "Why?] I will explain why.

Such action will again deepen the hostility of the rest of the Gulf towards this country. We got out of it in 1961; now, we will be regarded as the colonial powers returning again. I was responsible for handling the events of 1961. Kuwait asked for complete independence: it wanted control over foreign and defence policy. The Government accepted that, negotiated it and agreed it at the beginning of July. We also said privately, "If there is any threat to you, you can come to us." According to our own information, such a threat was posed towards the end of that July. We said, "This is a threat to you. Do you want us to come to your assistance?" The Kuwaitis said yes, so we sent in forces. As a result, the Iraqis—who were on the Basra road—halted and then withdrew.

We then said—this is the important point—"You are now independent in every respect. If you are to have forces here permanently, they should come from the Arab League. They can be placed there as a guard against any attempts from Iraq to the north." The Arab League accepted that: it moved in its forces and we—having gone in at the end of July—withdrew in the middle of October. That was the end of it.

Now, we should get the Arab League to take action and provide what is necessary for the defence of Kuwait. Its members can agree that among themselves. There may be difficulties; the Al-Sabah regime in Kuwait is not the most admired in the Arab world, for good reasons. Nothing that has happened since the war gives us any reason for admiration either. The rest of the Arab world knows that perfectly well. Of course, no one over here ever mentions the fact that many Palestinians and Jordanians who were working in Kuwait have spent all their lives there and have never been allowed back; nor does anyone mention the action taken against individuals who have been allowed no proper trial. However, I do not want to go into all that.

If it is necessary for action to be taken, it should be taken through the Arab League. That will mean active work on the part of the Secretary-General of the United Nations and by the Foreign Ministers of the countries that were involved in the Gulf war. I hope that the Foreign Secretary will accept that.

I have expressed the strongest possible opposition to the sending of British forces to Kuwait. Earlier, a voice behind me asked, "Why?" I have explained one of my reasons; another reason is that, once the forces were there, it would be impossible to get them out. We should find ourselves landed with yet another commitment abroad, in a country where there are no direct British interests. [HON. MEMBERS: "There is oil."] We have all the oil we need. What other British interest is there? We must face facts. The only direct interest that we could have in Kuwait is oil, and we have oil.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): I am very interested in my right hon. Friend's idea that we should leave the security and defence of Kuwait to the Arab League. The Arab League has never called itself an effective military instrument, capable of coherent defensive action. That being so, surely it is incumbent on the western allies jointly to secure the interests of their friends in the region—the emirate of Kuwait and the other continguous powers.

Sir Edward Heath: The Arab League has the necessary resources. It has money, equipment and men. My hon. Friend may treat it with contempt, but it worked for many years in the 1960s. What is more, if the Arab League defends Kuwait, it will be much more difficult for Saddam Hussein to use the Iraqis to attack it.

My opposition to sending British forces into Kuwait is equalled only by my opposition to the involving of further British forces in any Yugoslavian action. A ghastly civil war is going on: people are trying to wipe out the legacy of generations and centuries. We cannot do that for them; what we can do is, where necessary, put a fence between Yugoslavia and other countries that might be affected. That is an understandable aim, but we are simply not capable of working out the answer for Yugoslavia.

Perhaps the plan worked out by Lord Owen and his colleague will eventually be accepted; we cannot tell. If it is accepted, however, we shall not know whether it will be kept. Many would want to accept it, get rid of any intervention and then start adjusting again—but this is not a war in which we must become involved. If we send in more forces, we shall become more and more tied down.

We must accept that, if we try to protect humanitarian forces, we are bound to suffer casualties. That cannot be avoided, although it is tragic. Already, tributes have been paid to one soldier whose life was lost in Yugoslavia. What will happen when such events occur constantly? What will the public say if we put forces in, those in the mountains start carrying on as they did during the second world war and all the casualties start coming home? We know that the public are affected by television coverage of those who are suffering now; what will they say when the forces that we put in are in the same condition? I know that, technically, the debate is not about Yugoslavia, but I want to make it absolutely plain how strongly I oppose our being dragged in to Yugoslavia step by step, as is now happening.

Nor should we give way to American pressure. We do not know yet what the new president will want, or how he will conduct himself. If I were the American president, I would be furious about what his predecessor has done during the past 10 days to try to force him into a corner and to deprive him of any freedom of decision in policy matters. To take all public interest from the arrival of a new president so that it will stay with the old one is appalling behaviour on the part of anyone in public life. That is the Americans' affair, however; we do not have to give way to American pressure.

In the 1960s, Harold Macmillan and his Government stood firmly against all American pressure to get us into Vietnam. That pressure was added to by Australia and New Zealand. We continued to stand against it, and how right we were. At the time of the war between India and Pakistan, there was tremendous pressure on us to become involved. Macmillan and his Cabinet stood against it: I well remember the emergency meetings that we had. When there was trouble in Jordan and Israel, there was pressure on us to become involved in that, too; we resisted that pressure. When there was war again between India and Pakistan, President Nixon and Henry Kissinger put great pressure on us to go in. We withstood that pressure and said no and we were absolutely right to do so.

There was great pressure for us to go into the Yom Kippur war; we withstood it absolutely. In all those cases, we took the right attitude. I hope that our present Government will stand up to any American pressure to become involved in Yugoslavia, Kuwait or the Gulf. We must concentrate on working out a way of taking publicity away from Saddam Hussein and securing a workable agreement. I think that the UN Secretary-General is probably the person to do that. It must be done personally; it cannot be achieved through long-distance communications—another communiqué here, another decree there. That will not produce the answer. It is time that we got down to the real job of working out a solution for the future.

5.38 pm

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): I am grateful to the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) for introducing an element of reality to a debate that was becoming absorbed in the hype of the last days of President Bush.

I joined the Royal Air Force 50 years ago this year, and qualified as a pilot in 1945—too late to fight. As a former service man, however, let me say that nothing upsets service men more than Ministers' sending them into action, then hiding behind them and saying that those who criticised the action are traitors to their country. The Royal Air Force was formed 75 years ago and some other things that successive Governments have asked it to do are on the record. Squadron Leader Harris—later "Bomber Harris"—used chemical weapons in the twenties against the Iraqis to control the tribesmen. It was the first time that air power had been used for colonial control. That was not the fault of the RAF: it was the post-war Government who decided to use air power to keep Iraq under our control. We may not want such things to be remembered, but in the Arab world they are remembered.

The right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup spoke about Kuwait. He will recall that Selwyn Lloyd sent a message to Foster Dulles in 1958 suggesting that Britain take over Kuwait as a crown colony. Foster Dulles said, "What a marvellous idea." That may not be remembered in the House, but it is remembered in the Arab world.

I hope that many of my hon. Friends will join me in the Lobby against the motion for the Adjournment. It is a disreputable motion. Whenever a decision of policy arises, the Government table a motion that the House goes home. That is what an Adjournment is. We never had a single vote of substance during the Gulf war. We always had to vote on the Adjournment. Let us be clear that, by voting against the Adjournment, those who take my view—I do not know how many there are—are voting against the wickedness of the bombing that occurred in the past 10 days, and I will tell the House why.

During the Gulf war, we were told that Saddam Hussein was comparable to Hitler. Incidentally, that was a description used in connection with Nasser as well. Subsequently, however, we have learnt a lot about the Government's attitude to Saddam Hussein. They armed Saddam Hussein. The present Prime Minister, as Chancellor, provided a credit of £1 million to Saddam Hussein three months before the war. Iraqi pilots were trained by the Royal Air Force until a few days before the war.

There is some evidence to suggest that the American ambassador indicated to Saddam Hussein just before he occupied Kuwait that such a move would be seen in Washington as an Arab matter. The right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup and I both spent many hours with Saddam Hussein arguing that he should withdraw from Kuwait. I do not know what he said to the right hon. Gentleman, but I know what he said to me: "Even if I withdraw from Kuwait, America is determined to destroy me." Everything that has happened since has confirmed Saddam Hussein's analysis of American policy.

It was not a question of human rights; otherwise, why would Saudi Arabia have received different treatment? There is no democracy in Saudi Arabia. The al-Sabah family run Kuwait. Why have not we heard the great spokespeople on the Conservative Benches on the subject of civil rights in Kuwait.

What about the Palestinian question? Have the Government ever really seriously contemplated exerting the sort of pressure—I am not talking about military pressure—on Israel that might have forced her to respect the resolutions concerning Palestine or even the recent evictions of 400 people? I am a lifelong member of Labour Friends of Israel because I believe in Israel's right to survive. But the Government have never been serious about implementing United Nations resolutions involving Israel.

British Governments did nothing when Turkey invaded Cyprus. Why? Because Turkey was the bulwark of the west against the Soviet Union. We ought at least to understand that the rest of the world understands that what is going on here is odious hypocrisy.

The language used is so false. If a woman is shot in Belfast, as happened the other day, that is terrorism. If a women is killed in the al-Rashid hotel in Baghdad, that is the international community introducing a proportional response. If anyone tries to kill someone else in Bosnia, we send in Lord Owen to tell both sides to stop.

The Minister cannot get away with the fraudulent arguments that he put to the House last week and this. Although he did not like to admit it, he has even produced a slight change of opinion among those on the Opposition Front Bench, who now say that we should go back to the United Nations. That was not said at the beginning: I do not recall my right hon. and hon. Friends saying then that the action should have been freshly endorsed by the Security Council.

I cannot go into the Lobby to vote for a Government who killed 300,000 Iraqis the year before last.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Benn: I shall not give way for the moment.

Do not think that that was all marvellous high technology precision bombing. We know from the recent bombing of the al-Rashid hotel that high technology precision bombing is an illusion pumped out as propaganda.

Mr. Robathan: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Benn: I shall not give way for the moment.

The Harvard medical team went to Iraq just after the bombing. It said that 150,000 Iraqi babies under five would die because we had bombed the water supply and that cholera and typhoid would spread as a result—and so they did. The other day, a United Nations Children's Fund spokesperson, speaking on the 7 o'clock news, said that cholera and typhoid were still rampant. Why? Because we —the so-called allied forces—bombed the water supply. What military targets were at stake there?

We express horror at ethnic cleansing, but, my God, the Kuwaitis threw out every Palestinian after the war because, for their own reasons, the Palestinians had been sympathetic to Saddam. Saddam was an enemy of Israel. Was not that ethnic cleansing? The Saudi Government threw 750,000 Yemenis out of Saudi Arabia into the Yemen. When did the British Government protest about that? It is odious hypocrisy, and people around the world know it.

Mr. Robathan: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Benn: I will not give way for the moment, because I am developing an argument which does not carry a lot of support but at least I can make it clear.

Most of hon. Friends will probably abstain in the vote tonight because that is one way of dealing with the matter; Conservative Members will be whipped to vote for the Adjournment; and some Labour Members will go into the no Lobby. We want the House and the country to know why.

Even during the Secretary of State's speech, I noticed little indications that something that is being said has been noted. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said very clearly that the no-fly zones are not an attempt to partition Iraq. That came from the Foreign Office. The Foreign Office insisted in a memorandum to the Secretary of State that that should be included. That had to be said because many people in the Arab world think that the no-fly zones are an attempt to partition Iraq. The Turks are terrified that, if the Kurds were really free, there would be trouble in Turkey, where the Kurds are also repressed. As the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup, the former Prime Minister, said, if the Shi'ites or some of the marsh Arabs could join Iran, Iran would become a threat. The arguments are fraudulent. The cover is thin.

The truth is that the Government did everything that Bush wanted. I can only say, thank God that Bush has gone. That man did more damage to the true international community than any recent President. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] Roosevelt and Truman were very different.

I do not believe for a moment that the Government have majority support for what they have done. People understand very well that what happened was that the British Government, yet again—in contrast to the courage of Macmillan over the Vietnam war and the Indian war as revealed to us by the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup—simply went along with everything that Bush wanted. Then, when they realised that it was not popular, they got the press office at No. 10 to pump out a story that the Prime Minister had had five or six telephone calls to Bush, just to drop a little hint that there was more caution in London than they were prepared to admit at the time.

It is a disreputable policy. It is a policy that will lose support worldwide. The Government should not be surprised if it does enormous damage to the United Nations. The other day, I read that students in Ethiopia had demonstrated against the United Nations, which they regard as being no more than a flag surrounding American imperialism. I am very clear about it: I want to see a democratic United Nations. I want the member states to elect the Security Council——

Mr. Robathan: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Benn: I am not giving way to the hon. Gentleman; he will just have to make his own speech.

The United Nations was intended to be an instrument of the world community to rid humanity of the scourge of war, not a cover for the one remaining super-power to take on board what Queen Victoria tried to do when she sought to run the world herself and through her three grandsons —the King of England, the Kaiser of Germany and the Czar of Russia. Those days of imperialism are over. It may not be recognised by those on the Government Front Bench, but the Government burnt their fingers at the time of Suez. I believe that they will have burnt their fingers again this time for embarking on an operation that could not be justified by any of the arguments. If the world is to deal with violations of human rights and protect the planet, those questions must be dealt with through genuine international action free from the economic interest of one or another super-power.

5.49 pm

Mr. Tom King (Bridgwater): None of us who sat in the Chamber or served in government during the invasion of Kuwait and its subsequent liberation will have been surprised by the speech that we have just heard from the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn). If he had had his way, and if the policy of the House and the Government had followed his votes on those occasions, Saddam Hussein would still be in Kuwait. He would still be committing the atrocities and cruelties that it was proved that he committed in Kuwait. Indeed, there cannot be much doubt in the House that his ambitions would have spread far wider still.

I give full marks for courage to the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) for his speech, in which he most bravely said that the actions of the United Nations would have the Opposition's full support. That was a brave attempt before the right hon. Member for Chesterfield was let loose. One realises that full support in terms of Labour party attitudes must be severely qualified.

Thank God that, unlike the Parliament in Iraq, we have a Parliament here in which the right hon. Member for Chesterfield can make a speech like the one that he has just made, which was critical of and hostile towards Government policy, and still live to tell the tale. I take some pleasure in that.

The hon. Member for South Shields referred to the length of time that our armed forces, and particulary the Royal Air Force, have been engaged in work within Iraq, and in the skies over Iraq, to save human lives. It is sobering for me to think that it is nearly two years since I stood on the snow-covered hillsides of northern Iraq and met the streams of Kurdish people who were in a pathetic condition, having been driven to the extremities of those mountains through their sheer terror of the threatened genocide of Saddam Hussein and his forces. The House should take pride in the fact that those people live; they are fed, watered and housed. They have come down from the mountain tops and are now back in their villages. To an extent, they are protected by the Peshmerga, their own foot soldiers. That is of course made possible as a result of the air cover provided for all these months by the RAF and the American and French air forces.

The right hon. Member for Chesterfield referred to Operation Haven. In that respect, it is right to pay tribute to the attitude of the Turkish Government. It was not an easy decision for them to take. The decision in the Turkish Parliament was by no means unanimous. It raised major domestic problems in relation to the support for the Kurds in northern Iraq. However, the Turkish Government have continued with that policy in the interests of humanity and to save lives.

Operation Haven is now known as "operation provide comfort"—the Americans have a great habit of changing brand names after the original name is established. As my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson) will be aware, while the situation in respect of the southern no-fly zone is tragic, at least that policy has provided some comfort and help in desperate circumstances.

I want first to deal with Iraq as I want to refer directly to the comments of the right hon. Member for Chesterfield. However, I am mindful that this debate is also about the RAF. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence said, the two subjects are, quite rightly, linked in the debate. I want to address recent events and to draw on my experiences in an earlier incarnation.

We recognise that what we have seen in recent weeks and months is what we saw in the period before the Gulf war broke out. Perhaps tributes should be paid today to former President Bush and former Secretary Baker in respect of the United Nations action in that it was possible to hold together a coalition of such diverse and different countries. At the start of the events, no one would have dreamt that the coalition could have held together in such testing circumstances. It is vital that that coalition should hold together now.

With great respect to my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), the Father of the House, I subscribe to the view of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State and not to that of my right hon. Friend. My evidence is that, while there will always be Arab concern about the risk of civilian casualties and that any response should be proportional and not excessive, there would have been far greater concern if it appeared that the United Nations no longer cared about the insistence on the ceasefire terms, about the determination to impose UN resolutions or about the need to ensure the destruction of the weapons of mass destruction which could have posed a major threat to neighbouring countries had they not been successfully dealt with.

Saddam Hussein is, as we know, an attentive viewer of CNN. He, like everyone else, knew about the transition period and the change of President. He knew what problems that could pose in the American political scene. We clearly passed through an initial period of challenge and trial by Saddam Hussein, and I believe that we have passed that test in an appropriate and responsible way. If Opposition Members disagree with me, they must recognise that the United Nations' objectives, certainly in the short term, appear to have been achieved. The United Nations' inspectors have returned to Iraq and can continue their work.

We must recognise the determination to maintain UN resolutions and we should not underestimate the work of the UN inspectors. I wonder how many hon. Members have obtained from the Library copies of the 16 reports by the UN Secretary-General on the progress of the work of the UN inspectors which is taking place now in Iraq and which we hope will continue.

How many people understand the scale of the work that has been undertaken? We have now established the new plant to incinerate the bulk mustard agent. How many people are aware that we have now commissioned the plant to destroy the two types of nerve agents that have been identified? Incidentally, both those plants were built by Iraq to UN standards.

How many people are aware that those operations will be centralised with supplies brought to Muthanna? It has been estimated that there is 18 months' work in the destruction of mustard and nerve agents. That information provides some idea of the scale of the resources that have been identified.

How many people are aware of what has already been destroyed? Five thousand sarin-filled 122 mm rockets, 350 R400 aerial bombs, and 44,500 litres of nerve agents have been destroyed. Can the House begin to comprehend the scale of that arsenal and the huge importance of the work of the United Nations inspectors?

Mr. Dalyell: This is not meant in an offensive or hostile way. I simply ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, when he occupied the position of Defence Secretary, he had any idea, before hostilities started, of the scale of the exports and their nature.

Mr. King: If the hon. Gentleman is referring to the export of arms, as he knows very well, we imposed the tightest prohibition of any country in the United Nations: no export of arms to Iraq. What we know—and there is no secret about it—is that people were not aware of the extraordinary deviousness and equally extraordinary skill in concealment. It is no secret that some of the chemical manufacturing capability, identical to what is required for agricultural purposes and pesticide manufacture, was disguised as requirements for alternative products; and we also know the sad saga of the supergun. We know to what lengths Saddam Hussein and his procurement operation went to disguise the true purpose of his activities.

Mr. Robathan: My right hon. Friend has given an interesting list of chemical weapons that Iraq possesses. Could he, from the benefit of his previous position, tell the House, particularly Opposition Members, how many chemical weapons the British forces had in Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, and Iraq when we were there two years ago?

Mr. King: We had none, and we would not have had any. This has been our position, as my hon. Friend knows, for very many years.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup has said that we must look to the future. We will not find an answer to these unhappy problems if there is a lack of resolve by the United Nations to stand on ground that is sound and just. We must ensure that we take with us in that stance our friends in the Arab world and maintain the coalition. We must ensure that our response to any challenge or provocation is at all times only proportional to such challenge. There must at no time be any doubt in Saddam Hussein's mind of our resolution in that respect.

Reference has been made—it may or may not be true; we cannot be certain about it—to the conversation between the American ambassador at that time and Saddam Hussein, but if there was any evidence in that respect it would merely serve to underline the crucial importance of there being no misunderstanding or room for doubt in Saddam's mind of our determination.

If we need to give proof of that resolution, does it include the necessity to ensure the security of Kuwait and, leading straight on from that, what does it mean for the location of British forces were we to receive such a request? Contrary to what my right hon. Friend said, if it was perceived that there was an urgent, major and early threat to Kuwait, it would be essential for the United Nations to ensure that forces were available so that there was no open invitation to attack. It was the weakness of Kuwait that encouraged the attack on it. There is no way in which Kuwait on its own could possibly defend itself were there to be a major Iraqi attack.

However—this is perhaps where I take my right hon. Friend with me more—it could only be a very short-term operation. He is right when he says that it is not desirable, either from the point of view of our own forces and the climate and conditions in which they would serve or from the point of view of our Arab friends for Western forces to be present in a different culture, which could and would be exploited by Islamic elements seeking to cause and develop grievances. In that respect, therefore, it is not desirable that our forces should be there on any long-term basis.

My right hon. and learned Friend talked about the Arab League. He will know that there is the Gulf Co-operation Council comprising the six Gulf states. The original proposal, at the end of the Gulf war, was that the council, together with Egypt and Syria, would act jointly to provide forces on the ground. Sadly, that proposal seems to be making no progress at all; the latest newspaper report that I read said that it was dead. If it is dead in respect of the location of Egyptian and Syrian forces, I certainly hope that we can look to our friends in the Gulf in the knowledge that in the final analysis we will be anxious to ensure their independence and liberty. We will want to play our part and do anything we can to help if they suffer outside aggression, but the first burden of responsibility should be carried by them.

Whatever the differences between the individual territories concerned, there is a need for real effort. I say this as someone who very much values his friendships with those in positions of responsibility in all the Gulf states. We should be able to expect in future a greater effort to establish a positive and effective co-operative force against the background of the proof that we have given of our willingness to help in their time of need.

More widely, in respect of the Royal Air Force, my right hon. and learned Friend talked about Britain's defences for the 1990s. We know that there are areas, not least in the number of our infantry regiments, where there is concern about numbers and what would happen if commitments were to build, and that this imposes extra stress; but when we are discussing the issue we must not overlook the fact that our Navy, our Air Force and other branches of our Army are also getting on with the changes which are very painful for them all and which involve major upheaval for many of them. I pay tribute to the progress being made by the RAF in the changes that my right hon. and learned Friend announced, which I think are going forward with general agreement and to the benefit of our country in cost-effective defence and the people involved.

My right hon. and learned Friend is right to pay tribute to the RAF, not just for its work in the no-fly zones but for the work that it is doing on what I suppose is probably the most dangerous flight in the world, going into Sarajevo and out again in a Hercules. I do not know whether any hon. Members have invited themselves for that trip, but I am told that one needs to take certain facilities if one undertakes that extremely dangerous flight. It is showing great courage in their support of the people there, in the work done in Somalia and, above all, in the work that is done, as I know so well, in Northern Ireland. We pay tribute to the courage that it shows day and night.

My right hon. and learned Friend referred to the RAF anniversary which will be upon us shortly. It has had some brave anniversaries. Only recently we celebrated the 50th anniversary of the Battle of Britain. Now we are approaching the 75th anniversary of the Royal Air Force itself. It has served our nation well. I am very proud to pay my tribute to it tonight, a night when we know that the service continues, as it does, in the finest traditions of the past.

6.7 pm

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North-East): As some of us thought was inevitable when the change of business was announced, the debate so far has displayed a concentration on the urgent issues raised by Iraq at the expense of some important, long-term questions which are of particular significance to the Royal Air Force. I hope that Government Front-Bench Members will have appreciated that there is a considerable desire on both sides of the House, if some of the issues of importance to the Royal Air Force cannot be debated this evening, for an early opportunity to be found for such a debate to take place.

I would like to deal with three particular issues which are of direct relevance to the Royal Air Force. The first is the European fighter aircraft, which I understand we must now call the Eurofighter 2000, in order perhaps to meet the sensitivities of Mr. Volker Ruhe. In that regard, I offer my congratulations to the Secretary of State, who unhappily has left us for a moment or two. He deserves great recognition for the skill with which he ensured that the European figher aircraft programme will be maintained.

The military case for the European fighter aircraft as the Secretary of State pointed out, is overwhelming. The employment and technological consequences for the United Kingdom industry are extremely significant. I would add to that the political damage which would have occurred had we had yet another failed European procurement programme. After the failure of the NATO "frigate for the 90s" programme, the whole notion of common procurement would have been dealt a severe blow if the project for the European fighter aircraft had had to be shelved. It was generous of the right hon. and learned Gentleman to acknowledge that, in the difficult negotiations with which he was concerned, his hand was substantially strengthened by the fact that he enjoyed the support of virtually the whole House of Commons.

The second issue to which I shall refer—I suspect that the Minister of State for the Armed Forces will not be surprised—is that of search and rescue facilities. He will know that this is an issue to which I have given some attention over the past three or four years. He will know also that, because of the proposal for the implementation of the new arrangements for search and rescue on 1 April 1993, this may be the last chance that we have to debate the proposals. Finally, he will know that I have a particular constituency interest in this matter because of the location of RAF Leuchars in my constituency and the provision of search and rescue facilities from that station.

I do not wish to rehearse once again all the arguments in favour of the retention of search and rescue facilities at RAF Leuchars, but I think that it is worth reminding the Minister and the House in summary of one or two matters which seem to me, at least, to provide an overwhelming case for the Government to think again.

RAF Leuchars is in the front line of our air defence, as the Secretary of State acknowledged in his speech. It is situated by the sea and there are additional rescue operations because of that. B flight of 22 squadron has an outstanding record of achievements in search and rescue and it is inevitable that, as a result of the arrangements to be implemented from 1 April, the level of cover provided by search and rescue in the area around the station will be substantially reduced.

From an answer that I received yesterday, I ascertained that over the past five years search and rescue operations from RAF Leuchars have rescued 352 civilians and 25 military personnel. Some of those people would have been at risk if the arrangements which are to be put into operation after 1 April had been in operation over the past five years.

Mr. Bill Walker: The hon. and learned Gentleman will understand that during the past few weeks my constituency has taken up what can only be described as an enormous amount of search and rescue helicopters' time. I would like, as I am sure he would, to give credit for the fact that the crews there do far more than their duty requires. In particular, we have been most impressed by what they have done in seeking out and finding all the people stranded as a result of floods and ensuring that no lives were lost.

Mr. Campbell: The hon. Gentleman anticipated two points that I was about to make. First, although he did not say so expressly, by implication he pointed to the enormous public relations value of these operations. He also pointed, perhaps more directly, to the experience of the past fortnight in his part of Scotland and in mine, where the extreme weather, first snow, and then flooding, has meant that the facilities at RAF Leuchars have been constantly employed, and in a way that does considerable credit to those responsible for these operations. This has served to underline just how significant and important is the service at present provided. There really is an opportunity on this occasion for the Government to think again.

I have to say, perhaps in a slightly partisan way, that throughout the 1992 general election Conservative supporters in north-east Fife accused me of scaremongering when I suggested that search and rescue at RAF Leuchars was at risk. The Government have proved me right and their own supporters wrong. It would be in the interest of the community if the Government were to prove me wrong. That is a burden that I would happily assume for the benefit of the community. There is a chance to think again and I hope that the Government will take it.

The third matter which I wish to raise, dealing most directly with the Royal Air Force, is that of the EH101 support helicopter. The Secretary of State referred to the increasingly important notion of our armed forces operating with flexibility. I want to put a series of questions. I suspect that the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs may not be the best person to answer them, but no doubt the Minister of State will write to me in due course in response to what I have to say.

Can the Minister of State tell us why the Government have delayed issuing the invitation to tender for the utility version of the EH101? He knows that on 9 April 1987 the then Secretary of State committed the Government to 25 EH101s. Why has no contract been placed? Is it understood how important such a contract would be for Westland? It must be understood how important the helicopter is for the Royal Air Force. Will the in-service date of 1997 still be met? If not, has there been a change of date and what is the new date?

Having taken the time of the House to deal with some precise matters concerning the Royal Air Force, I turn to the broader question of Iraq.

The Liberal Democratic party has been content to endorse the action that has been taken so far, based on three criteria: first, that the action generally had the agreement of the coalition allies; secondly, that it could be demonstrated to be in accordance with international law; and, thirdly, that minimum force was used. I believe that those criteria were met.

I am unconvinced by some public protestations of doubts by countries which supported in private the action taken, but which now, for domestic purposes, feel it necessary to add their reservations to others.

The test of the action is that it was effective: Iraq backed down. It described its action as a ceasefire—a characteristically misleading definition of an acceptance of obligations under duress, which I suppose might be more accurately described as a surrender to the inevitable. But we would be wrong to think that this was the end of Iraqi provocation. We would be wrong to think that the self-imposed moratorium, no doubt designed to offer some kind of attraction to President Clinton, would necessarily be continued without limit of time.

It is my belief that in due course there wil be further provocation. Therefore, looking forward, as some have already urged in the debate, the question that we must now ask ourselves is how we should deal with such provocation when it arises. The answer to that question depends upon two related considerations: first, what is our long-term policy concerning the region; secondly, what is the nature of the provocation?

It is in the interests of the region, and certainly in the interests of the United Kingdom, that there should be stability in the middle east. If, by some extravagant response to provocation, we were to cause irreparable damage to the middle east peace process, that might be too great a price to pay. The peace talks, however imperfect, are the best way to achieve stability. I shall be critical of Israel in due course, but one has to recognise that the anouncement today of its intention to remove the legal bar against discussions with the Palestine Liberation Organisation must be seen as an encouraging step that may have far-reaching consequences. It should have happened long ago, but it has happened now and it should be applauded and recognised as having the potential to make a substantial contribution.

We also want Saddam Hussein to be replaced by an opposition in Iraq. If, by over-zealous responses to provocation, we make him stronger, that will hardly serve our interests or that objective. Not every provocation requires a response and not every response needs to be a military one. If force is the only way, we must be prepared to use it, but only when we are satisfied that there is no other way.

Nor should we believe that legal justification is always adequate in itself. Legally justifiable action is all the more acceptable when it carries with it moral authority. Public opinion in the streets of Arab capital cities is unlikely to be impressed by the niceties of that least empirical of disciplines, international law.

There has been much discussion of double standards. When we talk about double standards we should impose on ourselves some clear thinking. Not all United Nations resolutions are the same either in their terms or in the action which they authorise. It is facile to say that every solution should be enforced in the same way. Inevitably, there will be resolutions which, by their language, are variable in their strength.

The strength of our political commitment to all resolutions should never be variable. Once passed, all resolutions deserve, even demand, the same political will for their enforcement. Some say that, because we are not displaying the same political will over resolutions relating to Bosnia or the Palestinians, we should not enforce resolutions relating to Iraq. That argument is fundamentally flawed. The proper position to adopt is to say that all resolutions will be enforced with the same political will. That is the only way in which to eliminate double standards.

A moment ago, I said that I would be critical of Israel, and this is the moment when I propose to be so. It is monstrous that, some weeks after the illegal expulsion of about 400 Palestinians, those people are still languishing in no man's land between Lebanon and Israel. That is a clear breach of article 49 of the fourth Geneva convention and of international law, and we should use every means in our power to persuade Israel, which is responsible for expelling those men to that place, to take them back.

Mr. Galloway: Even by bombing?

Mr. Campbell: It is unlikely that the United Nations has the will to enforce the resolution by bombing. If the hon. Member thinks that bombing is a way of persuading Israel to be reasonable, he has a curious appreciation of the mentality of the Government of Israel, although they are a changed Government.

Mr. Galloway: The hon. and learned Gentleman knows that I have the greatest respect for him. He is right: Israel would not see sense if it were bombed. Why then would he expect Iraq to see sense if it were bombed?

Mr. Campbell: The hon. Gentleman falls into the trap of assuming that each situation is parallel to any other. With regard to Iraq, we have a series of United Nations resolutions which Saddam Hussein has deliberately avoided. We have used the force which the resolutions authorised. No force is authorised in the resolutions with regard to Israel.

When the United States said that it might not provide the £10 billion guarantee for settlement on the west bank, the Government of Israel found themselves driven to a more amenable posture than they had previously taken. We should use every means available. I do not believe that bombing Israel would make the slightest difference. Other means are available, including making strenuous efforts to persuade the United States that the extent to which it remains a patron and Israel a client has substantial disadvantages for the momentum of the peace process in the middle east.

Mr. Winnick: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Campbell: I should like to make progress, if the hon. Member will allow me to do so.

The right hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King) referred to the Gulf Co-operation Council and the Damascus agreement. It must be a matter of considerable regret that that agreement has not produced the sort of security arrangements for the Gulf which it was hoped it would produce.

It is a matter of disappointment for those of us who have talked to officials of the Gulf Co-operation Council that there remains, I suppose one might say, old mistrust among the members to the extent that they are unable to put together a proper system of security for their protection. For that reason, if we were asked by the United Nations to send troops to Kuwait on a specific mandate and for a specific purpose, I would certainly be willing to consider that. Frankly, to suggest that it should not be considered in all circumstances is to close down far in advance a policy option which it might be extremely valuable to take up. As long as such a request is consistent with United Nations resolutions and as long as a limited purpose will be achieved, it certainly should not be rejected out of hand.

To those who say that we should not have taken the action which we did in expelling Iraq from Kuwait, or indeed the action of the past few days, some questions must be addressed. Who among us now believes, if anyone seriously did, that sanctions would have forced Iraq out of Kuwait? Who believes that the so-called ceasefire would have been called without the experience of military action and the threat of more?

I am wholly convinced that, without the military effort of the allies during the Gulf war, Iraq would still be squatting illegally in Kuwait. I am equally convinced that, without the air exclusion zones, the Kurdish people in the north and the Shia Muslims in the south would be under air attack at the whim of Saddam Hussein.

When one is asked to assess Saddam Hussein's character, one need not embark on the sort of exchanges in which Privy Councillors who have previously spoken have had the privilege to take part. The House should remember that Saddam Hussein used chemical weapons against his countrymen and women. If one wants a measure of the man's character, one will find it in that single incident. It is often said that Saddam Hussein is consistently guilty of miscalculations. That is almost certainly true. However, the difference between him and us is that he can afford miscalculations and we cannot. His authority is undamaged by miscalculation whereas that of the United Nations may well be.

As a new President of the United States takes over, we must face the truth—uncomfortable to some—that the authority of the United Nations depends on the commitment of the United States. The military resources of the United States are so significant that only when it agrees to act is the United Nations likely to be able to act on a large scale. The conundrum which must be solved is how to prevent the dominant member, without whom action is unlikely, from being the party which alone determines that action should be taken. The United Kingdom would do much for the future of the United Nations if it helped to resolve that conundrum by its insistence that every member, however powerful, must be subordinate to the collective will of that organisation.

It was reported yesterday that, in a speech at the Royal United Services Institute, the Secretary of State said that we should not commit military forces in circumstances where there is no military solution. I agree with that proposition, which is self-evidently valid. However, we should never commit military forces unless there is a clear political objective. That principle applies not only to operations conducted by the United Kingdom on its own, but with equal validity to any operations that we may undertake in the future on behalf of the United Nations.

Mr. David Howell (Guildford): I pay tribute to the robust and sensible speeches which we heard from the Opposition and Government Front Benches at the beginning of the debate and the excellent speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King), the former Secretary of State for Defence. My right hon. Friend spoke with great experience and authority.

Many of the comments made by hon. Members reinforced my absolutely unambiguous conviction and view, which I have held on and off over the past two or three years, that the response to Saddam Hussein and Iraq's activities has been absolutely right. The response was proportionate and, indeed, was the only conceivable language that the gang in Baghdad or, indeed, the entire Arab world would have begun to understand. As my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has said, a weaker response would have been the most terrible come-on signal for more violence and atrocities, so the response was absolutely right.

I do not accept the view of some hon. Members that the response has strengthened Saddam Hussein. For a start, he is living in a world in which he orders his own strength or weakness through propaganda or terror. He does not need the benefit of manipulating popular opinion; he can manage without that. Any opinion which is not popular in his book is instantly exterminated.

I accept the view, reported in The Times, of senior Kurdish leaders. They argue "that any respite in their attacks against him would provide 'a lifeline to a sinking man'."

I greatly respect the Kurds; they are noble people. The Kurds said that the bombing had not strengthened Saddam Hussein and that we should not desist from such attacks. The right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) said that we should desist from bombing and that the Kurds were against it. I do not always believe that I read in The Times, but in this case I prefer The Times to the right hon. Member for Chesterfield. I believe that The Times correctly reported the view of the Kurdish forces.

I do not believe that the action taken in the Gulf was a Bush vendetta. The media had a lovely time depicting it as such. The American part of the action was American policy; but, of course, it was more than that: it was coalition allied policy. It was the policy of the United Nations backed by Boutros Boutros Ghali. It was a policy to ensure that a string of United Nations Security Council resolutions, from 660 to 688, were enforced. Resolution 678 referred to stability in the region. That is an important commitment behind which the United Nations rightly puts its weight. We should support the United Nations in that commitment.

All the resolutions are the policies of the member nations of the United Nations, including the United States. I do not believe that those policies will change much except that perhaps greater reinforcement and a clearer long-term context will be provided under President Clinton that we have seen in recent days. Therefore, I do not accept the myth of a Bush-Saddam vendetta: it is the manufacture of the press. It may be good reading and good entertainment, but it has no basis in reality.

The idea that constructive dialogue was the alternative to the raids and our firm response to Saddam's provocation takes my breath away. Luckily, that idea has not been mentioned much this afternoon. The idea that one could have a constructive dialogue with that genocidal maniac and his gang is absurd. People talk about them as a Government, but they govern only a small part of the country which they terrorise. The idea that it is possible to have a constructive dialogue with the sort of person who lies and lies again is even more absurd than the idea that it is possible to have a constructive dialogue with Al Capone.

I am deeply convinced that the actions taken by the United Nations and the western allies were correct and in balance. But, of course, more is needed, as other hon. Members have said. We cannot live in the short-term context of tit for tat, however right our response has been. We cannot continue leaving the initiative to this dangerous man, with his vicious habits and dangerous Government, and his Tikriti gang in Baghdad because, first, as others have rightly said, he would do it again next week. Why should he not? He will agree to something this week and be at it again as soon as he sees the chance. Secondly, the fundamental threats remain to, first, the authority of the United Nations, which is serious, and, secondly, in even more precise terms, Kuwait and through Kuwait, Saudi Arabia.

There is the oil issue. I have never thought that we should be ashamed of admitting that a threat to the world's oil reserves is serious. If applied, it could freeze the lives and bring untold suffering to millions of vulnerable people. Why should we not stand up and say that the threat should be minimised?

The threat to Kuwait remains. I am sure that Saddam Hussein is longing to have another go at Kuwait. It probably passed through his mind the other night that as George Bush went he might be able to have another go. I suspect that the only thing that stopped him was the superior air power in the region: 1,000 American marines have been put into the area and there is a great deal of equipment there.

Saddam Hussein remains a threat to the area and to middle eastern stability. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary said that the Arab-Israeli dispute was a poison which infected the entire middle east. Saddam Hussein's Government and policy, the hideous aggression of this man who happens to be in control of Iraq, are a poison which infects the whole middle east. It will remain a poison until we find sensible strategic ways of taking and retaining the initiative and applying it so that the poison is squeezed out.

One is always tempted into arguments about standards and about what we should do in the Arab-Israeli case. Of course, there are things to be done and there is blame on both sides. I only note en passant that at least the wretched people who were deported by the Israelis were allowed to go through some judicial process of appeal. I cannot remember reading about an appeal against any decision or law that Saddam Hussein has made. When one talks about double standards, one should be a little careful.

Saddam Hussein is one of the chief poisons infecting the area and we must turn our minds to considering how to squeeze it out. My view is not a new view; it is not hindsight. It is a view that I have expressed ever since the Schwarzkopf ceasefire at the end of the Gulf war. If we did not intend to go on to Baghdad, as some people advocated —I thought that it was impractical—and if we sought a full-blooded military solution to the Iraqi problem at the end of the Gulf war, we should have switched the emphasis to not simply giving up and going home but developing a sustained diplomatic, economic and political strategy worldwide embracing and supporting the many Arab interests who are desperate to see Saddam Hussein out of the way. Such a strategy should have been swung into position and pushed on so that all the time the pressure was on Saddam and Baghdad, rather than him applying pressure on us.

That is why I always wanted stronger help to be given to the Kurds. We have given some, but we should give more. We could have learnt the lessons about the degree of help and its operation from Afghanistan, where successful help was given at one stage to the Mujaheddin. I always wanted us to give more words—or perhaps even more than words—of support to the Kurds. I wanted us to give practical help such as that urged on the House by my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson) following her visits to the area. She brought to our attention the cause of the Shi'ite Arabs in the marshes. I always wanted that cause to be supported much more strongly by the Government. I continue to want much more sympathetic support to be given to the Iraqi opposition forces, in London, Washington and other capitals, and, if possible, inside Iraq. Of course, such people live dangerously in Iraq. The regime is nothing other than complete tyranny.

I always wanted us to have a much more vigorous approach to the Iraqi funds which are sloshing around and helping to finance the continuation of Saddam's regime. We could play a much stronger part there. We could raise a far more criticial voice in the United Nations about Saddam's gang. People may remember that in South Africa the minority apartheid Government were given the boot because they persecuted, through terror and other means, the vast majority of the South African people.

In Iraq the colour element may not exist but the rest fits uncannily. A minority is persecuting the majority of the peoples of modern Iraq by the most monstrous methods, which have been described graphically by hon. Members this evening.

The measures to which I have referred are the necessary minimum to seize the initiative. Additional measures may well have to be considered. We shall have to consider reinforcements in Kuwait, whether of our own troops or others. Certainly the mood is that more reinforcements are needed for the 1,000 American marines in Kuwait. Reinforcements could be either with United Nations blessing or directly provided by United Nations troops. There is no doubt that Saddam will try again.

Some CIA experts and some people here put forward the thesis that the conflict is all about the balance of power in the middle east. They suggest that removal of Saddam would tip the balance hopelessly in favour of Iran. Iran has by no means a pleasant attitude to stability in the middle east. It may well cause a great deal of trouble. Therefore, people say that we should keep a weak Saddam. That is a complete misreading of the position.

Saddam's rule of Iraq means that it is not an adequate balance to whatever the ayatollahs are planning for the future or any malign Islamic fundamentalist moves which may be orchestrated from Tehran. So long as Saddam is there, the balance is unequal. We need a democratic, strong Iraq which would be a counter-balance for Iran. That would create the balance in the middle east which is probably the best that we can hope for.

People talk too idealistically about a new order in the middle east. There will never be order, but there could be balance. There could be an equilibrium, as the French call it, just as there could be a new world balance. I do not accept the phrase "new world order" that President Clinton still uses. We could work to achieve a balance by having a democratic, strong Iraq.

The Shi'ite Arabs in the marshes are not pro the Tehran ayatollahs. They are not secret agents of Iran, as some analysts seem to think. They are perfectly ready to work in a federal, democratic Iraq. So are the Kurds. There is not at present, and I do not believe that there will be, a great movement for a separate Kurdistan which would undermine Turkish and Iranian stability. Instead, there is a readiness to recognise that a democratic Iraq would provide a balance for any ambitions of Iran and much better hope for balance in the Gulf as a whole.

As for the Arab opinion which is always drummed up on these occasions as being against doing anything too harsh to Saddam Hussein, I know where such views come from, but I question their strength and solidity. There are always people in Amman, Jordan who are ready to dance in front of televison cameras waving placards and prompting the BBC man to put through a report about pro-Saddam feeling in the Arab world. There are street demonstrations in Cairo, but there are also wise, moderate Arabs of great experience who know that the prime hope for stability in their region is to get rid of Saddam Hussein and his gang and that hideous method of rule—if it can be called rule—in modern Iraq.

As long as the Saddam Hussein gang and its terror methods rule in Iraq, and as long as Iraq's policy is one of open, opportunist aggression, there will be no lasting peace for Iraq in the middle east. We have to start by recognising that and mobilising our own efforts and those of all Security Council allies—not just the permanent ones —to ensure that we seize and hold the initiative against a man and a system which will otherwise bring even more suffering, killing and bloodshed to a benighted land which deserves better.

Mr. Ernie Ross (Dundee, West): My hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) made it quite clear that we expect a great deal more from the Foreign Secretary when he replies to the debate than what we have heard so far. As my hon. Friend said, this week we have been calling for more than simply a reaffirmation of United Nations Security Council resolutions that are now about two years old. We are asking whether the Government have a strategy in line with the widespread belief that Saddam Hussein intends to continue testing the potential for creating disharmony among the original allies that threw him out of Kuwait.

To that end we hope that the Foreign Secretary can explain not simply how the Government intend to react to individual incidents, but what medium and long-term strategy exists for ensuring that the resolutions can produce a successful conclusion so that the people of Iraq can decide what will happen to their country and its present leadership.

If we are looking for ways in which we can build the new order to which everyone has referred, we could do no better than refer to a document prepared by the Secretary-General of the United Nations on 17 June 1992, entitled "Agenda for Peace". Paragraph 82 of that document refers to the role, the understanding and perception of the United Nations within the new world order in the absence of the super-power conflict that previously decided whether a group of people in any particular part of the world were goodies or baddies and whether or not they were on our side. Paragraph 82 states:

"All organs of the United Nations must be accorded, and play, their full and proper role so that the trust of all nations and peoples will be retained and deserved. The principles of the Charter must be applied consistently, not selectively, for if the perception should be of the latter, trust will wane and with it the moral authority which is the greatest and most unique quality of that instrument."

Tonight's debate should take place around that paragraph.

When we talk about the use of force in the name of the international community, it is not enough to be able to justify it; it needs an explicit mandate from that international community. We cannot assume it, and, if we do not think that we will get it, we cannot engage in the use of force in the name of anyone other than ourselves—and then we have to take full responsibility for our actions.

The use of force must always be the last resort and everyone must be convinced that it is absolutely and unequivocally necessary, rather than there being a question of whether it can be justified. It is worth considering why people have started to question whether we had that right within the resolutions that have been traded back and forth across the Chamber tonight.

In an article, Sir Anthony Parsons referred to the fact that, until the decision to implement the no-fly zone in the north of Iraq, the United Nations had never breached article 2(7) of its own charter which "defines the rights and obligations of member states, and sub-paragraph 7 categorically excludes UN intervention in domestic affairs of state."

We can all recall incident of dictators treating their people in an unacceptable way when we felt that something should have been done. However, because of its charter, the United Nations had never sought to interfere until the adoption of resolution 688. Sir Anthony Parsons wrote:

"The adoption of Security Council Resolution 688 in April 1991 was a watershed".

He referred to the language that was used:

"SCR 688 condemned the repression, demanded its cessation and insisted that Iraq allow access to international humanitarian organisations . . . strong language for a resolution, even on an international crisis.

The American-led coalition used force in the spirit of the resolution to establish and maintain Saddam-free safe havens in northern Iraq and, a few weeks ago, a 'no-fly zone' was established in the South to prevent the Iraqi air force from attacking the populace."

Someone as knowledgeable as Sir Anthony Parsons was acknowledging that it was a unique situation. When people begin to question just how far we should go, they must examine the way in which we seek to implement international law and United Nations resolutions.

As a result of recent events, Britain is faced with real concern that in one part of the middle east it is justifying actions which stray beyond the boundaries of what is mandated by law and Security Council resolutions and which may therefore be unlawful, while elsewhere it has obviously strayed in the opposite direction, away from implementing what is clearly required by law and mandated by the Security Council. It is a matter of principle. In political terms, those concensuses translate into a serious break-up of international credibility on the states undertaking enforcement action against Iraq. Selective implementation of the law undermines respect for the law and ultimately risks denying us the ability to rely on law in the future.

When Britain insists on the need to enforce international law and establish the authority of Security Council resolutions taken in pursuit of the Council's duties according to the United Nations charter, it is important to remember the universality of those principles. Damaging comparisons are bound to be made when the peoples of the middle east compare Britain's insistence that Iraq comply immediately and unconditionally with its international legal obligations and the Security Council resolutions with the limits that it sets on what it is prepared to do in the face of the refusal of successive Israeli Governments for more than two decades to comply with their international legal obligations and with Security Council resolutions on their conduct in the occupied Palestinian territories.

Under successive Israeli Governments, Lebanese territorial integrity has been violated time and again, including by a full-scale invasion that still exists in the form of the Israeli occupation of part of south Lebanon. Explicitly expansionist policies have been declared and implemented in the occupied Palestinian territories and the victims of those unlawful practices have been left to fend for themselves. Apart from clear declarations of opposition and condemnation, Britain has not lifted one finger in their defence.

In the two years since the Gulf war ceasefire there has been no change in the Israeli authorities' refusal to accept and to comply with their legal obligations, nor has Israel witnessed any consequences for its continued misconduct which have been sufficiently meaningful or resolute to make it comply.

The British Government, along with their European Community partners, have concentrated on supporting efforts in the middle east peace process, efforts that have enjoyed cross-party support in the House. Everyone knows that the Palestinian people's realisation of full civil and political rights can come only through an end to the occupation and the full exercise of their right to self-determination.

However, is that peace process sustainable in the face of the lack of protection for the existing rights of Palestinians, under the law governing belligerent occupation? Can the Secretary of State honestly expect the leader of the Palestinian delegation, who lives in Gaza, to go to the next round of the middle east peace talks while his neighbours are sleeping in tents somewhere between Israel and Lebanon and we are doing nothing about it? How long does the Secretary of State think that he would last if he went to those talks and then tried to return to his home in Gaza? It is absolute nonsense.

[Mr. Ernie Ross]

All those members of the world community who are concerned about ensuring that there is a new world order must question the way in which the coalition has decided that it is worth insisting on immediate and unequivocal compliance with UN resolutions in one area, while allowing them to be ignored in the other parts of the world that my colleagues have mentioned tonight and in the debate on the United Nations a few weeks ago. For example, it seems that it is okay for Cambodia to ignore them. If we continue to ignore grave breaches of such resolutions, as and when they occur, it will not help those of us who want to strengthen the United Nations.

Does not the Secretary of State think that the fact that nine children have been killed in the occupied territories by live ammunition and 194 seriously injured since 1 December 1992, is a grave breach of United Nations regulations? Does he regard that as a grave breach of international law? How quickly will he hurry along to ensure that that ends? Will he be as determined to ensure that that ends as quickly as possible?

Britain is confronting a serious problem. If we do not do something about the grave breaches of United Nations resolutions in other parts of the world, international law is likely to be brought into disrepute, and when we are forced to return to the United Nations it will be difficult to get the sort of consensus that we might require.

Sir Anthony Parsons also wrote in that article that Russia and China abstained on resolution 688 because they were worried that it was being used in a way that broke article 2, clause 7 of the United Nations charter. If we are to build a new framework and to construct a new world order we need the support of China and Russia.

If we cannot demonstrate that we are going to be even-handed, in the longer term the comparison between Britain's standing and resolve in different cases in the same region will damage perceptions of British intentions and credibility. It will also damage the credibility of the Security Council and the belief that it will carry out its functions, as set down in the United Nations charter. International law will be brought into disrepute. Such damage risks setting the scene for future consequences and additional costs and burdens, which the politicians of the future—including ourselves—will have to deal with.

The principles of the United Nations charter must be implemented consistently. In all instances they demand that the strong must protect the weak and that action must be taken to save life and to uphold the rights of human beings, under international law, to basic human rights and to an existence free of persecution and threat to life. If we can achieve that, the United Nations will convince many people that it is a force to be reckoned with—an expanding force that can mould and create a new world order—and that it can benefit the world through the removal of many dark and evil influences. More importantly, perhaps, all the peoples of the world can start to believe in the United Nations.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey and Waterside): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross), as I did the last time that I spoke in a debate, which was on the United Nations. Once more, I find myself in accord with much of what he has said. In foreign affairs, it is nice to think in terms of a long-term strategy and many other hon. Members have referred to that need. The problem is that events often force one into short-term tactics—tactics that can appear to be totally inconsistent with the long-term strategy, which must be to preserve peace. Short-term tactics so often mean fighting.

It is also a pleasure to follow the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell). He and I are the only two members of the Defence Select Committee in the Chamber for this debate. Through you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I think that it might be worth sending a small complaint to the business managers because they must have known that the Defence Committee would be in Brussels today and yesterday, visiting Supreme Headquarters Allied Powers Europe and NATO headquarters. Had they known that, perhaps the debate could have been timed for another day. I hope that Committee members may be coming through the door at any moment, if their aeroplane is not late, and that if they are back in time they may succeed in catching your eye as I know that that is their wish.

When we last debated the Royal Air Force, in May 1991, we had successfully concluded the Gulf war—or Operation Granby as it was known—and that became the main theme of our debate. However, we are back in the Gulf again. The reason is simple—on that occasion we did not finish the job and Saddam Hussein is still flouting United Nations Security Council reolutions.

Under those resolutions, the coalition forces were fully justified in taking the military action that they took and, as we have seen, that action has worked and the United Nation inspectors are once more being allowed back into the country to carry out their flights and inspections.

I am sure that international lawyers will have a field day on the legal grounds for the attacks of recent days, but I believe that the five United Nations Security Council resolutions gave more than adequate authority for them and that has been confirmed by the United Nations Secretary-General, Mr. Boutros Boutros Ghali. If he says that the action was justified and legal that is good enough for me and, as the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) pointed out, he not only said that last August but has said so again since the military action took place.

We all want Saddam Hussein to be toppled politically and not militarily. It is significant that he tried it on once more recently and two factors brought that about. First, sanctions are beginning to bite and again he is facing considerable domestic unrest. Obviously, mounting such an excursion was one way to divert the attention of his people from domestic problems. Secondly, he obviously saw a hiatus in United States' foreign policy with the torch of presidential leadership being passed from President Bush to President Clinton. I think that the House will welcome President Clinton's robust confirmation of President Bush's line on Iraq and the excellent statements that he has made on the subject.

We cannot allow Saddam Hussein to ignore world opinion and, first, continue to break the terms of the ceasefire following the Kuwait war; secondly, to continue his incursions into Kuwait; thirdly, to continue his acts of genocide against his own people—the Kurds in the north and the Shi'ite population in the south; and, lastly, to persist with his plans for chemical warfare and a nuclear capability.

What would happen if Saddam Hussein were toppled? Many hon. Members have speculated that his successor might be worse. I do not think that a successor could be worse than Saddam Hussein. Some hon. Members have drawn a comparison between Saddam Hussein and the late President Nasser of Egypt. There is no comparison. As history has shown, Nasser was a completely different character. Even at the time of the Suez canal crisis, most of those who were involved—and I was involved militarily—recognised in Colonel Nasser a formidable and reasonably just opponent.

Saddam Hussein is in a different class altogether. He has no friends—or very few—in his own country. His army is divided. Even the Republican Guard, which was always regarded as his praetorian guard, is about 100 miles from Baghdad and is not allowed to go anywhere near the city. Saddam Hussein has some cohorts—about 70,000 men in all—who guard him. I am told that he never sleeps two nights in the same bed. He is a hunted man, and sooner or later he will be toppled.

It does not matter who succeeds him. It might be a colonel, or it might be a civilian. In any case, the situation in Baghdad could not be worse than it is at present. Some people have speculated that the successor might be a Baathist politician. If so, I do not think that that would matter. What the Iraqi people require is peace and stability and the opportunity to rebuild their totally shattered economy.

Since our last debate on the Royal Air Force, we have had two years of tension and conflict, which have tested the new basis of our armed forces to be more flexible, more mobile and "smaller, but better". Now that the United Nations is able, because of the absence of the former Soviet Bloc veto, to fulfil the role for which it was created in 1945, there is more for the organisation to do militarily in support of the implementation of United Nations resolutions by way of the peacemaking, peacekeeping and peace-building that are set out in the Secretary-General's "Agenda for Peace", which is essential reading for every politician.

From being primarily guard forces in Europe, our Army, Navy and Air Force must change to multi-purpose, rapid reaction forces able to go anywhere and do anything at short notice. That is our principal role in NATO. The new operational roles of our armed forces call for both new formations and new equipment. The Royal Air Force is getting some of the new equipment it needs.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence fought very hard, long and successfully to safeguard the future of EFA—now renamed the Eurofighter 2000. The House is relieved that the key performance parameters of EFA will be retained in the new project and will still result in a saving of about 14 per cent. of the overall cost. This has been achieved by a change in the arrangements for work sharing and production, as recommended by the Select Committee on Defence during the last session of Parliament. If a saving of 14 per cent. in unit costs is possible in this case, can the Secretary of State for Defence—I do not expect the Foreign Secretary to answer this question—say what scope there is for achieving a similar saving in other collaborative projects?

I should like an assurance that the RAF will get the complete aircraft, including equipment, that it needs, and not just the airframe. This is particularly important for the defensive aid sub-system—'DASS' for short—which is the electronic hardware, as well as the software, without which aircraft would be defenceless. I should like confirmation that there will be no downgrading of this aircraft, and no risk of delay in delivery, which has already slipped to the year 2000. That delay provides more time for the development of the offensive systems with which the aircraft will be equipped.

I refer, of course, to the air-to air missiles. Any aircraft is only as good as the missiles that it carries. Since 1980 we have been trying to develop an advanced short-range air-to-air missile—'ASRAAM' for short. This was originally part of the family of weapons for which there was a memorandum of understanding between the United States on the one hand and the United Kingdom, France and Germany—later joined by Norway and Canada—on the other. The United States was going to build the medium-range missile, and the European consortium the short-range missile, but I am afraid that that family has fallen apart.

Mr. Menzies-Campbell: Divorced.

Mr. Colvin: Exactly—divorced.

Canada and Norway pulled out, and the whole thing has fallen to pieces. On ASRAAM, the United Kingdom now has to go it alone. I am glad to say that last March British Aerospace signed a contract for its development. There is some advantage in having missiles—or any system, for that matter—made by the manufacturer that makes the airframe, as that ensures good integration.

There are a number of questions to which I and, I am sure, other members of the Select Committee on Defence would like to receive written answers from the Secretary of State for Defence. What is the current time scale of ASRAAM? We are worried about slippage. Will it be ready for the Eurofighter 2000 when it enters service in the year 2000? Will the unit costs be the same as those we have been give so far? What is the current thinking on the question of fitting ASRAAM to the Tornado air defence variant? Will the United States buy it, as was originally decided, or will the Sidewinder missile, at present used to equip American and British aircraft, be upgraded? What is the latest on AMRAAM, the advanced medium-range air-to-air missile that the Americans are developing?

I should like to turn for a moment to the question of support helicopters. It is almost six years since the then Secretary of State for Defence announced:

> "After a comprehensive review of the requirement for support helicopters in all roles, . . . the right choice is to introduce the utility EH101 to meet that role requirement."

That decision was based primarily on suitability for the role but also on commonality with Merlin, the naval version of the EH101, 44 of which are already ordered for the Royal Navy. Since Lord Younger's announcement the case for the EH101 utility support helicopter has become even stronger. It has a long range, and the support costs are low, making it the undisputed choice.

But the Ministry of Defence stil revisits some of the old options, using up vast staff resources and wasting a great deal of time and money. The Ministry is currently looking at four options, all of which were available in 1987, when Lord Younger made his decision. The EH101 can lift all the loads that the Army has to handle; it has a range of about 600 miles; and it can be in service by, I think, 1996. An alternative is to buy the French Cougar, which is an updated Puma, or the American Black Hawk, both of which are smaller, have inadequate lift, do not have a ramp for loading vehicles, carry only about 12 to 14 men, and have a short range of 280 to 350 miles, which is half the range of the EH101. They would not be available any sooner than the EH101, in 1996.

Or the RAF could buy more Chinooks, with which it is equipped at present. It is a 1960s design and an expensive helicopter to run. The Ministry of Defence keeps saying that life costs are more important than purchase prices.

The last option is buying second-hand Pumas. That, too, is a 30-year old design, also expensive to run with a low lift capability, short range and unsuitable for today's operational requirements. It might be tempting to buy 16 or 20 second-hand civil Pumas, especially——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. I am afraid that the hon. Member is the first to be caught in the 10-minute trap.

7.10 pm

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): I am sorry that the hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) was caught in the time trap, but I am pleased to speak following him because his speech brought us back to the subject of the Royal Air Force.

I was pleased when last week a debate on the RAF was announced, but disappointed when we had the proposal of this mongrel debate, which is already proving grossly unsatisfactory. It may be interesting, but the House cannot subject the RAF to the careful scrutiny that it deserves and at the same time range widely over the whole of the middle east and a large part of the history of the 20th century.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) said when referring to the role of the RAF in Persia just after the first world war, if it had not been for Lord Trenchard, it is highly unlikely that the RAF would have had an independent existence. Lord Trenchard played the card of being able to police that part of the world cheaply—with a couple of squadrons of biplanes —but had he not been able to offer that economic card, the RAF might have ceased to exist at least until the second world war.

There is that historical link, but it does not justify the House having to spend so much of the debate looking at historical matters when this is the first debate on the RAF that we have had since 1991, apart from a grossly unsatisfactory debate last year when, in discussing RAF discipline, I tried to extend the discussion by arguing that morale should extend beyond immediate questions of discipline. But for that, the only consideration that the House would have given to the RAF in two years would have been to discuss whether homosexuals should be allowed to participate in the service. At this time of enormous change and challenge, the House should consider more frequently and fully than is possible in today's debate the problems faced by the RAF.

I welcomed the comments of the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell). I strongly support the United Nations and believe that there must be international authority. The mockery to which the United Nations has been subjected night after night on Iraqi television, the derision of United Nations officers that has been displayed on our television screens and the action of Saddam Hussein in response to his minorities has been such that the no-fly zones are justified, and trespass into them justifies military action.

Even so, I have anxieties about the situation. We had to support the United Nations action because we could not allow the United Nations to go the way of the League of Nations by failing to respond positively to aggression and brutality of the kind that we witnessed from Saddam Hussein. Those who do not want the United Nations to act toughly are likely to surrender to the international gangster, and there is no doubt that Saddam Hussein is such a man.

But the United Nations cannot and must not be seen as a puppet of the United States. We cannot see foreign policy dictated, as it has been in recent days, by the last hurrahs of a departing president. We were right, and I would not wish the Tornado pilots who flew missions in the Gulf to feel that they were not acting in this country's interest. They were. They were acting in the interests of responsibility and peace and in the hope of an international order which, we trust, eventually a mature world will seek to develop. But if the United Nations is to be a logical and intelligent force which secures international peace and stability, it cannot rely purely on America with contributions from France and ourselves.

After the Gulf war—I have spoken of this before, but it remains relevant—there was a debate in the Western European Union, where I lead my party's delegation, being vice-chairman of the socialist group, in which the two British members who spoke, a Conservative and myself, were the last to speak.

Throughout the debate, one speaker after another from other member states made triumphalist speeches expressing great pride over the wonderful victory that had been achieved in the Gulf. I became extremely unpopular in that parliamentary assembly because, when it came my turn to speak, I pointed out that I condemned Saddam Hussein and strongly supported the war that we had waged against him but thought it sad that most of western Europe had sent more parliamentarians to speak in that debate than they had sent troops or personnel to serve in the UN force. If the UN is to mean anything in the years to come, it must have a broader base, and it must not be seen as a puppet of America. I leave the matter there because I am anxious to speak about the RAF.

I have some serious concerns about the RAF. I am aware of their serious nature because I have had the good fortune, with the hon. Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes), to spend much of the last 12 months with the RAF. It has been interesting, demanding, fascinating and, by and large because of the courtesy and consideration that we have received, enjoyable. It has been demanding because the hon. Gentleman and I have been engaged in a high learning curve. One of my proud achievements was that I was not air sick throughout the 12 months.

We learned a great deal. For example, we learnt how great is the dedication in the service. There are superb skills, on the ground and in the air. But there are also a great many anxieties in the service, and I regret to say that the Minister did not allay those anxieties today. Hon. Members may recall that I intervened in the Minister's speech when he was speaking about the need for the European fighter aircraft. It is an essential aircraft. But the RAF also has other, immediate, needs, as the hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside pointed out.

The Hercules is a fine aircraft, flown by superb crews, but it is old and every year more requirements and duties are placed on the people at Lyneham who service and fly it. It is now in Yugoslavia, Ethiopia and the Gulf, and perhaps it flies to Turkey to help service the Jaguar detachment there. Enormous demands are being made on that old aircraft. It cannot go on accepting more burdens at the behest of Ministers without at some point serious consideration being given to its replacement.

I flew with the RAF around south Armagh in a Puma. As the hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside said, the Pumas are old, and they, too, have been subjected to enormous use. The helicopters there represent a highly prestigious weapon from the point of view of the terrorists of Ulster, and the crews flying them are courageous and capable. But must they always have to expect to fly ancient aircraft? It is true, as the Minister will no doubt say, that they are well maintained. That is because the RAF provides—rather, it has up to now provided—extremely skilled training. It has people on the ground who are extremely skilful.

The hon. Member for Harlow and I met NCOs—not officers—who had specialised in areas of avionics and engineering far beyond my capacity to begin to comprehend. The Member for Harlow and I have met NCOs, not officers, who have patents out in areas of avionics and engineering that are far beyond my capacity even to begin to comprehend. We met two chief technicians, with two separate patents, in one hangar in one RAF station in Germany, Bruggen, the home of the surviving Tornado squadrons. As the Minister said, the reward of the Tornado GR1 squadrons after the Gulf war in half the cases was disbandment.

The question of training is important. Is quality to be retained or will the RAF have increasingly to rely on private contractors who work from nine to five, who may not be investing at all in training because they are relying on recruiting people who are retiring from the services with a pension. In some cases they are not spending anything on training at all. What does that mean for the future? Perhaps I may make this one final point and then hope that I can speak in another debate on the RAF.

My final point is about career prospects. Young, highly skilled people do not know what their future is. If we are to contribute to the exercise of international authority in any part of the world, training is important——

Sir Jim Spicer (Dorset, West): There is a very old military adage: know your enemy. Most people will accept that Saddam Hussein is our enemy—not only our enemy, but the enemy of the west, of the Arab world and, above all, of his own people. I have not had an opportunity recently of meeting Saddam Hussein, as have some right hon. Members, but I remember meeting him in 1988 at the time of the last major offensive which the Iranians were launching against Iraq. I looked forward to that visit and I went into Baghdad as the Iranian rockets were raining down. I went to see him. I looked at his troops and I looked at him and I was, at that point, totally on his side because, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) has said, at that time, most people in this country considered Saddam Hussein to be someone we needed to support in any way that we could. I was saddened when I went in to see him. I went in with only one friend, Count Jean de Lipkoski. He greeted this marvellous Frenchman with open arms and said, "How splendid you French have been. The supply of weapons you have given us is superb. We could not do without the French and the Russians."

Then he turned to me and launched a most vitrolic attack on the United Kingdom and said how useless we were and that we never supplied Iraq with any weapons. Indeed, he said that we were supplying the Iranians with weapons. I tried to carry the argument to him and said that perhaps we would have liked to given some weapons at that point, but we had our arms embargo and we were sticking by that.

I am afraid that there are some people in the House who are determined to spread the myth that we have been supplying arms to Iraq for many years. That is not true and most people know that it is not true. However, time moves on and one did see in the period after that war the true face of Saddam Hussein. It was after that war that we witnessed the worst of the excesses against his own people. I supported him, quite rightly at that time, as did most other people.

The recent air attacks were directed against missile sites and against control centres. These sites were designed to keep out our aircraft so that the Iraqis could operate against the Shi'ites in the south and the Kurds in the north. The other reason is that we needed to safeguard our own crews who were flying in those areas. The last thing I, or anyone in the House, would wish to see, would be one of our aircraft being shot down simply because we had neglected to take the action that was needed.

It seems to have worked, but I think it is impossible for us to consider that we have achieved all that we needed to achieve. In fact all that we have is a truce. It is a truce that will not last and when it is broken it will be broken by Saddam Hussein not least because it is impossible for him to survive in his country at present without a series of crises to keep him in power. He needs this to convince his own people that he is facing a world coalition and facing it down and defeating it. He needs more action on our side to provide him with the right home progapanda.

When that occurs, what reaction will there be from us? What contingency plans do we have? It is not much use continuing to bomb missile sites. It is right to do it at present, but there is not much point in doing that while life in Baghdad goes on normally and Saddam, through his propaganda machine, can claim a great victory. That is not the way forward.

There is one great instrument of repression that still lies in his hands: the Republican Guard and those people who form his own personal bodyguard. If we are to go forward and are forced to take action, we must be ruthless in in attacking that instrument, because to undermine their morale is the most positive thing that we can do. They are the people who are attacking the Kurds in the north and the Shi'ites in the south and they are the people who we must go for.

I am saddened that we have had this slight mix-up and cannot concentrate in this debate on the Royal Air Force, but I now turn to that. I sometimes think there is a dastardly plot to do down the Parachute Regiment. I am sad to think that that might be so and I hope that I am wrong. We desperately need more helicopters for the Parachute Regiment and for 24 Air Mobile Brigade. Several other hon. Members have made this point. It is remarkably good news that we have managed to retain the European fighter aircraft, but in June 1990 in a debate in the House I advocated that an air mobile division should be formed using the Parachute Regiment and 24 Air Mobile Brigade as the basis for that expansion.

Two years have passed and although the United Kingdom heads the formation of the ACE rapid reaction corps, little has been done to increase the helicopter lifting capability of 24 Air Mobile Brigade or of similar formations in the United Kingdom. France, Russia and Germany all have scout attack and support helicopters allotted permanently to them, but 24 Brigade has no support helicopters allocated and depends instead on begging helicopters from the RAF as and when they can be made available. There are only 60 of those helicopters in the whole British Army.

All that I would say—this is obviously not a question for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, but for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence—is that I hope that it is being addressed very seriously indeed and that orders will soon be placed.

My hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) made it clear that we decided as long ago as 1987 in favour of the EH101. I have to say to Ministers that there might be a theory that if we put the arguments again we can put off the day of decision which we know has to come. I beg the Minister to get on and announce now that the utility EH101 is to be ordered in quantity and then allocated to 24 Air Mobile Brigade so that the Parachute Regiment can travel round in those superb helicopters in the style to which it should be accustomed.

7.29 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On 27 November, I was fortunate to draw the No. 1 slot in the ballot for private Members' motions and introduce a debate on the need to improve relations with the Arab world. On 4 December, I made a 50-minute speech on Iraq during the debate on the United Nations initiated by the hon. Member for Bexleyheath (Mr. Townsend). Although those speeches are highly relevant, I shall not go over that ground again except to draw the conclusion that, as I said then, the west should accept in good faith the Iraqi offer to negotiate and to promote a dialogue. I personally would wish to see the lifting of sanctions as a gesture of good will towards Iraq forthwith.

To hon. Members who resent such a view on the ground of the persecution of the Shias and the Kurds, I say gently that I was on Christopher Morgan's programme on Radio 4 last Sunday with the grandson of the Grand Ayatollah of Shi'ism, Al-Hoei, whose name is Jusef Al-Hoei. He said, on behalf of the Shi'ite people, that bombing was pointless. On the same programme, Mozin Desaig, on behalf of the Kurds, said that the bombing by the west simply provoked more of Saddam's wrath against the Kurds.

The right hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell), who is the Chairman of the Select Committee on Defence, thinks that I am naive. I think that he is unreal to believe that Saddam can be removed in foreseeable circumstances.

I borrow the phrase of the former Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath), who spoke about being "not in" with the Arab world. However, I welcome the clear statement by the Secretary of State for Defence that the Government are now endorsing the integrity of the Iraq border.

Wherever the fault lies, sanctions impose suffering on the people of Iraq, not least on the old and vulnerable. Unless something is done quickly I fear that the children of Iraq could become a generation hating the west. I heard my old friend from European Parliament days Claude Cheysson say on the World Service:

"What is the policy? To bomb Baghdad twice a week until heaven knows when?"

That is the reality and it would simply consolidate Saddam's hold on the reins of power in Iraq. The only alternative is to try to amass a land force which would occupy and hold downtown Baghdad. Such a move would lead to Vietnam plus.

For part of the debate I hope that hon. Members will focus their minds on one of the root causes of the trouble —the pouring of sophisticated arms and arms-making equipment into Iraq by Germany, France, the Soviet Union, Chile, Switzerland, the United States and Britain. Albeit deeply wrong, no wonder the Iraqis thought that they had carte blanche to march into Kuwait when they desperately needed cash to pay the western arms creditors. That was a major part of the problem at the end of the hostilities.

There is much wringing of the hands about Iraq and nuclear weapons. How did it all start? I shall tell the House precisely how it started. It started in the first week of September 1975. During the recess I was greatly influenced by reading the 500 pages of Kenneth Timmerman's book which I lent to the Secretary of State for Defence. I gather from the Ministry of Defence that it has studied a copy. Page 55 states:

"While touring Provence with Chirac and de l'Etoile"—

he was the marketing director of Marcel Dassault—

"Saddam made a side trip that few people in France paid much attention to at the time. On their way to the bullfights at Le Baux, Saddam's French hosts took him through the Cadarache nuclear research centre, one of the most advanced in Europe. In this small Provincal town just north of Marseilles the Commissarriat à l'Energie Atomique had set up its first experimental fast-breeder reactor. That called it Rapsodie. It certainly enchanted Saddam."

You bet it did!

"The basic principle of a fast-breeder reactor, also called a supergenerator, is to 'breed' more nuclear fuel than it consumes. In the process, it transforms significant quantities of uranium into plutonium. While plutonium is a by-product of most nuclear fuel cycles, and can be extracted from spent fuel by chemical reprocessing, it has little utility except for making bombs. Iraq's interest in fast-breeder reactors was motivated by one concern alone: obtaining a sure source of plutonium for use in a nuclear weapons program."

If the west goes out of its way for money and whets the appetite of those who might be described as ruthless Tikritis, what can we expect?

The relationship between France and Saddam is extraordinary. Timmerman says:

"When they returned to Paris, Saddam decided to prepare a surprise for his 'personal friend', Jacques Chirac. It had been easier to win over the French than Saddam had dreamed. He wanted to seal their pact on a personal note. Much to the chagrin of the maître d'hôtel at the Marigny Palace, where he was staying, Saddam ordered his personal cook to return to Baghdad on the presidential plane to retrieve a load of victuals for Chirac. Top on the list was one and a half tons of an Iraqi river fish called masgouf, which Chirac had enjoyed in Baghdad the year before. With Iraqi security guards patrolling the kitchens of the Marigny Palace with their machine pistols, Saddam's cooks roasted the huge, greasy carp over open fires. Raymond Thullier, who was later told the story by Chirac, said that 'the whole place smelled of charred flesh. It was amusing, but a mess.'"

With such a relationship can we be surprised that they think that they can do anything they like?

However, it was not only the French. If we acknowledge the depth of the deceit by the British Government and therefore our own share of responsibility for bringing about this situation, we will find it less unpalatable to start talking to Saddam Hussein. Before criticising the French, we should look at ourselves in the mirror.

I have a long question for the Foreign Secretary. The process of giving a licence or consent is a matter for one group of public servants, the Department of Trade and Industry. The enforcement of the law is entrusted to another group, Customs and Excise. If the acts of exporters are determined criminally or non-criminally by the dealings that they have had with the licensing agency, in this case the DTI, both the enforcement of the law and the fair administration of justice become impossible if the enforcement agency, Customs and Excise, is misinformed about or ignorant as to the nature of those dealings. Still more are good government and justice impossible if it were to be the case that documentary and oral evidence of those dealings were kept out of the criminal trial on grounds of public interest immunity.

I asked the Foreign Secretary, having given his officials the article in "Public Law" by Anthony Bradley, the former professor of public law in Edinburgh, what the Government intend to do to tighten up the whole issue of the relationship between Customs and Excise and the DTI.

Another remarkable book which challenges the integrity of the heart of the Government is to appear. It is by David Leigh with Richard Norton Taylor and its title is "Betrayed". I have been sent a review copy and the press conference launching it is on Monday. This is the author who, with Magnus Linklater, wrote "Not With Honour" about Westland—which events have subsequently shown to be wholly accurate.

In a letter to The Times published on 13 November the Attorney-General claimed that there had not been a cover up because the existence of all the secret documents had been voluntarily declared to defence counsel in the Matrix Churchill case. The evidence disclosed in the book shows that that was simply not so.

Miss Emma Nicholson (Torridge and Devon, West): Near the end of his speech the Secretary of State for Defence expressed the overriding reason for the events in the Gulf that have given rise to this debate. He said that we acted to ensure that Iraq complied with all United Nations resolutions and that the presence of the Royal Air Force was to ensure that compliance. There are two formidable reasons for the creation of the United Nations resolutions against Iraq, and both stem from the early reasons for the formation of the League of Nations and the United Nations. They were international peace—which has been achieved by the destruction, or a partial destruction, of the nuclear weaponry in Iraq—and internal peace, which is expressed in the United Nations declaration on human rights.

If you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, wish to know whether a Government support human rights, you must ask the people. If you ask the marsh people of Iraq, you soon find the answer. You find half a million trapped people, and drained marshes: that is a fact, not a rumour. When the Iraqi regime's senior water engineer was captured recently, he had the maps on him and marked those parts of the marshes that had been drained. The marshes provide the livelihood for the ag[illegible]ld Madan—the marsh people.

There is no food. There are men who have been starving for days on end. There are prolonged military assaults on homes and people. There are no doctors or medicines. In the camps that hold 50,000 refugees in the safe haven of Iran, you also find the answer, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You find parts of families, elderly men, perhaps young children, and women—and you hear tales of horror. You see tortured bodies—the wounds of war. On the long borders of Iran and Iraq, you will find 10,000 wandering, homeless people. You can find the answer on human rights there. They have been driven from their homes and are without fresh water, food or shelter.

If the dead could talk to us, I dare say that they could give us the answer—men who were tortured, assassinated or executed by their own Government. Recently, 120 men aged from 14 to 22 were arrested and driven to a prison near Baghdad. In walked the son and son-in-law of Saddam Hussein carrying machine guns, and all those men died, and they were buried in an unmarked grave that had been dug by a bulldozer half an hour earlier.

You, Mr. Deputy Speaker, could hear the answer from the dead children whose lives were snuffed out by napalm or phosphorous bombs or by chemical weapons—one friend told me that the stench of garlic marks the one that destroys the kidneys—or just from physical attacks by brutal men, children who have been picked up by their legs and swung against a wall until their skulls collapsed, perhaps in front of their mothers.

What are the memories of the children who escape? One small boy told me of a memory that he cannot get out of his mind—of seeing a tank run over an old man just in front of him, of the old man screaming, and of the laughing of the soldiers in the tank. That was in Basra.

Think of the women who were forced to watch the killings of all the members of their families just yards away by crueller methods than we can ever visualise, women who were lined up in hundreds alongside captured men, and were witnesses then to lines of tanks driving over those men. One woman told me that she saw 700 men killed in front of her in just that way. She told me of the stench of human flesh in the heat, and of the pain and anguish as she saw her sons and husband crushed into the earth. Some women go mad as a result and never speak again. I have seen them in the camps.

Successive Kurdish tragedies triggered our western response and led to the framing and acceptance by the Security Council of the resolutions that the Royal Air Force and allied forces seek to impose or to keep in place in Iraq. Some resolutions, or parts of them, have been achieved, with deep frustration and now with the use of force.

We hope that we have removed the nuclear threat, but what about internal peace? How do the people of Iraq see their own future? Just before Christmas, on 18 December, I had the opportunity to address an informal meeting of the Security Council called by the non-aligned nations. I urged the Security Council to implement resolution 688, and gave many examples of victims' histories. For outside the no-fly zones, internal peace is a wholly unachieved goal, and within those zones it can be only partially successful.

The tragedy of Iraq is at the heart of every Iraqi family now. It is much worse than during the Iran-Iraq war. Young men were sent away to fight in that conflict, but not all that many of them, and perhaps not every man in each family. If they went to the borders and fought, they were considered martyrs to a national cause. Today, at least one member of every Iraqi family is a victim

Even many members of the Iraqi army are victims of the system and dare not speak. Just a look interpreted as treasonable will damn one to a lingering death—perhaps to being burnt alive by petrol being poured into the gullet and ignited by vapour emitted from a knife wound slashed in the stomach. As the victim writhes to death, he is watched by brother officers. One of them may be his own brother, who dares not speak. One officer told me that —he fled.

Only the cruel and the ignorant join the Iraqi security forces who are Saddam Hussein's praetorian guard of hell. They are hand-picked fighters—members of his family, and village tribesmen from his local towns. Every other family in the land, including those who have sons in the army, has its victims—perhaps through martyrdom or imprisonment. Burial alive is common, as is being imprisoned underground, beaten by guards, with a little gruel for food and brackish water. That was the fate of a friend of mine who is now paralysed and is dying.

The people know that there is no peace ahead without Saddam Hussein's removal. He lives only by the creation of violence and hatred and has no second nature. That is the man. One cannot reason with him. To think otherwise is folly. The former United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees with responsibility for Iraq, Prince Sadruddin Aga Khan, resigned his post because, he said, no one could negotiate with Saddam Hussein—and that was in December 1991.

Saddam Hussein has total sovereignty. Perhaps only parliamentarians can understand the full effect of that. Saddam Hussein is the state of Iraq—the constitution, which he made up, says so. Iraq is not even a one-party state. By its own laws, it is a one-man state. Saddam Hussein takes, owns, runs and finally destroys all. There are no checks and balances to help the Iraqi people.

I give a small example of their loss of freedom. A year or so ago, Saddam Hussein knocked down holy places of worship in the south. There is no licence or authority today to rebuild them. There is no freedom to worship. Nor do the Iraqi people have the freedom to listen—something that we consider as free as air. Anyone caught listening to the BBC World Service in Arabic will be executed on the spot. Freedom of movement is not on offer, and nor is access to education, medicine, or freedom to see a doctor or go to hospital. That is true of the north and south, and of the centre now.

The three basic human needs of food, shelter, and clothing without which survival itself is threatened are withheld from the north and south. They are withheld from the Kurds, Sunnis, and Shias alike by Saddam Hussein's forces, despite the memorandum of understanding designed to permit UN aid. Saddam Hussein's word is worthless. His ambassador's signature on last November's memorandum of understanding is of no value.

Were it not for the British Government, the European Community, the voluntary agencies and the Iranian Government and the thousands of individuals who have donated funds, no food, clothing, water or medicine would be supplied to the Iraqi refugees and oppressed people. Even that aid is very little when matched with need. Human rights and human values now have no sanctuary in Iraq.

Recent events in the Gulf served one of our two purposes—the effective pursuit of international peace through the maintenance of Kuwait's borders and the destruction of potential nuclear weaponry within Iraq. Just as vital is the aim of achieving human rights. In the heart of every Iraqi lies the plea that their sufferings and needs must be addressed. They cannot act alone.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): I welcome this debate, and want to see in the near future a full, wide-ranging debate on Iraq in the United Nations Security Council. Force was justified to end the criminal invasion of Kuwait. It must not be forgotten that the dictator was given five months to get his forces out of Kuwait. In fact, he was virtually begged to do so. Unless force had been used, Kuwait would almost certainly remain under enemy occupation today. Had that happened, many of the horrors to be found in Iraq, about which the hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson) spoke so movingly, would no doubt have occurred in Kuwait, and for a long time to come.

To save his own skin, Saddam Hussein agreed to all the provisions in the ceasefire agreement of two years ago. After he lost that war so decisively, he feared—understandably, although whether with any justification one does not know—that the allies would destroy his regime. In those circumstances, he would agree to anything, as long as he could remain in power. As we have seen, he has taken every possible opportunity since to tease and taunt the allies—no more so that in the past few weeks. He has shown his complete contempt for the ceasefire agreement, and has constantly tried to go as far as possible in breaking it without provoking the retaliation of the allies.

Time and again, when the no-fly zones are criticised, we must remind ourselves why they came into being. As hon. Members on both sides of the House have pointed out today, they were introduced to defend the Kurds and Shi'ites from butchery in the north and the south. Nor should we forget the international outcry that was also rightly heard on the Floor of the House when that danger was posed. If I remember rightly, there was no criticism then of safe havens and no-fly zones, even from the opponents of the war. In those circumstances, we were right to take the attitude that we took; and the Kurds, as well as the Shi'ites, remain undoubtedly in constant danger.

The international community is faced with an irrational dictator—although, let me add, he is not so irrational that he does not know how to survive in power. All his actions have been to a large extent irrational, despite what was said by the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath). With no justification, he initiated a war against a neighbouring country, Iran, which lasted eight years. When we are told—as we are from time to time—that the international community is not concerned with Muslims, as it should be, we should not forget that tens of thousands of Muslim lives were lost in that futile war on both sides along with those of Saddam's other victims. Nor should we forget that the vast majority of people in Kuwait are Muslims, and that Saddam has been responsible for many other atrocities, including the gassing of the Kurds—all Muslims again.

Can there be any doubt that, if force had not been used in the past few days by the international community—led by the United States—the United Nations weapons inspectors would not be in Iraq now? Can any hon. Member challenge that contention? If force had not been used, Saddam Hussein would not have climbed down. Not only would the weapons inspectors not have been allowed in; Saddam would obviously have taken the next step. If he had known that the allies would not act, he would have felt able to treat them with utter contempt and see what other provisions of the ceasefire agreement could be broken, and no doubt would have decided at some time to try to invade Kuwait again. Certainly, he would not have hesitated to do so if he had thought that he could get away with it.

Nevertheless, the international community must use force only as a last resort. Any use of force must be measured and limited; all possible action must be taken to avoid civilian casualties. I am not a hypocrite: I must accept that, if force is used, there will be a possibility of civilian casualties. I am therefore not a pacifist. If I believe that force is necessary from time to time, I must accept —with great sadness—that civilians may be killed or injured. None the less, every effort must be made to avoid bombing civilian targets.

I do not defend the bombing of the hotel in Baghdad, and I cannot emphasise too strongly that we are not at war with the people of Iraq; we have no quarrel with them. We should always remember that they were the first victims of this gangster and his terrorist regime. I know that a direct analogy cannot be drawn, but when, before the second world war, anti-fascists mobilised against Hitler, Mussolini and Franco, it was always pointed out that the first victims of such criminal terrorist dictatorships were people living in the countries involved. Limited action is essential, not simply for propaganda purposes but in support of a genuine wish not to inflict further harm and damage on the people who have suffered so long under the terrorist regime in Iraq.

The right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup mentioned Israel. As I said at the time, I certainly believe that Israel has violated international law. The right hon. Gentleman was Chief Whip in the Government who were in power in 1956 when this country committed an act of criminal aggression, in collusion with France and Israel. As I told him, he did not wish to resign then—which is all the worse if he did not agree with the Government's policy. I know what I was doing then, along with many other democratic socialists: I was demonstrating our contempt for the action that was being taken, and our respect for international law and the United Nations. If I felt so strongly in 1956, why should I take a different attitude in the 1990s, when a criminal terrorist regime commits acts of aggression against Kuwait and continues to oppress and terrorise the Shi'ites and Kurds—as well as perpetuating the general terror that afflicts Iraq?

Some of the opposition in Iraq—both at home, to the extent that they can survive underground, and abroad—take the view that western Governments do not really wish to get rid of Saddam, but merely want to weaken him. I hope that that is not the case. It is not our job, as such, to get rid of him; I certainly do not believe that bombing will get rid of him, or should be used as a means of doing so.

My hon. Friends rightly criticise—as I do, and did at the time—the way in which western Governments, as well as the former Soviet Union, supported the regime in Iraq to the hilt. That lesson should not be forgotten. But if it was wrong to appease Saddam then by arming and supporting him, why continue that appeasement by saying, in effect, that no action should be taken when he invades Kuwait—or when, having been decisively defeated, he shows such contempt for the provisions of the ceasefire agreement? I see no logic in that. Given that I was opposed to the appeasement of the regime at one time, I want no appeasement now. I want western Governments, in particular, to learn the lessons that the past provides.

I cannot be a party to ignoring the situation in Iraq, and I have no intention of changing my position. It may not be popular in certain circumstances to take such a line, but I believe that it is necessary to deal with criminal aggression. Certainly, I feel that that is part and parcel of my duty as a democratic socialist.

Today's edition of The Guardian contains an article by David Hirst, who is an authority on Arab matters and well respected as such. It quotes the Iraqi opposition as describing Saddam Hussein as "the most evil and destructive tyrant in modern Arab history."

I consider that a fair summing up of the person who has ruled in Iraq for so long, so unfortunately and at such cost to human life.

I believe that what was done was basically right, although it was not right in every respect. The allies demonstrated that it was necessary to show Saddam Hussein that the ceasefire agreement must be respected. If he has now got the message—I hope he has—it will be to the good of Iraq, and of the international community.

7.57 pm

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): I must declare a professional interest. My company gives consultancy advice to Thorn EMI Electronics, which provides the RAF and other armed forces of the Crown with equipment.

In his opening speech, my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence said that the RAF faced challenge and change. The debate has produced a number of challenges of what might be regarded as accepted assumptions: the most notable came from the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), who said that he and his hon. Friends would vote against the motion, because they would thus be voting against the wickedness of the western allies' recent bombing raids on Iraq. He also said that he took pride in the fact that, 50 years ago, he became a pilot in the RAF. I found it strange and I was somewhat saddened by the fact that the right hon. Gentleman seemed to have no feeling of loyalty towards the aircrews of his old service, who have been risking their lives to try to ensure that United Nations resolutions are upheld by the tyrant in Baghdad.

I was saddened, too, by the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E.

[Mr. John Wilkinson]

Heath), who said that he could see no circumstances in which the armed forces of the Crown could reasonably go to the aid of Kuwait. It was a strange observation—first, because, as I pointed out, the Arab League has never really been an effective instrument of peacekeeping in the Arab world and, secondly, because the Royal Air Force has shown time and again—most recently in 1990, after Iraq's invasion of Kuwait—that it can be on the spot literally within hours and that, by its rapid intervention in the theatre, it can deter aggression.

We saw this principle in operation on numerous occasions when my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup was a member of the Government. For example, in 1961, fighters went up to Kuwait and prevented Iraqi aggression. In 1962, they were sent to India to defend the north-east frontier area against potential Chinese aggression. They were also sent to northern Rhodesia, now Zambia. There were many other instances during the right hon. Gentleman's time in Government.

The early expedition of force—and particularly of air power—can deter conflict and prevent warfare from spreading. That is why air power is a key element of peacekeeping and why Her Majesty's Government reasonably invest so much in it.

The other aspect that is particularly relevant to the recent raids is that we have seen from Iraqi aggression the potential dangers of nuclear and chemical weapon proliferation. Some Opposition Members have said that the allied bombing of Iraq in recent days was particularly heinous in as much as, sadly, there were civilian casualties at a hotel in Baghdad. Those casualties were incurred because Saddam Hussein was not keeping United Nations resolutions and because a Tomahawk cruise missile either malfunctioned or was shot down. One must remember that Saddam Hussein's Scud missiles were launched 89 times in the Gulf war against targets in Saudi Arabia and Israel. One Scud missile caused 127 casualties in Saudi Arabia. In the Iran-Iraq war, Scud missiles caused 2,000 deaths in Iran. This gives us an idea of the dangers of nuclear and chemical weapons proliferation. Those offensive weapons must be taken out, if necessary, at source.

I hope that the Western allies have learnt the lesson and will be putting in place effective anti-ballistic missile defences. The early dispatch of Patriot missiles, appropriately modified, enabled the allied forces to conduct their operations successfully. It would have been much more difficult had there been no defence against Scud missile attacks. Moreover, had there been no defence, the Israelis might have entered the war, with disastrous consequences.

We face challenges and changes. Partly because the debate has been hijacked by the need to discuss foreign affairs, there has been little time to examine the changing strategic circumstances within which the Royal Air Force has to operate. We have had no debate on the defence estimates—even though I suggest that such a debate is overdue, as the statement on the defence estimates was published way back in July last year.

We are faced with a multitude of operational tasks that the Royal Air Force has to accomplish—in Northern Ireland, Bosnia, Somalia and Iraq—with a budget which is declining constantly in real terms and with manpower which is diminishing steadily under "Options for Change". The Air Force has a difficult challenge to make ends meet and fulfil its re-equipment programmes.

As I see it, 12 vital re-equipment programmes need to be funded: the Eurofighter 2000 and its associated weapons systems and equipment; the C130 replacement or modernisation; the Nimrod replacement; the medium surface-to-air missile for air defence; the SWATHE system for anti-armour attack; the conventionally armed stand-off missile—we saw in the Gulf war how perilous it can be with effective air defences for weapons to have to be launched over the target.

Free-fall weapons should increasingly become a thing of the past. In this respect, too, we need a tactical air-to-surface missile to provide the United Kingdom with an air-launched nuclear capability. People who say that a modified Trident or free-fall weapon could do the job are not thinking the issue through. We do not have time to go into detail now, but I suggest that those last two suggestions are facile in view of the flexibility and rapidity of response of air power.

The need for medium-lift helicopters has been described before and is serious. In all recent conflicts, there has been a grave shortage of support helicopters. I would say that we need both the Blackhawk and the EH101 because there are different tasks for helicopters of different sizes. The Firefly primary trainer has to be bought. Furthermore there is the mid-life update of the Tornado, the GR4. There is also the purchase of the advanced short-range air-to-air missile and the six Sea King HAR3 search and rescue helicopters. Those are all important programmes if the Royal Air Force is to be a flexible service.

How are we to save the money to provide the finance needed for the re-equipment? First, I suggest, we should reduce our commitment in Germany. It already assumes one quarter of the cost of strike command. When the Russians come out of the eastern part of Germany, as they are pledged to do by the latter part of 1994, we should save money on Germany and concentrate on the United Kingdom and on greater flexibility from the home base.

Secondly, we should create a two-tier service. If warning times are to be greater—if the political situation is such that we can envisage with greater certainty how potential crises will evolve—we should rely more on reserves: we should have effective regular forces properly trained and ready for use, but should rely more heavily on reserves and auxiliaries and should have auxiliary squadrons flying again.

Thirdly, we should be more rational in our support of the front line. We should rely rather less on maintenance units and more on industry for the third line servicing of our equipment. This will give us the leeway that we need. As it is, only 37 per cent. of the defence budget goes on equipment and 42 per cent. on pay and pensions. It is a dangerous trend, which needs to be reversed, and I think that some of the measures that I have outlined can achieve it.

8.8 pm

Mr. George Galloway (Glasgow, Hillhead): It was said of the Bourbons that they learned nothing and forgot nothing. We should have learnt from the treaty of Versailles of the dangers of treating with the humiliation, partition, reparation and fear of dismemberment with which the allies are pursuing the defeated enemy Iraq—a defeated enemy whose military potential has been crushed and whose ability seriously to make war is no longer a consideration.

On hearing of the assassination of one of his master's political enemies, one of Talleyrand's aides said, "It's a terrible crime," to which Tallyrand replied, "It's worse than a crime—it's a blunder." I contend that the west has not only been guilty of crimes of comission and omission but, from its own standpoint, has been committing blunders that will return to haunt it. Just as after the treaty of Versailles, the mutation of German national grievance came back to haunt us in an absolutely horrendous manner only decades later.

The fact that it was a crime to launch 40 cruise missiles at the push of a button many hundreds of miles from where they would land, at £1 million a piece, when they almost overflew people starving to death in Africa, has not really been disputed in many places over the past few days.

Notwithstanding the sneers in the House this evening, the French Government have made it clear that they regard that attack as outwith international law in the sense that it was outwith the terms of the Security Council resolution. The Russian, Jordanian, and Syrian Governments and the Arab League share that view. Demonstrations in the Islamic world, from Kuala Lumpur to Karachi, make clear the sheer scale of the opposition to the assault on Baghdad. It sometimes seems that there is a majority only in this House of Commons in favour of the assault that took place on Baghdad last Sunday.

Whatever may be said about the factories which the United Nations inspectors repeatedly testified had, by then, no military significance, the assault on the great historic Arab capital of Baghdad was no different in its intention from that of the Luftwaffe in the east end of London or of the terrorists who leave bombs in Victoria station or Oxford street and walk away before the damage is done.

The attack was designed to strike terror into the hearts of the civilian population of Baghdad and to turn the people against their Government. Just as the blitz by the Luftwaffe and Irish terrorism succeeded only in galvanising patriotic feeling, so the latest spasm of violence against Iraq by the west has actually strengthened Saddam Hussein's regime.

The attack was a blunder because it has contributed seriously to a wave that will continue for years of further instability, radicalisation and sweeping fundamentalism across the middle east and the broader Islamic arena. I do not know where some of the authorities obtain their information. On Arab streets, in the slums of Algiers, in Aden, in the slums of Cairo and in the mosques of Saudi Arabia, the attack has led to the beatification—if Muslims can be beatified—of that blood-soaked tyrant, Saddam Hussein. His stock has never been higher.

Believe me, that wave of radicalisation and fundamentalism has been under way in the Arab area for a considerable period. Anyone who is aware of the Palestinian question and who has watched the steady march of the fundamentalist movement, Hamas, gaining ground at the expense of the secular, moderate, nationalist leadership of the Palestine Liberation Organisation, knows exactly the despair and humiliation felt by the Arabs that is leading to the festering problem of fundamentalism.

Hon. Members should mark my words. There is not much of a legal process in Saudi Arabia. However, Fahd is in danger. The Moslem brotherhood, outraged by recent events and the influence of the Americans in the kingdom, is even now plotting the overthrow of the puppet King Fahd who is so beloved of the British Foreign Office and the British Government.

When considering these matters, it is important to walk a mile in the other fellow's shoes. On the streets of the Arab world, the west is seen as nothing more than a bloody hypocrite after Sunday's attack and in respect of its general policy. The British Government cannot escape the Palestinian question.

This very day the Foreign Secretary met the ambassadors of Egypt, Jordan, Syria and Lebanon to discuss the illegal deportation of 415 Palestinians. However, he refused to allow the acknowledged representative of the Palestinian people here in London to attend that meeting. He will not meet him on any other occasion. Even when PLO leaders are in London, the Foreign Secretary forbids his top officials to meet them. That undermining of the moderate, nationalist leadership of the PLO is the same kind of gift to the Muslim fanatics and extreme radicals as the attack on Saddam Hussein by the coalition air forces.

In the third world, western foreign policy is seen as based on the need to preserve not a new world order, but a new world odour. The third world believes that it smells just like the old world odour. It is a pattern of relationships based on the economic, and ultimately military, domination of third-world countries by the big powers from the terms of trade to control of technology and military hardware.

When the peoples of the Arab area and of the third world generally consider the pattern of policy of western Governments, they see hypocrisy. One of the raids was launched from Turkey. Turkey illegally occupies a British Commonwealth country and it has been doing that for 20 years. However, it has launched attacks on another country for that country's transgressions of international law.

The hypocrisy is evident to the peoples of the Arab world and of the third world generally when they witness the total failure of western Governments to do anything about the illegal occupation of East Timor and the west's total failure to do anything about even simple matters such as the deportation of the 415 Palestinians, irrespective of the decades-long illegal occupation of Palestinian lands and the deportations, imprisonments, torture and killings that occur every day in the occupied territories of Palestine. Not a penny's-worth of sanctions is broached against Israel, let alone the launching of an armada against that country to force it to obey international law.

In no theatre is there more of a sense of burning outrage than in the former Yugoslavia. The western powers have been completely unable to stop the genocide and ethnic cleansing of hundreds of thousands of Muslims in Bosnia at the hands of Christian Serbs. The hypocrisy of western policy is seen to be at its most naked in that theatre.

Saddam Hussein will mutate across the Arab area and across the Muslim world. There will be more Saddams. Saddam will be strong until some kind of decency and justice permeates the international approach of the so-called allies.

8.18 pm

Mr. Peter Temple-Morris (Leominster): I listened to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Galloway) with great interest. In the few words that I will be able to say, measures—and only measures—of agreement between us may well appear.

I want to explore the overall problem. I welcome the debate, but I am afraid to say that I will make another foreign affairs intrusion. None the less, the debate is important and it contains an emergency element.

I do not hesitate to say that I support, and have supported, the Government's policy. However, the spirit of my speech will be about the overall policy considerations for the future because they are most important. I welcome this opportunity to make a submission about what I am sure the Government are considering and, if they are not considering these points, I would like the Government to consider them.

Starting with the immediate, it should be made clear that we are dealing with the aftermath of the Gulf war. I am surprised that this has not been mentioned so far, but we are dealing with a situation which is, if you like, our own fault or which we brought about, because we chose —I respected the decision at the time and I respect it now —not ultimately to defeat Saddam Hussein militarily. It was a partial defeat, a defeat in a limited and controlled war. Having gone along with that, yet recognising the facts of life and acknowledging that hindsight does us absolutely no good in this, we must live with the consequences.

The first consequence is that we are landed with a very necessary nuclear and general weapons inspection that must be carried out on Iraqi soil by foreigners to Iraqis, an irritant to them and a perpetual excuse for them to create crises. This inspection must be enforced by air power. The problem of enforcement by air power is that the whole process could be too prolonged to hold politically.

The second main consequence is that we have the no-fly zones. It should be made quite clear that while they represent an immediate humanitarian problem, the Kurds and their situation within Iraq have been a problem for hundreds of years, the Shias and their situation in Iraq for even longer.

It is worth mentioning with regard to the Shia population that while some of them are in the most appalling conditions in the marshes, it is said by some, with no proper census, that the population of Iraq is over 50 per cent. Shia and there has therefore been a great struggle on the part of elements of the Sunni minority, or certainly not a substantial majority. There has been permanent competition between them, with the Sunnis always dominant, mainly through repression.

When it comes to the Kurds and Shias, no-fly zones are primarily necessary not only because of history—this is another point not brought out, and it is an unfortunate one—but because certain statements were made at the immediate conclusion of the Gulf war which encouraged the two insurrections, despite the fact that it should have been clear to those responsible that we have not done sufficient military damage to Saddam's army, much as we would have liked to, to limit its permanent capacity for vicious internal repression. We may have limited Saddam's capability to make war, but he showed a remarkable capacity to put down those two insurrections and we must live with the fact that, at least in part, we helped to create them. That gives us the responsibility for the humanitarian task involved.

Last but not least, we live under the United Nations umbrella, one which is wearing increasingly thin. The French position involves at least a warning. Arab pronouncements are becoming increasingly clear. It will not last much longer, this umbrella, this legality, without an overall and even-handed policy for the region. It is a region that I have had quite a lot to do with over the years and I have many personal connections with it.

That brings me to my policy concerns. The first is a general one and it goes far beyond even the region. It is the whole question of the Anglo-American relationship. It is very special and important to us, yet when we go into any sort of action with our American friends and allies we must face the fact that we ourselves have a limited national capability in the modern world. Neither we nor anyone else can really be effective without the Americans and the problem is the overwhelming imbalance of the coalition. It gives rise to the danger that whatever the coalition does is perceived to be a carrying through of United States policy.

That perception alone gives us the right to ask whether the United States has a regional policy. Perhaps we should exercise even more influence than we already do. But the answer to my question is no, the United States does not have a good regional policy for the whole middle east and Gulf theatre, and Iraq is but part of the whole. The danger is that we become completely besotted with Saddam Hussein while the whole of the rest of the theatre, with even more important considerations at stake, goes down the political and possibly the military drain.

When it comes to this regional policy, the containment of Iraq is part of it but there are two other major areas that must be addressed and dealt with. The first is the Palestinian question. The United States above all—because no one else has the capacity to deal with it—must come to terms with Israeli excesses which are exercised in the full knowledge of the support that it almost invariably gets from the United States. The United States must deal with its domestic political difficulties and the pressures constantly brought on presidential candidates, not least on President Clinton, by a very powerful lobby in the United States. The United States must come to terms with this because it is part of the whole.

The second major element is Iran. The Ayatollah kicked out not only the Shah but also the west, and particularly the United States. The United States has not come to terms with this. We have the same syndrome as we had only too visibly and recently with Vietnam. Iran is potentially a considerable danger, but, if it is dealt with, it could also be a considerable friend. It is the traditional and historical regional counter-balance to Iraq. Had Iran been stable and had the Iranian revolution not happened, none of this would ever have happened—no Iran-Iraq war and no invasion of Kuwait. Incidentally, there can be no regional security pact—a grand phrase mentioned by many—without the participation of Iran. Otherwise, I am afraid that it will be ineffectual.

We now come to the dangers of not having an overall regional policy. The first obvious danger is the destabilisation of the Arab and the whole middle eastern world. All our Arab friends have domestic difficulties. Many of them, particularly the Gulf states, are extremely weak politically and extremely vulnerable, which is the very reason why we are there. Going wrong on this gives fuel to those extremes which they most fear.

Secondly, if we do not get it right we encourage Islamic fundamentalism. It is a very real danger from Algeria, Morocco, through Egypt, right down the Gulf countries and across the wider world. It should not be unnecessarily fuelled. It represents ammunition and food to those who want to destabilise and take over and who most certainly are not our potential friends.

Last but not least in the list of dangers is Iran itself. A considerable internal power struggle is going on and there is a serious risk of its going the wrong way——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. Mr. Elfyn Llwyd.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meironnydd Nant Conwy): We in the House are mindful of the threats to world peace posed by the regime of the evil Saddam Hussein. We also know of the unspeakable atrocities being perpetrated by his regime. Our concerns and those of the international community as a whole are reflected in the various United Nations resolutions of the past 18 months. I and my party were reluctantly in agreement with the original air strike, provided that it was carried out with safeguards for civilians and minimal loss of life generally. We also made it clear that our support was offered only as far as the action was within the sanction and authority of the United Nations.

One must consider the attacks on military installations as opposed to other sites. The Secretary of State said that Royal Air Force personnel did their best to make sure that they did not kill civilians. But can the accuracy of a cruise missile be guaranteed? The al-Rashid hotel is a case in point. Also, we have to consider whether the first strike was proportionate to the threat. Perhaps it was, but the question remains whether the other two strikes were legitimate. Further, if the strikes are designed ultimately to remove Saddam as president, as would probably be justified, they are certainly not succeeding. They are, in fact, having the reverse effect.

The public perception at the present time is that this country, with the other countries, has gone a step too far. The allies are on a slippery slope leading to full-scale conflict in this area. Martin Woollacott, The Guardian on 19 January, caught the mood when he said:

"A natural apprehension, accompanied by an element of guilt, has run through the west as allied planes and missiles struck at Iraq."

I am sure that this apprehension is in the minds of many hon. Members, since the legitimacy of the strikes is questionable.

The allies have not sought Security Council authorisation for the strikes, which ostensibly took place because of Saddam's failure to comply with resolutions 687 and 688. It is patently clear that the absence of such authorisation must open to question the legitimacy of the actions. Surely the allies cannot be acting on behalf of the international community when they do not seek specific sanction from the Security Council. Resolution 687 reads:

"relating, inter alia, to the restoration to Kuwait of its sovereignty, independence, and territorial integrity and the return of its legitimate Government, to the status of sanctions, the setting of specific conditions for a formal cease-fire".

This resolution was not carried unanimously.

The Secretary of State for Defence said that United Nations resolutions, supported by the personal endorsement of the Secretary-General, provided the legal authority for the attacks. The sanction of the Secretary-General is not the sanction of the Security Council. Indeed, article 42 of the charter of the United Nations is quite clear. It says:

"Should the Security Council consider that the measures provided for in Article 41 would be inadequate or have proved to be inadequate, it may take such action by air, sea or land forces as may be necessary to maintain or restore international peace and security. Such action may include demonstrations, blockade, and other operations by air, sea or land forces by Members of the United Nations."

Perhaps I am wrong, but I cannot see any reference to sanction by the Secretary-General alone.

In my view this is the crux of the question. Furthermore —this has already been quoted this evening—the Secretary-General's document, "An Agenda for Peace" deals with the use of military force in paragraph 42. It refers in detail to the concept of collective security and nowhere does it mention that the Secretary-General is in any way empowered by delegation or otherwise to speak on behalf of the Security Council.

Therefore, I believe that the legitimacy of the strikes must be in question. We are now in a serious position in which, as previously mentioned, Jordan, Syria and Libya, on behalf of the Arab world, are expressing strong misgivings about these actions. Similarly, the Russians and the French are now signalling their valid concerns at the actions. The international community is coming to the view that the most recent action was punitive only and that can never be legitimised or accepted in any decent international community.

Saddam has indicated that he is ready to observe a ceasefire. I believe that the time has come for resolutions 687 and 688 to be looked at anew. The precise details of non-compliance should be catalogued and the matter should be placed before the Security Council without delay. It is hoped that then the Security Council would give Iraq until a specific date to comply fully with the resolutions. Then, and only then, would the United Kingdom Government be observing the charter of the United Nations. Any further failure to follow the charter would, without doubt, pose a greater threat to world order than even Saddam's regime, since it could lead to the break-up of the United Nations. That is a valid point. At the present time, the United Nations appears to have been used by the so-called allies and that is certainly not the purpose for which it was formed; quite the reverse. At the moment, the United Nations can be considered a puppet of others.

I sincerely hope that the Government will resist any further applications by the United States—since we are talking of puppets—for a show of strength. I trust that the Government will proceed with caution. I trust that they will accept what this, albeit evil, man now says; at least listen and open a dialogue, and go back and examine resolutions 687 and 688, before placing the matter urgently before the Security Council. In international law, as everybody knows, legitimacy is everything. The United Kingdom must act strictly in accordance with the United Nations charter to regain that legitimacy and, with it, moral authority. Failure to do so would be merely to play into the Baghdad tyrant's hands.

8.35 pm

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): I have to declare an interest, of which the House will be aware. I have worn a light-blue uniform for more than four decades. I regret the length of time, but I have never regretted wearing the uniform; it has been a great privilege. I do regret, though, the loss of our full day's debate on RAF matters, because I feel that this once-a-year debate is important.

I compliment my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench on the way that they have handled matters in the Gulf as far as the Royal Air Force is concerned, and I wish to place on record, as others have done, my respect for and appreciation of the gallantry and skill of the crews involved. I believe that the Government and the RAF were right to impose a ban on disclosing to the media the names of aircrew taking part in the operations. Those in mass communications forget the family problems that are left behind, and it is right that we should never disclose the names of the aircrew.

My concern is that the RAF's position should now be recognised as the key element in deterrence against modern conventional warfare. I accept that Trident, as the nuclear deterrent, is the final deterrent, but more often than not we will be called upon to deploy RAF units in a deterrent capacity or a peacekeeping role. Therefore, I wish to draw attention to the changes that have taken place in the Royal Air Force under "Options for Change".

We have had a lot of publicity about the changes in the Army, but there has not been a lot of shouting about the changes in the RAF. It is interesting to note that, post-options, the RAF will have four types of combat aircraft: seven squadrons of Tornado F3s, three squadrons of Harriers, three sqauadrons of Jaguars in direct support of the battlefield, four squadrons of Tornado GR1s, two squadrons of Tornado GR1As and two squadrons of GR1Bs. That force consists of all-weather fighter assets and is a reduction by 33 per cent.—a massive reduction —in our all-weather fighter assets.

Long-range offensive assets have been reduced by 38 per cent. We all know the value of the GR1. I understand that, when an American air force general was asked what additional assets he would have liked in the Gulf, he said that he would have liked more squadrons of GR1 Royal Air Force aircraft. That tells us a lot about the GR1's standing. Maritime patrol aircraft have had a reduction of 25 per cent., and the Royal Air Force Regiment a reduction of 29 per cent., while there has been a 33 per cent. reduction in light armoured squadrons. Furthermore, 21 United Kingdom RAF stations will be closed, as will three in Germany, by 1995. That is a massive reduction in what I believe is the key element of the Royal Air Force.

I turn now, as my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench would expect me to do in this debate, to the volunteer reserves and the auxiliaries, where my interest, of course, lies. I agree with the moves and views that are taking place about the future. It is important that we recognise the key position which the auxiliaries and the volunteer reserve will occupy. It is right to examine those two organisations and ask whether we can make any changes and improvements, probably by a merger, to streamline them and make them more efficient. That does not mean that I want them to be reduced; I want them to be strengthened and increased. I would like some flying units to be returned to the auxiliary air force, or whatever it will be called in the future.

The great value that we get from auxiliaries and reserves is not often appreciated. If I had my way, all those who are trained by the Royal Air Force to fly would be signed up for life, regardless of the length of their full-time commission. The massive investment which the state makes in training pilots, navigators and so on should be repaid by their commitment to an auxiliary or reserve job which requires them to put in so many hours a week, a year or whatever. It destroys, as the United States did so effectively in the Gulf, the myth that was spread many years ago that weekend pilots could not fly fast jets. That is absolute nonsense.

Another matter to which I should like to draw attention is the volunteer air cadets. I believe the air cadets give the nation and the Royal Air Force tremendous value for the money which is invested in them. The officers and instructors who look after the air cadets are volunteers and are not paid. They attend evening duties and weekend activities, as do the flight people in the Chipmunks. The volunteers also fly motor gliders or conventional gliders and are not paid for it. That must be about the best bargain that anyone ever got, because the volunteers do it simply because they love flying or they love to be involved in the cadet organisation.

We should expand that sort of activity because I believe that we cannot get better value. If there are any thoughts in the alternative options programme which is buzzing around in the Ministry and elsewhere at present that it is not good value, let me say from considerable experience that it is the best value that I have seen in my life. I have never been able to work out why the RAF has been able to get so many dedicated people at no cost. Surely that must be a good thing.

Another area in which the Royal Air Force plays an important role is peacekeeping and humanitarian activities. The replacement of the Hercules will be a vital and important decision. We must recognise that the Hercules is the workhorse which is used by the Air Force all over the world at short notice, often to drop humanitarian supplies in some of the most inaccessible regions on the planet. Therefore, when the Hercules is replaced, I hope that it will be replaced by an aircraft which is better but can do the job as effectively. I hope that my hon. Friends on the Front Bench understand what I mean by that, because one often gets an aircraft which is alleged to be able to do the job better but does not do it as effectively. We must be sure about that.

The next matter to which I should like to draw attention is the replacement of equipment. There must be a proper stand-off weapon system for the Royal Air Force. Surely we recognise that individuals in aircraft are at a much greater risk if they must get right over the target to deliver the weapon system. It would be much better if they could deliver a weapon system from the stand-off position. This is no criticism, but during the Gulf war the JP233 was required to fly straight and level over an enemy target to deliver the weapon system, which denied the Iraqis the use of the airfield. That had a cost element. I should like that matter to be dealt with.

I support what the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) said about the Leuchars helicopters. We will never be able to thank enough the units operating the helicopters for what they have done. I regret that the local authorities did not accept my invitation to attend a meeting to be held with a view to seeing whether we could find local authority input in the cost of keeping the facility at Leuchars, and I am saddened by that. Local authorities have themselves to blame for not taking up the opportunity. [Interruption.] In life, it is a question of taking the opportunity. Local authorities did not even consider following up the invitation to a meeting, and I find that distressing and disturbing.

I hope that the Chipmunk's replacement aircraft will be as good to fly and as much of a pilot's aeroplane so that we continue to get volunteers to fly them.

8.47 pm

Mr. Bernie Grant (Tottenham): I do not know much about the Royal Air Force, so I will not engage in that part of the debate. Two years ago, hon. Members and I were taken to SHAPE headquarters by the Royal Air Force, and they treated us very well. During the war, there were a lot of black service men in the Royal Air Force, but I know that that is not the case today. Perhaps the Secretary of State could investigate why that is so. I am disappointed that we will not have a serious motion before the House which we can all debate and that this debate is not solely about the position in Iraq.

In December 1990, I went to Iraq where I met members of the Revolutionary Command Council. As a result of that visit I was opposed to the Gulf war, and I voted that way with a number of my hon. and right hon. Friends. At that time, we said that the Gulf war would solve nothing, and I think that the case has been made. More than 300,000 Iraqi civilians have been killed, and 150,000 children suffer from cholera, typhoid and so on. Iraq has been devastated.

I note that the British Government made a profit on the war and that American firms received lucrative contracts at the end of the war. Perhaps the mistake of the Iraqis was not to invite the Americans to repair the bomb damage that occurred during the Gulf war. If that had been done, perhaps we would not have the present situation.

Since the war, the Iraqis have done well to rebuild Iraq. As the House will know, they have few or no materials because of the sanctions imposed on them. They have done remarkably well to repair bridges and so on.

When the hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson) spoke about the situation of the marsh Arabs, one could not help but feel a lot of sympathy for them. One wondered how the hon. Lady could speak about the Iraqis withdrawing water from the marshes and leaving people thirsty. Coalition forces bombed the waterworks in Baghdad and Iraq, which resulted in hundreds of thousands of people dying from contamination of the water and the diseases which resulted.

I am worried about the double talk and, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) mentioned, about the fraud of this Government and of the Americans with the attacks by the western allies. I notice that they no longer speak of a coalition. The coalition has unravelled, and only a few countries are taking part in the further attacks against Iraq.

The French and the Russians do not impress me. They are speaking out now because George Bush has gone. It is like saying that the schoolmaster has gone so the children can begin to have a go. I suspect that that is why the French and the Russians are speaking out now. George Bush and the Americans ruled the United Nations Security Council with an iron thumb, and the British Government trailed behind on the coat tails.

The point that my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Galloway) made is important. If one takes a cold, calculated look at what is happening, one begins to see a pattern emerge. Muslims in Bosnia are not defended by western allies. The Iraqis are attacked by the western allies; they are also Muslims. The Palestinians have been attacked by Israel but there has not been much of a song and dance by the western allies because they are Muslims. The Libyans are also Muslims. They have also been ostracised and sanctions have been placed on them.

One begins to wonder what the western allies have against Muslims.

Lady Olga Maitland: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Grant: I will not give way. In the language that has been used, the international racism of the western allies has to be seen to be believed. People talk about "spanking" the president of a nation of 18 million people, whether those people like him or not. I suspect that international racism has a lot to do with that. I believe that the recent attacks have been sparked by Bush's hatred of Muslims generally and Saddam Hussein in particular. It is a disgrace that the British Government have blindly followed what Bush did.

Let us consider the justifications which the allies gave for the bombings. They talk about incursions into the no-fly zone. They talk about incursions into Kuwait. The language is not accurate. It was not Kuwait but a demilitarised zone. They talk about Kuwait because they want to conjure up emotional images of what happened before, during and after the Gulf war.

The allies talk about United Nations inspectors and so on. Let us examine the no-fly zone. I specifically asked the Secretary of State for Defence two questions last Wednesday. I asked him about the targets. I asked whether the targets were inside or outside the zone. He said categorically that they were inside. A few days later, on Sunday, we found that the British Government supported the Americans when they sent cruise missiles outside the no-fly zone into Baghdad, killing innocent civilians.

I asked the Secretary of State where he had obtained authorisation for launching the raids. He said categorically that the no-fly zone was authorised in accordance with international law and that the forces were acting in self-defence. That was merely an opinion but it was not backed up by the facts. We were not told what specific aspects of international law supported the allies. We were not told which United Nations resolutions supported the allies. For example, we know that the allies banked on resolution 688, which was carried in April 1991. It referred specifically to northern Iraq and the Kurds.

I quote no less a source than Dilip Hiro, who is an expert in middle east affairs. He said in New Statesman and Society:

"Sixteen months later in August 1992, however, in the absence of any large-scale flow of Shia refugees into Iran or Kuwait, or any formal complaints to the UN by a neighbouring country, the western powers had no grounds for applying Resolution 688 to the situation in southern Iraq. They needed a specific resolution for the purpose. But their soundings at the Security Council showed that they would not get the minimum nine votes required to pass such a motion. Of the seven third-world members of the Council, Cuba, Yemen and Zimbabwe had even opposed Resolution 688; and

[Mr. Grant]

China and India . . . had abstained . . . Having found the road to a separate Security Council resolution blocked, the western leaders resorted to invoking 'unwritten, customary international law' which, they claimed, allowed military intervention in cases of grave humanitarian abuse. Bush went on to describe the western allied air patrols below the 32nd parallel as 'human rights surveillance'. Even the New York Times had difficulty in swallowing this line.

'Fighter jets bristling with missile are not obvious weapons for protecting a human rights monitoring mission'".

The reason why no Security Council resolution was adopted was that the allies could not get the resolution through the Security Council, so unilaterally they set up the no-fly zone. Having done so, they went ahead to say that if Saddam incurred breaches of the no-fly zone, they had the authority to take him out. Of course, not having obtained authorisation in the first place, they did not get it in the second instance.

The Secretary of State talks about self-defence. That is clearly bogus. The former defence secretary of the United States, Dick Cheney, said that Iraqi missiles were so clapped out that they posed a greater threat to the Iraqi troops than the coalition forces.

It is vital that international law is stuck to, especially for countries in the third world. I want my Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen to accept that if they are to support the Government in these matters, it is surely the job of the Opposition to ensure that the Government stick to international law and do not take short cuts. There will come a time when the Opposition do not support the Government in the international arena and the Government will not have a leg to stand on.

8.55 pm

Sir Nicholas Bonsor (Upminster): I know that several hon. Members still wish to speak so I propose to limit my remarks to five minutes. The reason why I speak in the debate is that the predecessor Defence Select Committee to that which I chair made two reports last year which are relevant to the Royal Air Force content of the debate. I wish to make some comments on them.

In the sixth report of that Committee, the European fighter aircraft was considered. The Committee made particular reference to three issues: first, the importance of Germany's continued involvement in the EFA programme; secondly, the scope for efficiency savings in the workshare arrangements; and thirdly, the dangers of making savings by reducing performance.

The fears expressed by that Committee were borne out by events. I am delighted that Germany—I congratulate my right hon. Friends on the Front Bench on their achievement—was persuaded to continue as part of that programme. We learned a great deal during those difficult negotiations about the efficiency possibilities in workshare arrangements and, indeed, to a certain extent, about the inadequacies of the workshare arrangements that were originally agreed. Those lessons must be learnt for the future when we enter other collaborative agreements with our allies.

I understand that my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence referred in his opening speech to the dangers of making savings by reducing performance. I understand that he gave the assurances that I seek, that the British will buy an EFA which is capable of defeating any other aircraft in the sky at the time of its production. That is vital. I apologise to my right hon. Friends that I was not able to be present for that opening speech. The Defence Committee had a long-standing commitment to visit NATO today. That is where I was and from where I returned about half an hour ago.

The second report of the previous Defence Select Committee dealt with short and medium-range air-to-air missiles. It is a development of the same theme as that of the sixth report. I gather that there were substantial difficulties in the collaborative projects which were initiated to replace our short and medium-range air-to-air missiles. Those difficulties have now been resolved. As with the EFA project, there is a great deal to be learnt about the way in which such arrangements are dealt with. Difficulties must be anticipated rather than merely solved with great difficulty during such negotiations.

Turning to the report of my own Committee, we were concerned that the RAF, like other elements of our armed forces, is likely to become severely overstretched. We are concerned that some Jaguar crews are already returning to Incirlik for their third tour. We are concerned about the helicopter and air transport resources available to support operations and the shortage of tankers, given the likely role of the RAF in international peacekeeping affairs.

I would be grateful to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence if at some point he could tell the House what has happened to the decision to order 25 utility EH101s that was announced to the House six years ago by the noble Lord Younger, who was the then Secretary of State for Defence. Since then it appears that no advance has been made on putting that purchase into effect.

I congratulate the RAF on its achievements in the Gulf. We are all immensely impressed by the accuracy of the bombing which the RAF in particular carried out in the past week. The standard of expertise is exemplary. When I was fortunate enough to be at strike command headquarters the day after the Tornado strike, it was noteable just how accurate those strikes had been. The RAF can rightly be proud of its standard of workmanship and we should be proud of the RAF.

Finally, I wholly support, as does the Defence Committee, the Government's efforts to support the United Nations resolutions and to ensure that Saddam Hussein does not go beyond the bounds of reasonable behaviour and contravene the standards that the United Nations has laid down. Clearly, he has been testing the resolutions as hard as he can for the past month or two, trying to take advantage of what he perceived as a potential weakness during the change of presidency in the United States. I have no doubt whatever that we were right to back the efforts to enforce the no-fly zone and to make sure that he did not try again to cross the border with Kuwait and start another incident.

My only worry is that there is a certain lack of clarity about the parameters within which the United Nations should exercise control or those around which we should limit the action that is being taken against Iraq. It must be right to enforce the no-fly zone and ensure that Saddam Hussein does not do any damage to his neighbours and to make sure, in so far as we can, that his behaviour towards the Shi'ite people in the south of Iraq and the Kurdish people in the north remains within the bounds of civilised human behaviour. However, there are limits to the extent to which we are right to bomb Baghdad or take other retaliatory action which puts at great risk civilian life.

I hope that the Government will take note of the resolution of the House to back the United Nations in its efforts to curtail Saddam Hussein, but equally that we do not go too far in provoking unnecessary conflict.

9.2 pm

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): Although I intend to vote against the Adjournment, I welcome certain aspects of the speech made by my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark), who said that we should now seek agreement from the United Nations on all future action. However, if we adopt such an attitude, there should be some feedback in our attitude towards Iraq.

We cannot ignore the position of the United Nations and argue that everything has taken place with the agreement of the United Nations and is entirely justified by past resolutions. There seems to be some inconsistency if we say that in future we shall always act in a certain way, but that the past is the past and does not relate to what we are now seeking to achieve.

In trade union discussions a distinction is drawn between procedural agreements and substantive agreements. That analysis should apply to the United Nations. The United Nations tends to adopt long resolutions suggesting that certain action should be taken, with no provision for follow-up measures. Nor do United Nations resolutions establish which agencies are supposed to act on their behalf. That needs to be contained in the original resolution, and if it is not, we need to return to the United Nations to pass fresh resolutions which agree to action in different areas. I might not necessarily agree with the substantive agreements reached if we did so. I do not agree with many of the measures passed in this Parliament and often seek to speak and mobilise hon. Members against them. If we return to the United Nations and pass fresh resolutions, it will make the actions taken under them legitimate.

What have we got at the moment? Resolution 687 concerns the ending of hostilities between Kuwait and Iraq. During recent events much has been unreasonably built on that resolution. Resolution 688 essentially concerns the Kurds in the north of Iraq and was used initially to justify action in the southern no-fly zone—a zone that does not enter into resolutions 687 or 688, but was decided afterwards. No-fly zones are justified in such circumstances. They are justified in Bosnia, where they have been determined by a United Nations resolution. However, that is not the case in Iraq.

No United Nations resolutions justify the action and no United Nations forces are involved. Forces are not going into action wearing light blue berets and helmets. The United Nations did not decide on the no-fly zone and there is no United Nations command structure for the action in the Gulf as there is in Bosnia, despite all the problems there.

The retrospective endorsement of the United Nations Secretary-General is the only justification for the action. Secretaries-General sometimes get things wrong. It does not follow that because a Secretary-General—even one as prestigious as the United Nations Secretary-General—has said something, it is the correct interpretation of the resolutions that we are acting under.

There can be no justification for the action taken outside the no-fly zone. It is peculiar that the actions taken inside the zone were justified in international law as self-defence. The no-fly zone was established in violation of the sovereignty of Iraq. We told Iraq that as it intended to take action against us, we were engaged in self-defence. That would apply if the no-fly zone happened to be in another country, but not if it is in Iraq.

I was opposed to the liberation of Kuwait, but that action was taken to defend Kuwait's sovereignty against Iraq. On this occasion, we are invading the sovereignty of Iraq. Nothing contained in international law or the United Nation's resolutions can justify the action that has been taken, although there might be developments to justify it.

9.7 pm

Mr. Keith Mans (Wyre): I am grateful for the opportunity to say a few words before the winding-up speeches. I shall not follow the remarks of the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes), but wish to identify myself with the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) about training and the Royal Air Force reserves.

It is fair to say that, since the 1950s, areas of operation for the Royal Air Force steadily shrank until about a year ago. It is ironic that, in the past 18 months, since the end of the cold war and the destruction of the Soviet Union and the Warsaw pact, there has been an increase in the number of areas in which the RAF has operated.

We saw how effective the RAF was during the Gulf war, and in the recent raids over Iraq we have seen the effectiveness of modern weapons systems such as the Tornado and laser-guided bombs. That shows that air power is highly effective. It is both flexible and speedy, it results in minimum loss of life to the aircraft crews taking part, compared with the use of ground troops, and it provides a most effective deterrent in many cases and a key element in peace-keeping, as my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) said.

I believe that in the future we shall see increased use of air power because of the features of flexibility and speed of response. In this respect, it is very important that the Royal Air Force has modern, capable aircraft. Obviously, I am delighted that the Eurofighter 2000 is going ahead, with all four nations taking part. This aircraft is a vital part of the RAF's future. It will provide a first-class air platform on which increasingly sophisticated and advanced systems can be mounted. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker), I am in favour of updating the Tornado GR1 with a stand-off weapon, thus enabling it to carry out raids of the sort that it carried out over Iraq, but with less likelihood of its being shot down.

We must look very closely at our transport needs if we are to have the flexibility of response to which I referred. We need a replacement for the Hercules and we need it soon. It will be necessary, more and more, to use helicopters. As has been said, the EH101 procurement is now very urgent and I hope that there will be action sooner rather than later.

I am convinced that, more than ever, this country needs a balanced, modern and flexible Air Force equipped with all the main components of air power and able to respond effectively whenever the need arises, as, tragically, seems likely to occur ever more frequently in the future.

9.11 pm

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): It is right that the House should be debating today the situation in Iraq. Although, from the point of view of the RAF, particularly on the 75th anniversary of its creation, this debate arrangement is less than satisfactory, it is proper and appropriate that the House should have the opportunity to consider the development international crisis and deteriorating military situation in Iraq. Had the change of business not been announced, I should certainly have sought, on behalf of the shadow Cabinet, an emergency debate on the subject of Iraq.

I express my personal congratulations to and support for the RAF on its 75th anniversary. I also support the excellent speech made by my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) at the beginning of the debate.

I want to begin by stating our position quite clearly. The position of Labour is support for United Nations resolutions, for decisions of the Security Council and for actions based firmly and clearly within the terms of those resolutions. If international order and decisions are to mean anything at all in an increasingly disordered world, I can see no course other than to act on that basis through decisions of the Security Council.

I expressed our position on these issues in a letter to the Foreign Secretary as long ago as 20 August 1992, when I said that we would support the creation of a no-fly zone in the south of Iraq, just as we had supported the establishment of the no-fly zone in the north. Both those decisions were based on requests from many countries and on many international demands that action be taken to prevent genocide against the Kurds and the Shia Muslims in Iraq. I said in that letter, and I repeat now, that we would not support air strikes against other targets in Iraq. For the sake of clarity, I shall quote from my letter:

> "I also want to make clear our position in relation to any proposed military attack on ground targets in Iraq. I strongly believe that no such attack can be justified or should be made unless and until the United Nations Security Council has considered the matter."

When the attack took place last weekend, following consultation with my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields and the Leader of the Opposition, we immediately demanded the recall of the United Nations Security Council to discuss the situation and to establish clearly what the position was.

It was right for us to have done that and we were pleased when other countries joined in that call. As has been said in the debate, we were sorry that Her Majesty's Government did not immediately adopt that approach. I was sorry for another reason: I did not believe it right that in the last 48 hours of his mandate, the then President of the United States should be initiating that sort of action.

I wish also to make it clear that we cannot accept, nor do we regard, the decisions of any President of the United States as synonymous with decisions of the UN Security Council. It is important for us to be clear that the authority of the UN, which I support and want to see upheld, including in Iraq, must have the widest possible coalition of support. It is dangerous for the United States to jeopardise the coalition for action and the wide-ranging support that has been established.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor rose——

Dr. Cunningham: I will not give way yet.

I hope that the new President of the United States, whose election I warmly applaud and whose success has delighted my hon. Friends and me, will be extremely cautious about moves against Iraq—or, for that matter elsewhere, including Bosnia—to ensure that whatever is done has the legitimate suport and agreement of the UN Security Council. I cannot make my position and that of my party clearer than that.

Saddam heads a bloody, villainous and deceitful regime, but the position of Her Majesty's Government has not been altogether coherent or consistent in regard to that regime. It was all right for the west and the allies to help create the monster war machine in Iraq. It was all right for that to be built up year on year so long as that war machine was aimed at Iran. It was a different matter when that same war machine turned against western interests, as ultimately it did in Kuwait, and there was horror and dismay at those events.

Again, my party supported the decisions of the UN —it was right for us to do so; I support them strongly, then and now—to take action to dismiss that territorial aggression. But the record of Her Majesty's Government in all those matters should not be ignored or obscured in the present circumstances. I regret to say that, even now, the British Government are giving confused signals to Iraq.

During Foreign Affairs Question Time last week, I raised with the Secretary of State details of an article in the Sunday Mirror of the previous week-end. There was a degree of derisory laughter on the Conservative Benches because the Sunday Mirror had disclosed that our Foreign Secretary was issuing visas to authorise visits to this country by Iraqi business people—agents of the Saddam regime—to discuss new deals with GEC. Far from laughing now, Conservative Members look sombre. They should, because the Foreign Secretary confirmed to me in a letter this week that he had authorised such visits and that discussions had taken place.

It is deplorable—I am not suggesting that any deal has been done—even to be discussing with the Saddam regime deals on the one hand, while, on the other, we are sending our airplanes against them in support of UN Security Council resolutions. With the Conservative party, business is always business. That is the view they take. Business is always business, especially when the chairman of the company involved is none other than Lord Prior, a former Conservative Cabinet Minister.

I strongly urge the right hon. Gentleman, in the interests of keeping the coalition together on this issue and of better understanding and clearer messages to the Saddam regime, not to issue any more such visas to Iraqi business men to come to this country unless and until we have the situation in Iraq under control; until Saddam has accepted the decisions of the United Nations; until military efforts have ceased and that dialogue has begun. In those circumstances it may be acceptable, but certainly not until then.

Mr. Madden: Will my hon. Friend contrast the ease with which Iraqis have been able to obtain visas to come here to buy arms and sophisticated telecommunications equipment with the extraordinary difficulty I have had in persuading the British Foreign Office and Home Office to give visas to a 63-year-old Iraqi woman who urgently needs medical treatment in this country?

Dr. Cunningham: My hon. Friend makes his point effectively, except that I am not suggesting that these latest visits were to discuss arms contracts, but the previous visits were. That is the case.

I reiterate that we support United Nations Security Council resolutions on Kuwait and we supported the establishment of the air exclusion zones because it was quite apparent that Saddam was practising genocide against his own people, using poison gas against the Kurds in the north. If anyone doubts what is going on, they should read the excellent report of my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), who has just returned from Iraqi Kurdistan to report to us that thousands of Kurdish villages have been obliterated by the Saddam regime—reduced to rubble—and people slaughtered, including women and children.

While I give second place to no one in deploring what happened at the al-Rashid hotel, the reality is that Saddam himself has killed many thousands more of his own citizens in trying to suppress the development of democracy in his own country. So we fully and wholeheartedly support the actions in support of the air exclusion zones. We cannot accept a situation in which our own pilots and air crews, in pursuit of those air exclusion zones, can be threatened by Saddam's forces on the ground.

I want to see an end to all these military actions and to see stability return to the region. I guess that those aims and objectives are shared by everyone in the House, but until Saddam Hussein is willing to accept the terms of the ceasefire and to accept the right of the United Nations and the force of the Security Council resolutions, it seems to me unlikely that those actions can be put in abeyance.

I want to make one other important point about stability in that region which has been the most threatening region to world peace for at least the past four decades. We need to keep together in the coalition the Islamic nations that have supported the action against Saddam Hussein from the outset. Therefore, we need to demonstrate to them our even-handedness and the even-handedness of the United Nations in pursuit of Security Council resolutions.

We warmly welcomed and rejoiced in the election of a Labour Government in Israel but we deplore their treatment of the Palestinians, which is clearly in breach of international law, specifically the fourth Geneva convention. We have told them in no uncertain terms that they should rescind their decision immediately. I make that clear again. In that connection I urge the Foreign Secretary to respond to the PLO's request to meet him in Israel together with representatives of Egypt, Jordan, Syria and Lebanon to discuss this and other matters and the peace initiative generally which, as everyone agrees, is important. The Government of Israel have persuaded their Parliament to agree to talks with representatives of the Palestinians and there is no reason why our Government should not take the same approach. I urge the Foreign Secretary to do so.

I have spelt out our position on these matters. I shall now deal with the escalating situation and the deteriorating international scene. I supported much of what the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) said. The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell), who spoke for the Liberal Democrats, made one of the best speeches in the debate. We simply cannot continue tit-for-tat indefinitely. The Foreign Secretary has my sympathy and, in most respects, he also has my support because I realise how difficult it must be to deal with a regime that is entrenched in suppression, torture and extermination.

We should be working through the United Nations in the best interests of all the people of Iraq for greater stability in the region so that acts of war, military actions, can cease and some kind of dialogue can begin. I do not rule out more action, but we must try to persuade Saddam Hussein to accept the decisions of the international community authorised by the Security Council. He must promise to stop actions against his own people in the north and south or elsewhere in Iraq. If he can be brought to those terms, some dialogue must be initiated.

To bring additional pressure on him, I urge the Government and the coalition allies greatly to improve and strengthen their communications, links and dialogue with the democratic organisations which represent various groups of Iraqi people in capitals around the world. That should be used far more effectively than it has hitherto to bring pressure to bear on Saddam's regime.

Our support can be based only on that kind of approach; on legitimate decisions, actions and objectives agreed internationally in the United Nations. The sad fact is that the United Nations is currently overloaded with demands. It is weak, underfunded, under-resourced and overstretched. Support for the Secretary-General is nowhere near sufficient to enable him to respond to the demands that are continually heaped upon him and his staff.

I hope that we will see a change in the Government's attitude towards support for the United Nations. Perhaps I had better reiterate that I am a strong supporter of the United States of America, and certainly of that country's newly elected President. However, we cannot allow the United Nations to be denied subscriptions from the USA on the one hand and to be persuaded to take military action in lieu of those subscriptions on the other. We should not accept that kind of pressure on the United Nations.

I hope that problem can be tackled—as we intend to tackle it in our developing dialogue with the new Administration in Washington. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] I am not surprised by the looks of amazement on the faces of Conservative Members, but it is clear that they do not have many friends in the new Administration. Any hope that they had of a flying start was rather derailed by the kind of person and the nature of the campaigning ideas that they sent to support President Bush in the American elections.

Mr. Mans: So that we may get the record straight, will the hon. Gentleman say how many other nations that are members of the United Nations are not up to date with their subscriptions?

Dr. Cunningham: Yes, I regret to say that the number is large. I am not suggesting that the problem is only with the United States of America. I am merely urging the Foreign Secretary to start taking action to resolve the general underfunding of the United Nations. I do not for one moment suggest that the fault is wholly that of the United States of America.

Before I conclude, I want to mention the circumstances of Paul Ride and Michael Wainwright, who were arrested and are being arbitrarily detained, having committed no crime other than to wander innocently over the border into Iraq. Again, that is an illustration of the nature of the regime that we must face and with which we must try to deal.

I have discussed their case with the Foreign Secretary on more than one occasion, and I know that he is acting consistently on behalf of those two men. I urge him again tonight to redouble his efforts to seek the safe release of those two British subjects—as my hon. Friends the Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) and for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard) have consistently done.

We have never pretended from this Dispatch Box that the problems are easy to resolve. We do not suggest now that the solutions are simple. However, there is, or appears to be, a lack of any coherent strategy towards resolving the problems of Iraq and of securing greater stability in the whole region.

We urge the right hon. Gentleman and the Cabinet to adopt a change of course in that regard if, and only if, the commitments that I have spelt out can be secured from Saddam Hussein. If they cannot, and if Saddam Hussein persists with threatening the coalition forces and with acts of genocide against his own people, we shall be as authoritative as anyone in calling for continued action against his regime.

I hope that Saddam Hussein will listen to reason. That would be the best outcome for everyone—including, I regret to say, Saddam Hussein himself, to whom I offer no sympathy or support at all. Neither does anyone sitting on the Opposition Benches. If Saddam Hussein will not listen to reason, he should be left in no doubt that the will and authority of the international community must be made to prevail. That will and authority, based on Security Council decisions, will have our implacable support.

9.34 pm

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Douglas Hurd): The House will be grateful to the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) for his concluding words.

The debate has two perfectly respectable parents—the Royal Air Force and the Gulf—but it has emerged as a mongrel. I apologise to hon. Members who have raised points related specifically to the RAF. I shall ensure that they are answered by Defence Ministers, as has been requested.

I wish to respond to the part of the debate that, as it were, intruded on the original debate. I have been present for most of it, but I missed two speeches that were clearly outstanding—those of the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) and of my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson). I did hear some exceptional speeches, however, including the shrewd contributions of my right hon. Friends the Members for Guildford (Mr. Howell) and for Bridgwater (Mr. King), and the eloquent tirade of the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn).

I do not think that there is any serious doubt or confusion about our objectives in dealing with Iraq. We have three: to maintain the integrity of Kuwait; to eliminate the threat of Iraqi nuclear and chemical weapons; and, as far as we can, to deter Saddam Hussein from attacking the Kurds and Shias who live within the frontiers of Iraq. Those aims have two things in common: they are all underwritten by the United Nations, and an attempt has been made to undermine all three in the past fortnight.

The underwriting by the United Nations is clear. The first objective—the maintaining of Kuwait's sovereignty—is contained in UN resolutions 678 and 687. The second, relating to nuclear, biological and chemical missile capabilities, is dealt with in resolutions 687 and 707, which authorise the inspection teams. The third is contained in resolution 688, which demands a stop to repression of the Iraqi civilian population. Resolutions 706 and 712 are sometimes forgotten, but they could become important again. They allow the sale of oil to finance humanitarian relief, including relief for the Kurds.

As I have said, each of those objectives has been threatened in the past few weeks. Let us take the first, the integrity of Kuwait. On the Kuwait border, Saddam Hussein sent organised armed teams into what is now legally Kuwait to retrieve Silkworm missiles. He refused to return the missiles, and failed to evacuate police posts in the demilitarised zone by the deadline set by the Security Council. As for the second objective, relating to nuclear and chemical weapons facilities, Saddam did what he has done before. He presented several obstacles, and sought to impose several conditions, to prevent the UN Special Commission from carrying out its appointed task. He refused to allow UN Special Commission flights to enter Iraqi territory, and placed restrictions on the use of aircraft and helicopters inside Iraq.

As for the third objective, Saddam deployed missiles threatening coalition aircraft in the no-fly zone. In the north, Iraqi forces repeatedly harassed and attacked humanitarian convoys taking much-needed food and medical supplies, forcing them to be temporarily suspended.

Why was the effort made, quite suddenly, to undermine all three of the objectives of our policy, which were underwritten by the United Nations? I do not believe that Saddam Hussein is a madman, but he is certainly a gambler. He thought that he could gamble on what he perceived as a moment of uncertainty and weakness in the west because of the end of the current United States Administration. He was wrong, and it was desperately important to prove him wrong. That sums up the point of the action that has been taken in the past few weeks.

If Saddam's challenge had gone unanswered, he would have gained a substantial advantage in the world. Our aims would have been put at risk, and our friends—including some who, perhaps a little belatedly now that President Bush is out of the way, have expressed criticisms—would have been the first to evince nervousness and apprehension, and to suggest that we had begun to lose our nerve and desert our objectives.

I am sure that it was right to respond legally and proportionately, and the result has been that, for the moment, the wrongdoing and undermining have stopped. The news today is not all about peace—I readily acknowledge that—but the UNSCOM flight has now arrived in Baghdad with United Nations personnel aboard. We shall have to see how those United Nations representatives are treated and how they are able to operate when they get going.

As the House has heard, there has been an incident in the northern zone today, in which Iraqi radar may have locked on to a coalition aircraft resulting in that aircraft firing a missile. That incident is very recent and the facts have not yet been fully established. I mention it to the House to show how careful one has to be if one is to ensure that the pause for which we hope is sustained.

The hon. Member for Tottenham (Mr. Grant) and others have referred to the legal position. I believe that, unlike Saddam Hussein, we have paid scrupulous attention to international law. In response to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd), I would say that we believe, and we are advised, that we have acted throughout in accordance with the charter—which is not always the same thing as specifically acting under a specific resolution. Hon. Members will know of that important distinction, which has always been sustained. We have to operate within international law; we intend to do so, and have done so.

Mr. Benn: Can the Foreign Secretary tell the House whether, in all the recent cases, Boutros Boutros Ghali was brought in to the consultation before the military action was taken, as he made no statement after the first bombing? We were told today that he had retrospectively endorsed it, but was he consulted by President Bush and the British and French Governments before the decision to take that action was made?

Mr. Hurd: I cannot, without notice, give the right hon. Gentleman the dates of the contacts between the western Governments and the Secretary-General, but those contacts have been consistent and continuous. The right hon. Gentleman is clutching at straws. He knows perfectly well that, when the Secretary-General has been given the opportunity, he has made his views known very specifically in support of the action. The right hon. Gentleman is on to an entirely false point.

The coalition and its permanent representatives in New York made clear to Iraq the basis for the no-fly zone: indeed, that has been clear to Iraq for a long time. The zone was created as a result of Iraq's failure to comply with resolution 688. The House has discussed this before and hon. Members will be aware that we believe that the no-fly zones are fully justified in international law by the need to protect people whom they own Government will not protect or who, as in this case, are repressed by their own Government. The right of self-defence flows from that assumption and that action.

We also believe that the action against Iraq's nuclear facilities was fully in accordance with international law. In its statements of 8 and 11 January the Security Council —whose statements have to be approved unanimously—determined that Iraq's actions, such as the obstruction of UNSCOM flights, were material breaches of resolution 687, the resolution that established the formal ceasefire. In those circumstances, other parties to the conflict in the Gulf have the right in international law to take necessary and proportionate measures to ensure that Iraq complies with the terms of the ceasefire. I believe that we acted in accordance with internaional law, and we will continue to do so.

Mr. Harry Barnes: Was the bombing of Baghdad really justified because there were logistical problems involving United Nations observers having to travel through Jordan to get to Baghdad instead of flying through the no-fly zone? That is what it amounted to at that stage.

Mr. Hurd: There was a great deal of discussion with the Iraqis on that point in New York. What became perfectly clear—not the first time but the second time, because we gave the Iraqis a pause on this matter—was that the Iraqis' aim was to impose conditions and to put the United nations teams in a position in which they flew by grace and favour of Saddam Hussein. That is contrary to the United Nations resolution and to the statements of the Security Council to which I have just referred. That was the aim. What the actual condition suggested was of secondary importance. The aim was to remove the unconditional right of the United Nations teams to operate to show the world that the threat of nuclear and chemical weapons had been removed.

The hon. Member for Tottenham made a sincere speech. However, I ask him to consider his line of thought that the world and the west are manipulating the United Nations against Muslims. I ask him to think about Afghans, Somalis and Kuwaitis who have been helped in recent years, at some sacrifice to others, by the international community. They are Muslims, and injustices do not simply affect Muslims. The world is full of injustices against all people. I hope that the hon. Member for Tottenham will pause before he pursues that line of argument.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) raised a specific point about the relationship between Customs and Excise and the Department of Trade and Industry. As the hon. Gentleman would expect, I must say that that issue will fall to the Scott inquiry. However, the hon. Member for Linlithgow should bear in mind the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, West (Sir J. Spicer) that our reputation among the Iraqis, who were in a position to know, was not of looseness but of tightness in comparison to others in respect of administering controls.

Mr. Dalyell: The problem arises when one part of the Government, the Customs and Excise, does the enforcing while another part of the Government lays down the policy. If the enforcers—the Customs and Excise—do not know, as is claimed, what happened in DTI negotiations, that makes justice impossible.

Mr. Hurd: I am aware of the hon. Gentleman's coherent point. However, the question clearly falls within the remit of the Scott inquiry and I will not deal with it tonight.

We have heard much from some Opposition Members about the imminent collapse of the coalition. I would take that point more tragically if I had not heard exactly the same prophecies over and again in our debates during the Gulf war. We did not have a debate in which I was not solemnly informed by newspapers or by Opposition Members that the whole thing was coming apart, that everyone was deserting, and that it was only the majority on the Conservative Benches who were sustaining the policy. That is nonsense.

Of course, misgivings have been expressed and I do not complain about that. That is natural enough when the situation is fast moving and decisions have to be taken.

[Mr. Hurd]

However, as I have said, those misgivings would have been much greater if we had sat back and done nothing and allowed events to unfold without any reaction. People would then have been disturbed. The coalition would then really have begun to come unstuck.

I want now to consider double standards, but only briefly because I will not be able to do it justice. The issue of double standards loomed in the debate, as it looms in criticisms, particularly from the Muslim world. Hon. Members on both sides of the House who are close to the Muslim world quite rightly reflected the issue in their speeches.

The Secretary-General of the United Nations told me last week that there are about 25 points of conflict in the world. Are we to do nothing because we cannot do everything? We cannot be content with many of those points of conflict. We must exert ourselves, but we must exert ourselves in different ways according to the different natures of the conflicts.

In that regard, I will mention only one conflict because reference has been made to it and because it is the other big conflict in the middle east. That problem is the plight of the Palestinians. We need to demand action from Israel on that matter. The deportations are illegal and a menace to the peace process.

I have already explained my view about the matter in person to the Foreign Minister of Israel. When he meets the Foreign Ministers of the Twelve on 1 February, we will have an opportunity to ram that point home, unless, as I hope, a solution to the problem has been found by then. We believe that the deportations are not simply wrong, but, as has been said, are a serious mistake, even allowing for the provocation of the killing of Sergeant Major Toledano.

Even today, we are trying to help. In response to a request that we have received, we will tell the parties concerned that, if they can agree on a further humanitarian visit by the Red Cross to those who have been deported, RAF helicopters from Cyprus will be available to help as necessary, provided that we can be satisfied about the security aspects of the operation. This is a small but important example of the way in which, because we are there, because we are skilled, because we are willing, we can quite quickly help to unravel and defuse a situation.

I should like to mention the plight of Mr. Ride and Mr. Wainwright——

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Hurd: I will give way to the hon. Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross).

Mr. Ernie Ross: I appreciate that the Foreign Secretary has many areas to cover and many points to make, but it really does the House no good—we discussed this on Tuesday—and it does those who are trying to keep the middle east peace process on track no good simply to say that the 415 Palestinians who are stuck somewhere between Israel and Lebanon are the major block to people accepting that we are being even-handed in the middle east. Every single day, Israel breaks international law, and one simply cannot get away with saying that some helicopters will be sent and that this will answer the problem. Something specific must be done. Why go ahead with the meeting on 1 February when they are still there? Why not make some gesture?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Member has made his speech; he must not make it again. It is unfair to pick out the point about the helicopters. I simply used it, as it is a piece of news, to illustrate in a particular way the kind of thing we could do to help. Of course it is not a total response. The Israelis must find a way of dealing with this particular problem which they created, under provocation. A lot of work is going on to bring this about. The hon. Member knows that because I told him the details, but he probably knew it already. I hope and believe that the work will be successful. If it is not successful by 1 February, our meeting with the Foreign Minister of Israel will not be a sort of reward for Israel but an occasion on which to make this point very clear. It is partly why I am saying it now.

We are not leaving this aside or saying that it is negligible, because it is going to be an obstacle in the way of removing the injustice that the hon. Member has devoted a large part of his life to removing. We want to remove it. It will be removed by the peace process. It will be removed not by sanctions but by the peace process. We must liberate the path to the peace process, and that is what we are trying to do.

Dr. Cunningham: I appreciate the Foreign Secretary allowing me to intervene when time is short. If he wants to do something concrete and specific, why does he not, as the Israeli Government have now agreed to do, meet and discuss these matters with representatives of the Palestine Liberation Organisation?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman knows that the Israeli Government have agreed to no such thing. They have agreed to remove a law which makes it illegal for Israeli citizens to do so—quite a different proposition. We have constant contracts with the PLO which are valuable to us and, I think, to the PLO. We last saw Mr. Qaddoumi in Tunis a few days ago. Ministerial meetings have been suspended since the Gulf war, for good reasons. I regard this as a matter of usefulness. If I could be persuaded, which I have not yet been, that it would be useful to us or to the peace process, we could change the level, but that is the position at the moment.

I was about to refer to Mr. Ride and Mr. Wainwright, who are suffering what we regard as grotesque sentences of imprisonment, sentences which are disproportionate to the offence. The hon. Member for Copeland, my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Luff) and the hon. Members for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) and Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard) continue to press me; we continue to make sure that the men are visited and we will do all we can to secure their release. Russian diplomats in Baghadad visited both men on 15 January and again yesterday, 20 January. They reported that the men are physically well and have suffered no adverse treatment in recent days.

My hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West stressed the suffering in Iraq, and other hon. Members have rightly referred to it. I entirely agree with her. We must do our best, despite all the political turmoil, to get help through. That is why, although it is imperfect, I support the Secretary-General's memorandum of understanding to enable the humanitarian activities to continue in Iraq. Obviously I support what we are doing steadily to build up the help that we give through the Overseas Development Administration both in northern Iraq and in the south.

I will spend the last few minutes on the plea which has come from many parts of the House for forward thinking and for a strategy. It is more easily asked for than provided, but nevertheless it is a perfectly legitimate demand, and this is the moment at which we ought to meet it.

As regards Iraq, I do not dissent from the closing part of the speech of the hon. Member for Copeland. The first step is for Iraq to show in practice that it is complying with the resolutions. Until that happens, we have to keep all our options open, as the hon. Gentleman said. Of course, Gulf security is the framework of this.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) referred to Iran, as did other hon. Members, and quite rightly. It is a factor, and there is understandable anxiety about the policies of Iran.

Obviously, in an ideal world, Gulf defence is best carried out by Gulf countries. This is something that I urged on all the Gulf states after the Gulf war. I must admit that I have been disappointed by the extent to which they have come together, and come together with Egypt and Syria, despite the Damascus declaration, in order to provide worthwhile machinery for their own defence. Iraq is not a helpful factor in that; it is a threatening factor at the present stage.

I thought that my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup was a little churlish about Kuwait. I first went to Kuwait, as he reminded the House, in his company, under his tuition. He went to Kuwait in 1968 so that he could explain to the Kuwaitis how he would defend them for a long time, and how Mr. Denis Healey, as Secretary of State for Defence, was wrong in proposing that we should cease to defend them. I believe that that instinct of my right hon. Friend was perhaps rather more soundly based than the instinct on which he spoke today.

Of course, we cannot be rash or seek to do things beyond our strength, but we have an obligation to work closely with the Kuwaitis in meeting their defence needs, and an interest in doing so. We have had no request to send a battalion of troops, so I am not talking about that. I am talking about our memorandum of understanding, the kind of joint air exercise that we had last December, visits by the Royal Navy and the advice that we give on defence. I believe that that kind of co-operation between Kuwait and Britain, in the situation in the Gulf, is reasonable and should continue.

As regards Iraq, we will continue to enforce sanctions. We will insist on inspections. We respect the integrity of Iraq and we know that it will remain an important middle eastern country. But, before it can fit into a general framework, it needs to comply with its international obligations. They are onerous because we are dealing with a country which was a recent aggressor. We are vigilant because of the past record of deceit, and, with our allies, we have to insist on compliance with these obligations and maintain our vigilance.

I turn finally to the general point to which the House ought to return—the question raised by several hon. Members of peacekeeping in these 25 trouble spots. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence made a notable speech on this yesterday to the Royal United Services Institute for Defence Studies. This will be one of the big questions and problems for all of us: the role of the United Nations, which, as has been shrewdly pointed out, is moving from dealing with acts between one state and another to dealing with acts within a state—South Africa first, resolution 688, and Somalia since then. This is a big move, but the United Nations is not equipped to deal with it, partly for financial reasons and partly because of the lack of staff and equipment available to the Secretary-General.

Then there is the role of the United States, the only super-power, but not wishing to dominate. Right hon. and hon. Gentlemen are simply misguided about that. They will find great continuity between President Clinton and former President Bush. They will find a desire to make sense of what they call the new world order and they will want a good deal of help from their allies in doing that —not in a relationship of master and servant, giving orders and carrying them out. When the records of the conversations over this last weekend are revealed, as when earlier records are revealed, they will see that that was not the relationship. The position of the United Kingdom and the role which we should play, not always but when we can, to make a British contribution by those means will lead to a slightly safer and more decent world.

Question put, That this House do now adjourn:—

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act of the present Session resulting from the Osteopaths Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of any expenditure incurred by the Privy Council under the provisions of the Act relating to the default powers of the Privy Council.—[Mr. Sackville.]

PETITION

Pit Closures

10.10 pm

Mr. Alan W. Williams (Carmarthen): With your permission, Madam Deputy Speaker, I beg leave of the House to present a petition organised by the Welsh region of the Coalfield Communities Campaign. The petition is against the colliery closure programme announced by British Coal and the Government last October. It has been signed by more than 28,000 people from all parts of Wales and states:

Whereas your petitioners pray that your Honourable House decide to halt the proposed pit closures and to re-examine the total economic case and instruct the Government to withdraw the proposals by British Coal to close the collieries previously identified.

To lie upon the Table.

Manufacturing Industry (Dunstable)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Robert G. Hughes.]

10.12 pm

Mr. David Madel (Bedfordshire, South-West): I am grateful for the opportunity to have a short debate about the future of manufacturing in the Dunstable area, which has made a massive and sustained contribution for many years to the prosperity of Bedfordshire and the country.

The debate has been caused by two press announcements in December. The first was from Renault Trucks and stated:

"The production of the 50 series vehicles and Midliners at Dunstable will cease in the Spring of 1993 and the headcount will be progressively reduced from 520 to 240 employees."

One week later, our local newspaper, the Dunstable Gazette, covering the employment situation, stated:

"The announcement adds further to the depression already felt locally following the receivership of Renault's truck neighbour, AWD and the selling off of the business in October."

Continuing sustained efforts are being made by the work force at Renault to try to get the decision to end production reversed. Help is being sought—if it can be—from the European Community, and negotiations are under way. One sentence stands out from the submission that the work force have made to Renault management:

"The work force is proud of its capabilities and its commitment to flexibility, economics and quality."

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will understand how, even at this late stage, everyone in Dunstable hopes that a solution can be found to keep Renault manufacturing trucks in Dunstable, as it has done successfully in the past. Trucks are to Dunstable what steel was to Corby—a town not far from Dunstable near the Bedforshire border. Dunstable can recover, but we need help—as Corby had help.

Dunstable has a great bank of industrial skills and benefits from an innovative and imaginative education service, provided by Bedfordshire local education authority, as well as two grant-maintained schools in the town, plus a highly successful college of further education.

I appeal to my hon. Friend the Minister for some action and help along the following lines. First, there is a strong case for a derelict land grant for our area. I want the Department to talk urgently to South Bedfordshire district council, which is greatly concerned—as am I, and the people in the town—about our industrial base. The need to find out what can be done about the former AWD Bedford site is especially urgent, as it will need considerable adaption to attract new industry. Discussions should not be confined to the AWD site, as the entire Dunstable and Houghton Regis area needs an urgent and in-depth study so that it can try to obtain a derelict land grant.

The figures for spending on derelict land grants show that, in 1991-92, £18·25 million was spent in the north-west and a mere £0·65 million in the south-east. That is an imbalance, which should be corrected given the recession that we are suffering in the south-east.

Secondly, the Urban Regeneration Agency will soon be created, once the Housing and Urban Development Bill gets through the House of Commons and another place. I urge on my hon. Friend the importance of the fact that the activities of that agency are not directed away from the south-east, as we have a problem that I believe that the agency can attend to and help us with.

Given the situation in Dunstable and the problems in the truck industry, discussions continue on whether we could qualify for enterprise zone status. I and every hon. Member will welcome the announcement by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade about one-stop shops and his invitation for bids to set them up. I think that I am right in saying that the bids must be with the Department by 29 January.

On page 10 of the document that sets out what the Department of Trade and Industry want are these words:

"Bids should take the form of a detailed strategy document for the creation of a 'One Stop Shop' in a defined area and should demonstrate, where appropriate, how this development fits within the context of the broader economic development strategy for the area."

That is what we are looking for in the Dunstable area—an economic strategy for us, given the difficulties that we face.

I hope that one final matter can be attended to. Training and enterprise councils are a thoroughly welcome back-up for areas that suffer sudden and severe increases in unemployment. To work properly they must respond quickly and flexibly to unemployment, which means moving funds swiftly to areas that they cover which are suddenly confronted with great employment difficulties. The Bedfordshire training and enterprise council is effective, but, given the difficulties of the Dunstable area, it needs an extra boost. What is needed is Government help to attract new industry into the area.

I should like to end with a word of warning and a word of encouragement. The word of warning is about housing. Before the employment base in the Dunstable area has been sorted out and re-established, we must take another look at the numbers and types of houses that we are required to build under Bedfordshire's structure plan and at the time scale for that building programme. A big imbalance between housing development and employment opportunities is arising in the south of the county. Now is the time for a fresh and urgent look at that balance.

Then there is my word of encouragement. We need to emphasise constantly what the Dunstable area has to offer to prospective new industry. I have mentioned the education that we provide. There is also our long history of industrial harmony on the factory floors, our bank of industrial skills, our modernised railway lines on both the east and west sides of Bedfordshire, the forthcoming widening of the M1 and, of course, our excellent regional airport at Luton, which could handle far more air traffic, passengers and freight than it does at present.

Dunstable has suffered a great industrial reverse—one of the greatest yet seen in the south of England. In view of all the help that has been given to the various regions of this country since the end of the second world war, I hope that the Government will be able to respond favourably and positively to the specific requests that I have made for help for our area. The town can recover, but we need help.

10.21 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Technology (Mr. Edward Leigh): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, South-West (Mr. Madel) on his success in securing a debate on this important issue. I know that he is assiduous in the interest he takes in all matters affecting his constituency. The House will be grateful for his comments.

I share my hon. Friend's concern over the rise in unemployment, although I note that the rate of unemployment in the Watford and Luton travel-to-work area remains below the national average at 9·5 per cent. Naturally, I very much regret the redundancies that have taken place at Renault Trucks and AWD. However, while Renault's manufacturing operations at Dunstable are to cease at the end of March, the French parent company has assured the United Kingdom management that the Dunstable site remains a key part of its European strategy. Dunstable will still employ 240 people involved in customising imported vehicles, engineering design and sales and training.

Of course, my hon. Friend has been actively involved in helping Renault to formulate its future plans for Dunstable. Furthermore, although AWD has ceased manufacturing operations at Dunstable, the acquisition by Marshalls of Cambridge of its four-wheel-drive production has safeguarded 30 jobs in Cambridge and may create another 30 new jobs in the future.

Despite the job losses which my hon. Friend has described, there are a number of promising signs that local industry will be well placed to take advantage of the rise in demand as the recovery gets under way. The United Kingdom car industry has continued to perform well despite a difficult economic climate both at home and overseas. Indeed, there are encouraging signs of renewed growth in the United Kingdom market. There was not only a marked increase in car sales in December, but a slight but encouraging increase for 1992 as a whole over the previous year. Production in December was up by 19·8 per cent. compared with the same month in 1991. Prospects are also improving overseas. Exports in the three months to the end of October—the latest figures available—were up 7·5 per cent. over the previous quarter. This is a most impressive performance in view of the economic slow down abroad.

I am also encouraged to see that the commercial vehicle market—this will particularly interest my hon. Friend—is emerging strongly from the recession. Makers of heavy trucks, which were probably worst affected, will, I am sure, be encouraged by the strongest monthly rise in sales in five consecutive months of recovery. Sales of vans, trucks and buses overall were 7·7 per cent. higher in December than in the same month last year.

Indeed, the local motor industry has been part of the promising national signs of recovery. Vauxhall has remained competitive in a difficult trading period. The company has exported surplus production to the German market through its General Motors sister company. I note with satisfaction that it has had considerable success in improving productivity per employee and that last year's figure for the Luton plant was 9·4 per cent. up on 1990. Production increased from 40 to 47 cars per hour, and 70,725 cars were exported in the same period.

A similar picture of increasing productivity and strong order books is seen in the exciting joint venture between General Motors and Isuzu—IBC Vehicles—where the Frontera range is doing extremely well. At nearby Leighton Buzzard, Boss Trucks, one of the world's leading fork truck manufacturers, is planning a 400,000 sq ft extension to its existing factory. That not only safeguards the position of the present work force, but offers the potential for an additional 500 new jobs.

The strength of those vehicle manufacturers creates opportunities for other related companies in the Luton-Dunstable area. Local component manufacturers, including General Motors components manufacturer AC Delco, benefit from supplying Vauxhall, which last year spent £117·7 million on components and £71·3 million on other services from companies in Bedfordshire.

My hon. Friend cited the example of the closure of the steel industry in Corby as a parallel to the position in Dunstable, but there is an important difference. Dunstable is set in a much larger urbanised area which, until recently, was one of the most buoyant parts of the country. In contrast, Corby was much more isolated. Dunstable is within easy commuting distance of the expanding city of Milton Keynes, where my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Walden) recently reported that over 6,500 jobs had been created in the past few years.

However, I am much aware that Dunstable has not been able to isolate itself from the broad effects of the downturn in the national and world economies. By the same token, as the United Kingdom pulls out of recession, so we can expect to see the tide turn for the economy of the Dunstable area.

Government economic policy is aimed at hastening that recovery. In his autumn statement, the Chancellor of the Exchequer set out clearly the Government's new framework for economic policy. I believe that the measures announced will promote recovery, to the benefit of all enterprises—large, medium and small.

I have no doubt, for example, that the housing market will benefit from the £750 million available this financial year to buy up some of the empty properties in the owner-occupied sector. The construction sector will be given a further boost by the temporary relaxation of rules governing the use of capital receipts. Housing and construction have faced particular difficulties in the past two years and those measures will help to provide a much needed boost to confidence.

The temporary rise in capital allowances from 25 to 40 per cent. for the first year of investment in plant and machinery should also help to bring forward private sector investment. The abolition of special car tax will provide a direct boost to the motor industry, an industry which lies at the heart of British manufacturing and is particularly significant to my hon. Friend's constituency.

I note my hon. Friend's comments on the Urban Regeneration Agency. Its primary aim will be to bring vacant and derelict land in urban areas back into use. It will be expected to concentrate on urban priority areas and assisted areas, but—this will be of interest to my hon. Friend, as he made a point of mentioning it—it will also take over responsibility for derelict land grant and will be able to assist local authorities and the private sector with the reclamation of derelict land wherever the need arises. However, it will need to consider any such requests against its priorities for urban regeneration and wider land reclamation.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment operates the derelict land programme to deal with problems of dereliction. The derelict land survey showed that, in 1988, south Bedfordshire had 76 hectares of derelict land justifying reclamation.

Historically, there has been little demand for derelict land grant in Bedfordshire, because market forces have generally been strong enough to secure the reclamation of derelict sites. Resources have therefore, for obvious reasons, been directed to sites that needed extra assistance. From 1989 to 1991, two schemes received aid totalling £106,000. In 1992-93, three will receive grant totalling £60,000, and 93 per cent. of this money will be paid to local, authorities and the remaining 7 per cent. to private bodies. The amount of grant available in Bedfordshire in 1993-94 is not yet determined, but a number of applications have been made to my right hon. and learned Friend's Department, and grants will be made as resources permit.

I am sure that my hon. Friend is aware of the specialised nature of the AWD and Renault premises. Their suitability for re-use or redevelopment is best assessed by prospective buyers. If they consider that the premises pose significant problems, they are at liberty to apply for a grant from my right hon. and learned Friend's Department, or, when established, the urban regeneration agency. Grant could then be awarded for any eligible works, subject to the availability of resources at the time.

I have taken careful note of what my hon. Friend has said today, and I will make sure that my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Department of the Environment are made aware of his concern. I hope that he will be reassured by what I have said about derelict land grant.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment is aware of the general stagnation in the housing market across much of the country including south Bedfordshire. He is also aware that housing need exists in many places which could be helped by bringing into use some of the empty houses at present standing unsold. The Government therefore announced in the autumn statement a £750 million housing market package which will be channelled through the Housing Corporation to a selected number of housing associations which will buy houses in the market.

The aim of the scheme is to stimulate the depressed private housing market by buying up around 17,000 homes from a variety of sources. This will need to be done before the end of March.

In south Bedfordshire, this will be undertaken by the Bedfordshire Pilgrims housing association, which will be handling the package allocated to the whole of Bedfordshire, except for Luton. A total of £6·5 million has been allocated to the Bedfordshire Pilgrims housing association, which, in conjunction with some half as much again from the housing association's own resources, borrowed by it from the finance market, should allow the purchase of approximately 190 housing units. Possibly one third of these would be in south Bedfordshire. Some will be purchased from builders who have empty houses that they have completed but have not been able to sell. Some will be from estate agents who have empty houses on their books awaiting sale. Some will be from building societies which have empty houses which they have repossessed through mortgage default and which are at present unoccupied.

Among the range of options available to the South Bedfordshire district planning authority in promoting urban regeneration and economic activity is the establishment of simplified planning zones. As a result of this debate, I will make sure that there is proper liaison between the local district council and my right hon. Friends in the Department of Environment. I hope that that is of help to my hon. Friend's constituency.

Simplified planning zones supplement the enterprise zones which my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has designated in various parts of the country. They establish an alternative approach to the control of development which allows the planning system to work more effectively and efficiently in designated areas. Under the procedure for establishing simplified planning zones set out in the Department of the Environment's planning policy guidance note No. 5, it is for the local planning authority to consult widely on the desirability of such zones and before the preparation of such a scheme. The provision of enterprise zones is a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, and local planning authorities must apply to him for the designation of zones where they consider that there is a special case which cannot be addressed through the use of simplified zones.

My hon. Friend asked about the responsiveness of training and enterprise councils to major redundancy announcements such as the one in his region. TECs are, of course, designed to be responsive to local needs. Their boards are made up of business men and others drawn from local communities. The DTI regional office in Cambridge expects to receive the Bedfordshire TEC business plan for the next financial year at the end of this month. It is anticipated that the TEC will be seeking to deliver business counselling, a business information service and business skills training. The business plan will apply to the whole of Bedfordshire, but will certainly take into account the particular needs of the Dunstable area.

Once a business plan is agreed, it is not set in stone. The plan can always be revised in the course of a year to respond to unanticipated events affecting the labour market. As a result of the debate, I shall ensure that our DTI regional office is made fully aware of the problems to which my hon. Friend has alluded, and we shall have to see how the TECs can be best encouraged to help my hon. Friend's constituency.

My hon. Friend will be aware of the wide range of help that is available to businesses in his area to enable them to become more competitive and expand their markets overseas. More than 1,000 companies in the county of Bedfordshire have benefited from the expert advice of the DTI's enterprise advisers, and 390 of these have gone on to receive subsidised consultancy help intended to improve and strengthen those companies' performances.

Many companies in my hon. Friend's area also take advantage of the wide range of services that are available to help the exporter develop sales in new markets and identify new market opportunities through the overseas trade services. Together with the Bedfordshire chamber of commerce, the DTI has an extensive programme of seminars and clinics on helping companies to penetrate new markets.

My hon. Friend has a first-rate record on helping companies in the export field. He will be aware of the efforts being made by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade to promote exports. Again as a result of the debate, I shall ensure that our new export promoters in the DTI are made fully aware of my hon. Friend's concerns about export promotion.

Support for technology-based businesses is available through grant aid for individual companies under the SMART competition and the SPUR scheme. The former is for companies employing up to 50 persons and the latter for those employing up to 500 people. Both are for innovative product and process development. Almost £500,000 has so far been awarded to Bedfordshire firms under these schemes.

[Mr. Edward Leigh]

In addition, the Department, with EC support, is providing substantial support for collaborative research. It is also funding the establishment of an industrial unit at Luton college to ensure the commercial exploitation of technological developments in the area. My hon. Friend's area is particularly noted for its technological prowess, and I hope that we can ensure that any available money is channelled to companies with worthwhile schemes there.

My Department's very popular "Managing into the 90s" programme, aimed at exposing senior management to the very best management practice, was hosted by Texas Instruments in Bedford in one of the first management action briefings. My first ministerial visit was to Texas Instruments, and I have taken a close interest in the company ever since. Since that time, Cranfield school of management has co-ordinated the "competitive edge" manufacturing workshop programme, and following the DTI east launch of the regional "Managing into the 90s" programme on 9 December, we will be offering firms from the county the opportunity to explore management best practice in some of the medium and small companies in the region as well as staging a further series of specialist management seminars.

My Department, through its regional office in Cambridge, is working closely with local agencies, particularly the Bedfordshire and district chamber of commerce and the Bedfordshire training and enterprise council to improve and widen the range of services available to business. The DTI gives financial support to the chamber's export development adviser, whose role is to give advice and help to new and passive exporters. We have supported the chamber's recent very successful mission to Malaysia and Singapore, which included a number of Bedfordshire companies, and we will be supporting missions in 1993 to the USA, Malaysia and Singapore.

We are working closely with the TEC, the chamber, local authorities and other bodies to improve collaboration and co-ordination of services to medium and small enterprises by delivery through a single site in Luton, which could form the basis for a bid under the DTI's new one-stop shop competition, which my hon. Friend particularly mentioned. His area could be successful in that competition. No doubt my hon. Friend will wish to encourage these developments and will ensure that the submissions by the organisations in his area are of the highest calibre. I hope that there will be successful bids from Bedfordshire.

My hon. Friend will appreciate that this substantial and wide range of advice, help and financial support will be of longer-term significance in establishing a strong base for the future growth of business in the Dunstable area.

I fully understand the importance of manufacturing to the Dunstable area and to the economy of Bedfordshire as a whole, and my hon. Friend put his case forcefully tonight. The latest employment census shows that 30 per cent. of the Bedfordshire work force are engaged in manufacturing. I assure my hon. Friend that the Government are committed to the maintenance of a strong manufacturing sector and recognise the crucial role that it plays in the national economy.

Manufacturing accounts for more than one fifth of our total output, one fifth of total employment, and four fifths of visible exports. The Government believe that the recession should not be allowed to obscure the manufacturing achievements of the 1980s, which saw high growth rates and sustained improvements in manufacturing performance.

United Kingdom manufacturing output is up by more than one fifth on 1981—the trough of the last recession. Productivity is up by nearly two thirds, investment by one third, and export volume by four fifths. Export volume since 1981 has grown faster than in France, Germany, the United States of America, Japan and Italy.

Despite the recession, exports and productivity are both at record levels. The gains of the 1980s will not be wiped out by the recession, and manufacturing is well placed to benefit from the resumption of growth.

Businesses in Bedfordshire are particularly well placed to take advantage of the anticipated upturn and to repeat the benefits that will come from the completion of the single market. I assure my hon. Friend that my Department will play its part in ensuring that businesses in his constituency are in a good position to derive their full share of the benefit from the recovery.

Question put and agreed to.

House of Commons

Friday 22 January 1993

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

PETITIONS

Stoke Mandeville Hospital

9.34 am

Mr. David Lidington Aylesbury): It gives me great pleasure to present a petition about the future of Stoke Mandeville hospital, in my constituency. It is signed by 12 residents of Aylesbury and the surrounding area. However, the sentiments expressed therein are common to a much larger petition signed by about 27,000 people in Aylesbury and the surrounding area but the wording of which did not conform to the regulations of the House.

The petition reads:

That Stoke Mandeville Hospital has for many years provided health care of a high standard to local people, that the Hospital has gained a high reputation, not only locally, but nationally and internationally and that people are now fearful that this high quality health care may not be available in the future.

Wherefore your petitioners pray that your Honourable House may urge Her Majesty's Government to make proper provision so that Stoke Mandeville Hospital can continue to offer medical treatment of the highest quality to all patients referred there.

And your petitioners as in duty bound will ever pray.

To lie upon the Table.

Visitors (Right of Appeal)

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): I have pleasure in presenting a petition, which I strongly support and which is signed by many of my constituents and residents of south London, mostly from local churches and voluntary organisations, about the removal of the right of appeal for visitors which is contained in the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Bill which will come back to the House from another place.

The petition reads:

That Great Injustice will be done by the Provisions of the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Bill in removing from those wishing to visit the United Kingdom any appeal against refusal of a visa or Entry Certificate; that under the present system a substantial number of appeals against refusal of leave to come to the United Kingdom as visitors are upheld by independent adjudicators; that friends and relatives wishing to come together for family occasions or in times of bereavement as well as joy may be prevented without any recourse to appeal and this will cause much resentment and hardship and injustice.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your honourable House will reject the Provisions of the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Bill.

My constituents and the petitioners hope that the petition will have some effect in correcting what they regard as a gross injustice against them, their relatives and their friends.

To lie upon the Table.

St. Bartholomew's Hospital

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): I have the honour to present a petition urging that St. Bartholomew's hospital should not be closed but saved. The House will recall that Professor Tomlinson dismisses 900 years of history in seven paragraphs. Millions of people around the country do not wish St. Bartholomew's to close. The petition is signed by 126,000 people, in addition to the 500,000 people who delivered a petition to 10 Downing street only a month ago.

The petition reads:

The Humble Petition of the patients and friends of St. Bartholomew's Hospital
Sheweth

That St. Bartholomew's Hospital is an indispensable resource for the health and welfare of the local community, a national centre of medical excellence, and provides all patients with a high quality of care.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your honourable House do all within your power to ensure that St. Bartholomew's Hospital remains open for the benefit of local residents and patients who rely on its services and would be harmed by its closure.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c.

The petition is strongly endorsed by me, thousands of my constituents, and hundreds of thousands of Londoners.

To lie upon the Table.

Orders of the Day

Shops (Amendment) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

Madam Speaker: I have not selected the amendment in the name of the hon. Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) but, of course, its subject matter may be referred to in the course of the debate.

9.39 pm

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

I am pleased, Madam Speaker, that you are in the Chair to call me to open this important debate. I intend to cut short my speech, which would normally take half an hour or 45 minutes if Second Reading were being moved by a Minister or by one of our Front-Bench spokesmen. I am aware that many hon. Members wish to participate in this major debate and, although I am the promoter of the Bill, it would not be fair to deny hon. Members, whatever their opinions, the opportunity to speak simply because it had taken 45 minutes to move Second Reading. I hope that my attitude will be reflected in the time taken by other hon. Members who speak.

I am glad to see that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, have now taken the Chair, because when you were elected to your position you promised me that you would take the opportunity of calling me on 22 January. The House will note that you have not even been able to do that—and that since you were elected you have not called me at any time.

I introduce this Bill on behalf of my sponsors. Sometimes sponsors simply add their names to private Members' Bills and forget that they have done so, but that has not happened with this Bill. The sponsors have met regularly for discussion, and the Bill has been dealt with collectively, as an all-party Bill, from the day that I presented it until this morning. I am glad to report to the House that the Bill was presented with unanimous agreement. Hon. Members from the Conservative and Labour parties, and the deputy leader of the Liberal Democrats, discussed it at the meetings.

This is not a Labour party private Member's Bill. I do not know whether it has the backing of the Labour Front Bench—perhaps we shall be told that later, if at all. I pay tribute to my sponsors and hope that they will be able to catch your eye later, Mr. Deputy Speaker. They have given the Bill exceptionally loyal and industrious support and encouragement.

I thank, too, the Keep Sunday Special campaign workers, especially Michael Schluter, David Blackmore, Paul Diamond, Hannah Reed, Claire Barford and John Alexander, who have worked so hard for such long hours for so little remuneration to prepare the way for today's debate. I also thank Garfield Davies and Bill Conner of the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers—and especially my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. Turner), the chairman of the Co-operative parliamentary group, and the members of RECOST, the Retailers Council on Sunday Trading, especially retailers such as CWS, the CRS, the John Lewis Partnership, Iceland, C and A, Etam and Greggs, as well as many others who have given unstintingly towards developing and preparing my Bill.

I also thank all the main church denominations which over the years have continued to uphold the principles of keeping Sunday a special day for friends, family and voluntary activities. Those are the principles for which my Bill stands. Ten minutes ago we had prayers. I should like to thank the people who have prayed for me and for my sponsors, and who have prayed that the House will consider the question seriously on behalf of church denominations and organisations throughout the country.

At this point I declare my interest, in the hope that others who may have an opposing view will declare their interests, even if they are not mentioned in the Register of Members' Interests. Because of selfish interests, millions of pounds are being spent in the fight by those who oppose the Bill. I am proud to be the senior sponsored Member of Parliament on the USDAW parliamentary panel. I represent in the House the interests of 350,000 shop workers, and I seek to promote their concerns whenever I can. They are among the poorest paid workers in the country, and the measures that we are debating are vital to protect their income and their quality of life.

I believe that Lloyd George once said that democracy means government by discussion—but it becomes effective only if one can stop people talking. I hope that that will be a lesson to us all. Let us hope that our contributions will be brief so that all hon. Members may participate.

Before outlining the Bill, I shall put three questions to the House. First, should not right hon. and hon. Members ask why it has taken the Government from 1986 to November 1992 to offer the House a measure to reform Sunday trading? Why has it taken six and a half years for the Government to spring to life when the need for reform has been evident to everybody?

The second question is, why has it been necessary to delay until the end of January the Second Reading of a private Member's Bill which was drawn number three in the ballot in May 1992 and had its First Reading in June 1992? Is there a hidden agenda to prevent this Bill from reaching the statute book? [Laughter.] I warn Conservative Members who are laughing that one of the opportunities that the House gives to Back Benchers is the right to introduce private Members' Bills. If we are lucky in the ballot immediately following an election, and come out at number three, even in a long Session such as the present Session, we do not expect to wait eight months before our Bill is given a Second Reading debate.

The Government know that we have only until November before a new Session starts. With three months for the summer recess, and a month or so for Easter and Whitsun together, four months of that time will be taken out. What earthly hope have Back Benchers of their Bills becoming law, even in a long Session, when the Government do not allow the House to debate Second Reading until eight months after their Bill is presented? That is scandalous, and it is time that something was done in the House to protect Back Benchers' rights.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Powell: I will not give way. The hon. Gentleman may be called later. I know that a number of hon. Members who share the hon. Gentleman's opinion want to be called as well.

My third question is why a Government who are committed to law and order enforce every Act on the statute book except for one. Is there any financial link between the retailers who break the law and the party that allows them to do so? That question should be replied to. It is no good the Government hiding behind the cloak of Europe or behind the other cloaks they have used for two or three years and allowing their supporters flagrantly to break the law, which is causing concern throughout the retail industry.

I shall now deal with the goals of the Bill. Today's debate is not about the details of the Bill, because they will be debated and sorted out in Committee. Our debate today is about the cause for legislation. Our debate is about ends, not means.

I have here a booklet entitled "Towards a New Shops Act." I hope that all hon. Members have received a copy. I have sent copies to all 650 hon. Members to ensure that they are aware of the Bill because it is so involved and complicated. On pages 6 and 7, I have set out the seven goals which are the basis of the Bill.

The first goal is to guarantee a common day off for family and community activities, including church worship. The second is to protect the right of workers not to work on Sunday. The third is to protect vulnerable smaller retailers from pressure to work a seven-day week.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Powell: I have already said that I will not give way. The hon. Gentleman and I get on very well in the House, but I do not want interventions which take up a lot of time.

The fourth goal is to protect our high streets and those who use them. The fifth is to protect those living near shopping centres or main roads. The sixth goal is to provide for the reasonable needs of consumers and the seventh is to prevent unfair competition. I hope that hon. Members will note that consumers' convenience is only one factor in resolving the Sunday issue. It would be unfair only to consider consumers instead of striking a balance among the various groups with an interest in whether shops open on Sunday.

Some hon. Members who speak today may wish to spend the time of the House in pointing to minor problems and anomalies in the drafting of the Bill—[Laughter.] It is nice to have a laugh. We do not have the backing, as some hon. Members have, of the big retailers and, therefore, of their legal teams. We do not have the services of Government-paid parliamentary draftsmen. Even if we had, I remind the hon. Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall), who is a supporter of the Government, that, whenever a Bill receives a Second Reading and goes into Committee, a ream of amendments is tabled, not by members of the Committee, but by the Government. The hon. Gentleman should not laugh at a Bill that is constructed by people who are volunteers. Let us have some substance in the debate today and not shibboleths.

There is one decisive question before the House today: do we want to keep Sunday a special day or not? No other legislation, apart from the Bill, will guarantee to keep Sunday special.

I have some words for those who object to my proposals. Some say that we can deregulate without any adverse effects. That is an attractive argument because it implies that we can have our cake and eat it. Advocates of that view say that we should look at Scotland where there is already Sunday trading. My reply is that we should indeed look at Scotland, but that we should look at it carefully and not superficially.

In the major cities, Sunday trading is already the norm for many Sundays of the year and it continues to grow rapidly. Many shop workers are on single time and have no day off in lieu. Church attendance has dropped sharply, which may or may not be associated with the growth of Sunday shopping.

Closer to home, let us consider what has happened to Good Friday in England and Wales. It was once a quiet day like a Sunday. Competitive pressures have now made it like any other shopping day because we did not pass legislation to protect it.

It is said that people want Sunday shopping. That argument rests on opinion polls. After the election, hon. Members must have realised how unreliable those polls are. Some years ago, I attempted to introduce a ten-minute Bill to stop the taking of opinion polls during elections and by-elections. I had tremendous support from the House, but, unfortunately, as usual, the Government did not afford me the time to get the Bill on the statute book.

It is true that 5 per cent. of the population go to supermarkets on Sunday—I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) is one of them. It is also true that 95 per cent. of the population do not. They are the silent majority who neither want nor need Sunday trading. I well understand why my hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow may occasionally shop on a Sunday. As you know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, he is in the House of Commons from dawn to dusk every day of the week.

It is said that there is no feasible way to design a law on Sunday trading which will work. How are such laws made to work in almost every other European country? Almost 300 million people out of the 340 million in Europe are governed by laws restricting Sunday trading. The House knows that where there is a will, there is a way.

I shall now deal with the key points of the Bill, which are set out in the booklet "Towards a New Shops Act". I will not repeat them except to outline the four main areas. First, certain types of shop would be allowed to open. The Bill is based on a list of shops and not on a list of goods. Shops that opened could sell all the goods in the shop. Secondly, the types of shop that we wish to allow to open are summarised in the word "REST", which stands for recreation, emergency, social gathering and travel.

Thirdly, we propose a system by which shops will register with the local authority if they want to open. That would ease enforcement and the registration system would be self-funded. Fourthly, there are detailed provisions for employee protection. Given the difficulty of enforcing employee protection in practice, the employee protection in the Bill stands on two legs. The first leg is that most shops would be shut, so most employees would not be asked to work. The second leg is statutory protection for the minority who would have to work.

If the House gives the Bill a Second Reading today, I should welcome discussion in Committee on a number of controversial details of the Bill, such as whether we should allow do-it-yourself shops to be included in some form of definition. We could also discuss whether the size of the corner shop should be increased from 1,500 sq ft and whether all shops should be allowed to open for two or three Sundays before Christmas. I realise that strong views are held on each of those points, and we shall be able to consider the arguments in detail in Committee.

[Mr. Powell]

As I have just said what I expect to discuss in Committee, let me once again quote Lloyd George:

"I would rather be an opportunist and float than go to the bottom with my principles around my neck."

That is important when we consider whether to accept the option that we are proposing.

Pages 31 to 33 of "Towards a New Shops Act" contain a list of organisations. Appendix 2 lists those who support the REST proposals. Hon. Members will note that that represents a formidable number of people, but it is by no means the entire list. I have been heartened by the amount of mail that my sponsors and I and the Keep Sunday Special campaign have received supporting the REST proposals.

I am sure that all hon. Members in the Chamber today will have received a considerable amount of mail in support of the REST proposals. I received a card last week which stated, "Chin up." It was a note of encouragement from no less a person than Joy Brodier of Bedford who sent that now famous postcard to Terry Waite. In her card to me, she said that any help that she could give on the REST clause would be readily available.

On her card, Joy Brodier wrote that she had sent Christmas cards and requests for Keep Sunday Special proposals to the Secretary of State for the Home Department, the Secretary of State for Health and the Secretary of State for Employment as well as to that Education chappie whose name she could not remember —and we can all understand why. She also said that today's debate would be taking place the day before her 40th birthday. She hoped that it would be a cause for rejoicing. I share her sentiment.

Retailers who have written to me claim that it is not commercially viable for most retailers to trade every day of the week. Six days trading would merely be spread over seven. There is no extra money out there to be spent and, as margins in food retailing leave no room for manoeuvre, seven-day trading would inevitably increase costs and they, in part, would have to be passed on to the customer.

Currently, some supermarkets claim that Sunday trading is boosting turnover. All I can say is that they are stealing business from those who are upholding the law. One major retailer stated on that issue:

"We have a human side too and staff welfare and community issues have also played a major part in our argument. Of our 11,000 staff, 80 per cent. work in the stores and many of them would be called upon to work on a Sunday rota. For some it may not be an inconvenience, indeed for a few it may be welcomed, as double time may well help the family budget. But for most it would be an unwelcome intrusion into their family lives."

Of course, supporters of deregulation are making great play of their support for workers' rights and many of the big names have promised to ensure that only volunteers will work the Sunday rota. However, business cannot operate on a voluntary basis. Pressure will be brought to bear and, within a few years, Sunday working will become the norm for up to 2 million retail and supporting staff. Hon. Members should note that up to 2 million staff may be affected by our decision today.

Smaller shops are not restricted to the high street. Most street corners and village centres have a local store that serves the immediate community and, dare I say it, provides the Sunday newspapers and other essentials that are part of what makes Sunday special. Many of those stores are suffering now and more will be forced to close if Sunday becomes a free for all.

How do community issues fit into the equation? I use that concept in the broadest sense to encompass quality of life. Sunday trading must encourage the move to out-of-town shopping. Malls, retail parks and superstores are most likely to attract the Sunday shopper. The high street is already under threat in many areas. If inner-city life is to be encouraged to thrive, its lifeblood of trade must be preserved.

Let us be clear: Sunday trading will devastate shopping as we know it. That will happen not tomorrow, not next year and perhaps not in this millenium. However, the next generation will certainly suffer the consequences of shopping totally geared to suit the articulate, better-off and more sophisticated members of society.

The Bill, based on the REST proposals, clearly states that those small shops should be alllowed to trade. However, for them to argue their own case against deregulation would obviously be seen as protectionist. Indeed, it may be, but the implications of those community shops disappearing affect us all. We will be affected by noise, pollution, transport and the general hustle and bustle that are part of the rat race that we endure today. Surely Sunday trading can only make life more hectic and disruptive. One day of peace and rest, for whatever recreation one cares to follow, must be sacrosanct and it should be preserved.

We feel that the only people who want Sunday trading are non-shop workers. However, do they realise that if Sunday trading is approved, they too will eventually have to work? After all, people have only one wage packet per week, in whatever way or on whichever day they spend it. More hours to work would mean larger wage bills and that would put many small shops out of business.

Most shop staff work overtime at Christmas and in respect of late night shopping six days a week. Sunday trading would mean late nights and seven working days. That would mean 365 days a year of shopping and 365 days of hustle and bustle with no pause after six days to recharge. There would be no time for family lunches, family teas or family visits. There would be no time to visit mum or dad, grandma or grandfather, no time to worship and no time for recreation.

Shop workers would have no chance to spend one day a week with friends and family. There would be more pressure on young people to work the whole weekend. There would be more pollution, more noise, more traffic wardens. Security officers, cleaners and caterers would be forced to work. There would be no proper compensation for working unsocial hours. One's life would be controlled by one's employer for seven days a week. There would also be higher prices as retailers covered costs. At that rate, shop workers and all those involved in retailing would surely be returning to Victorian times.

I am sure that hon. Members will be glad that I have now turned to the last page in my notes. Winston Churchill once stated:

"Sunday is a divine and priceless institution . . . a necessary pause in the national life . . . it is the birthright of every British subject . . . our responsibility, privilege and duty to hand on to posterity."

Most of us will unreservedly agree with those sentiments.

Let me appeal to all right hon. and hon. Members, because this may be the last chance to protect the traditional English Sunday in the form that so many of us enjoy. I ask the House, not from any financial interest or for reasons of private gain or for selfish motives, but for the sake of our grandmothers and grandfathers, mothers and fathers, sons and daughters, grandsons and granddaughters and our future grandsons and granddaughters and generations to come, to let them live to enjoy what we have enjoyed. The House should vote for my Bill today and keep Sunday a special day for ever.

10.10 am

Mr. Michael Alison (Selby): It is a great honour to speak second in this debate, following the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell), as one of the co-sponsors of his Bill. If I may say so, the hon. Gentleman has manifested the qualities of patience, doggedness, subtlety, courtesy and, occasionally, ruthlessness. That is the prerogative of Members of the Whips Office in every part of the House down the ages. As part of my association with the hon. Gentleman, I hope that I shall never lack a pair on a critical Bill.

It is both daunting and intriguing to reflect on the fact that, whatever view we take about Sunday trading and whatever side we are on, we have in common that we are all trying to conquer a peak—the formulation of a reasonable framework of acceptable Sunday trading laws. The formulation of such a reasonable framework has baffled and defied the most expert political and parliamentary mountaineers throughout the century. Endless Back Benchers have tried and failed to produce a sensible framework for Sunday trading. Even Baroness Thatcher found this particular peak beyond her extraordinary political skills. So the question is: will we, this generation of the House, be the crew which will pull off the final assent? Will my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Home Office, who is sitting on the Front Bench this morning, be the Minister who goes down in history as the guy who got to the top?

Against that background, it is reasonable to remind ourselves of the common ground which both assault teams share, so to speak. I doubt whether there are any hon. Members in the House who do not subscribe to the practice and principle of a day of rest for ourselves and our fellow human beings. We will probably go further on the same common ground and specify that the day of rest should be in the proportion of one in seven. The seventh day off, but not necessarily Sunday, seems satisfactorily sanctioned by culture, tradition and the natural rhythms of exertion and relaxation, whatever one's religious views may be.

I would go further and argue that there is another important reality in the amount of common ground which is shared on both sides of the debate. Supporters of both options lie in different parts of the House. The approach of the Keep Sunday Special campaign is echoed in the Bill. The other element of common ground between, say, the Keep Sunday Special campaign and the Shopping Hours Reform Council is not only the validity and necessity for a day off but that the day off should be the same day off for as many people as possible.

I am struck by the extent to which those who want more Sunday shops to open or more Sunday shopping hours than the present Shops Act 1950 allows argue that Sunday shopping is an important aspect in itself. Sunday shopping is a family and social recreation. Shopping is essentially something that Mum and Dad and the children can do together precisely because Sunday is a general day off from work and school.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): I will be brief. This is very much a British matter and a matter of important domestic legislation for us to put right, and therefore one should not look too much overseas or to Europe at other examples.

It is interesting to reflect, however, that in Germany, for example, the national day of rest is solemnly enshrined in its constitution as a sacred principle. The most successful welfare capitalist economy in Europe enshrines the national day of rest as a sacred principle, and German retailers fully accept that. Why can United Kingdom retailers not accept the same principle? As we do not have a written constitution in the United Kingdom, is not the excellent Bill sponsored by my right hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Alison) and the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) the best way of dealing with the problem?

Mr. Alison: I am not sure whether I am sad or glad about my hon. Friend's intervention because I was doing my best to emphasise common ground and therefore trying to keep Europe and religion out of the argument. If my hon. Friend insists on introducing Europe and religion, let me endorse the fact that the religious Catholic Italy, the secular non-religious France and the Catholic and Protestant Germany, as European partners and neighbours of ours, all subscribe to the common principle which keeps Sunday special. The Shopping Hours Reform Council shares the view that there should be a day off for most people and that that day should be Sunday. I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point.

The real issue about Sunday trading is not essentially one of principle nowadays; it is one of degree. Nearly everyone agrees that there should be a day of rest and that the day of rest should apply to as many people as possible for family reasons. The real question then is whether we should maximise the extent of Sunday trading, compatible with giving as many people as possible a day off and on the same day, or whether we should minimise within the agreed framework the extent of Sunday trading. I have no doubt that the answer is that we should minimise, not maximise, the extent of Sunday trading for the reasons that I have outlined.

Mr. Harry Greenway: Does my right hon. Friend accept that, with the clearly established pattern of rest on Sunday for most of the population, the best way of preserving a single day of rest for most of the population is to leave things as they are, with suitable minor amendments as proposed by the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell)?

Mr. Alison: I very much share my hon. Friend's view. However, I do not want to rest too much on the idea of leaving things as they are at present, because in place today is something positive and constructive but which introduces the notion of some change. I partially go with my hon. Friend, but essentially we agree.

To maximise the scope for Sunday shop opening, which is the approach adopted by the Shopping Hours Reform Council, for example, we might improve the quality of life at the margin for millions of people. I entirely endorse and recognise the improvement in the quality of life which there might be for a large number of people. The trouble is that it would cause much more acute detriment to a smaller number of people. It is like that old joke about the pig and the chicken discussing the significance of bacon and eggs—the egg being relative and marginal for the chicken and the bacon being absolute and final for the pig.

The argument of proportionality should direct our attention, above all, to the smaller number of people for whom the detriment of more widespread Sunday opening is more akin to the fate of the pig than the inconvenience of the chicken. If Sunday opening is maximised, shop workers may have real difficulties with their jobs—their consciences, getting the premium rates of pay which all agree they should have if they must work on Sunday, their family life and so on. The same applies to various ancillary workers who would have to be drawn in to sustain and support those who had to work on Sundays if the maximised approach were adopted.

In some ways, the most serious detriment would be suffered by the tens of thousands of small shops run by individuals or couples. For reasons of competition they would have to open seven days a week and they might literally find it lethal—this is getting close to the fate of the pig—to have to open seven days a week with no relief.

So the detriment caused by maximising Sunday opening would be serious for certain categories, although they would represent relatively small numbers of people. Against that background, the detriment to the millions who would find Sunday shopping convenient and enjoyable, is relatively minor, although not without significance.

It is an interesting phenomenon that where shops open on Sundays without restriction there is a tendency for more and more people to switch their shopping to Sunday. We should weigh the implications of that. Once we liberalised the laws, there would be an intensification of the tendency to shop on Sundays and, therefore, of the detriment to those who are most vulnerable. The very fact that there is a tendency for shopping to move to Sundays when there are no restrictions emphasises, paradoxically, the essential postponability of shopping. If people switch their shopping to Sunday, it means that they give priority on Saturday or Friday afternoons or evenings to activities which are more important to them, such as sporting, cultural or family events. People might say that as the shops were open on Sunday they could leave the relatively minor task of hunting around for the spares or whatever they need to Sunday because it is less important. That shows the postponability and marginality of Sunday shopping for the millions of people for whom it is a convenience but not a critical factor in their lives. They are content to switch their shopping to Sunday if the shops happen to be open.

Mr. Terry Dicks (Hayes and Harlington): If people want to do their shopping on Saturday should they have access to sporting activities on Sundays, which means that people have to work on Sundays? I am confused about my right hon. Friend's point about sporting activities on Sundays.

Mr. Alison: I did not touch on sporting activities on Sundays. I said that people who postponed their shopping to Sunday did so because they wanted to spend Saturday doing other things which had greater priority in their programme, including sporting events and so on. Therefore, it would be more convenient to them to do things which are less important to them on Sunday. That is the only point that I make in that context.

For the reasons that I have given, I believe that a minimalist approach to Sunday trading is both reasonable and humane. The Bill presents a rational but positive framework for Sunday trading based on the REST acronym of the hon. Member for Ogmore, which stands for recreation, emergency, social activities and transport. That gives us a reasonable framework of minimalist opening.

Mr. John Marshall: My right hon. Friend said that the Bill would help those who want recreation. Is he aware that it would close the vast majority of garden centres in England?

Mr. Alison: That point is disputed. My hon. Friend heard the speech by the hon. Member for Ogmore. He said that he was introducing essentially a negotiable framework against the background of a minimalist approach. If he is prepared in Committee to think about the prospects for DIY, he is clearly prepared to think about tidying up any doubts at the margin about garden centres. Essentially the approach is to allow garden centres to be open. If there is any doubt about that, let my hon. Friend join the Committee and table appropriate amendments. I am sure that the hon. Member for Ogmore will consider them.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman's experience is the same as mine. He might confirm that some of the fears expressed by garden centres were expressed by people who looked at earlier definitions than the one contained in the Bill, which refers to a wide range of goods, characterising those sold in garden centres, which can be sold under the Bill.

Mr. Alison: I am particularly glad to note the little firmness on the Benches immediately in front of me of colleagues who have picked out a specific item which worries them. Our essential approach in the House today should be to make the decision in principle on whether to go for maximalist or minimalist approach to Sunday opening. As the hon. Member for Ogmore has already said, if the House allows us to follow the Keep Sunday Special campaign lines, many of the technical and specific points will be negotiable in Committee within the framework of the minimalist approach.

I hope that the House will endorse the approach inherent in the Bill and think about the detriment caused to small numbers of people at the cost of relatively limited inconvenience to millions of others.

10.25 am

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): There are private Members' Bills and so-called private Members' Bills. Some are genuinely private Members' Bills, others are not. Those which are not are Government Bills masquerading as private Members' Bills. They are Bills which Departments of State have failed to have included in the Queen's Speech and which Ministers, or their Parliamentary Private Secretaries, hawk round among hon. Members who have won high places in the private Members' ballot. Those who accept them from Ministers tread the primrose path to the statute book. They are given a drafted Bill, speeches and briefings for all stages, and the virtual certainty of achieving Royal Assent.

I sometimes think that such Bills should carry, parenthetically, after their short titles, the letter (G), so that people here and in the country will see just how many "private Members' Bills" are, in fact, Government Bills and, therefore, how much of the parliamentary time allocated to private Members is used instead for Government legislation. The point is one which the Select Committee on Procedure might like to consider.

The measure of my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) is a private Members' Bill properly so-called and I honour him both for his independent spirit and his success in presenting a Bill so worthy of enactment. He has given the House a Bill which is the first serious attempt to reform Sunday trading law in a sensible and practical way. It respects the special nature of Sunday, while allowing a reasonable range of activities to be pursued. The Bill offers the best possible way of tackling a mess which gets messier week by week.

I have the honour to be sponsored by the Co-operative movement, the first ever Labour and Co-operative Member of Parliament for the city of Manchester. In declaring my interest, I declare also my pride in being a representative here of a movement whose traditions are among the most admirable this country has to offer.

While there are some details of the Bill we shall want to examine closely in Committee, in particular the case for increasing to 3,000 the square footage limit on small shops allowed to open and the need to allow travel agents to do so—they are concerned purely with recreation—the Co-operative movement supports the Bill as the best framework for reforming the Sunday trading law. In our view, it is far better than the alternatives, which offer only variations on the theme of total deregulation.

Our support for the Bill has four bases: first of all, social policy. We believe that the traditional Sunday, characterised by the opportunities that it gives for recreation with family and friends, is of high value and worth preserving.

Mr. Dicks: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Morris: In fairness to other Members who want to speak, I cannot give way; more especially as a Privy Councillor, I owe it to them to speak briefly if they are to have any chance of speaking at all.

We recognise that many people do work on Sundays and that some others may wish to do so; but we believe that for retail opening to become the norm would be a major step towards destroying the social benefits of the traditional Sunday for most of the British people. We recognise the need for some shops to open; we recognise that some people regard shopping as a leisure activity; we recognise that others might wish to shop because of their other responsibilities at home and at work. On balance, however, we believe that Parliament should not throw out the baby of demonstrable social benefit to the majority with the bathwater of occasional inconvenience to a minority.

I turn briefly to employment policy, the second basis for our support. We are a major employer, but we support the trade unions who represent the Co-operative movement's employees when they say that the best protection shop workers can have against exploitation in regard to Sunday working is a legal one. We know that there are shopworkers who want to work on Sunday because they receive premium payments, but the overall position is that people would rather not work on Sunday. All of us know that premium payments are by no means universal, nor are they permanent. In a recent survey completed by the Institute of Retail Studies at the university of Stirling, it was found that indeed 30 per cent. of Sunday workers receive no premium payments. Extension of Sunday working in a low-paid work force must result in worsening conditions and wages. At the same time, premium rates in all industries will be threatened if Sunday increasingly becomes a "normal day".

Consumer policy is the third basis for our support. Sunday trading is of most commercial benefit to large private multiples that have been able to invest large capital sums in big stores, often in out-of-town locations. They will be the main beneficiaries of deregulated Sunday trading. The existing illegal trade shows how well placed they are to swallow the trade of smaller shops, more especially food and convenience shops. Retailers who lose out because of Sunday trading are those who do not have access to large investment funds—small traders and the co-operatives. The legal structure of co-operatives, which gives them their democratic practice and allows only a limited return on capital, also limits their access to equity capital. They are unable, for these reasons, to match the recent massive rights issues of the big food chains. There is no need here to spell out why small traders have problems about capital, nor why deregulation will totally deprive many small villages of their only shops.

There would be an argument to maintain diversity of size and legal structure in the retail industry, even if consumer interests were not involved. But they are involved. Co-ops and small shops give particular consumer service to small communities where there is no superstore because it could not make money, and also to a huge number of consumers, a high proportion of them elderly and disabled people, with no access to a car for a trip to the out-of-town retail park. They will suffer if local shops close down from Monday to Saturday because the non-local supermarket opens on Sunday.

The fourth basis of our support is law and order policy. Over the past few years, a growing number of large companies have decided blatantly to ignore the Shops Act 1950 and to open for business on Sundays. We are not concerned whether this was avoidance, or evasion, or finessing or flouting of the law. There is no escaping the reality that a number of large companies have traded illegally. Their conduct debases the law and demeans Parliament itself. The effect is that the law in general is brought into disrepute. The public reaction is that there is one law for the rich private multiples and another law for their poor consumers, who may buy illegally but must not shoplift from the law-breaking retailer—even on Sundays. How can parliamentarians, who make the law and work to uphold the rule of law by discouraging crime, possibly agree to a new Sunday trading law that would, by mass deregulation, serve only to reward transgressors by scrapping the law which they broke?

Of course, other traders have been in touch with me as well as my trading colleagues in the Co-operative movement. An enterprise which has two grocery stores in my constituency tells me in a recent letter:

"For staff, the possibility of unrestricted Sunday trading is extremely worrying.

[Mr. Morris]

> Quite simply, many if not all staff would be required to work at least occasionally on Sundays, possibly on a shift system. This would be offensive to their religious beliefs and disruptive of the social and family life of shop employees. While we would not attempt to force any dissenting employee to work on Sundays, there would almost certainly be perceived pressure on store staff to do so, despite any legislated protection. People in most other walks of life are not suddenly forced to give up their Sundays. Why should shop staff?"

The letter goes on:

> "The unemployment situation would be worsened further by the higher costs involved by Sunday trading in food retailing in particular. Finally, the small local self-employed High Street convenience stores, which currently survive on Sunday trading, would progressively be forced out of business, throwing whole families out of work."

This is one of many letters that I have had in support of the Bill. They demonstrate that the Bill is both worthy of and enjoys widespread approval in the country. Again I pay tribute to my hon. Friend and wish him all success in promoting what is a sensible and reformist Bill, whose enactment has become an urgent necessity.

Friday is often regarded as the "a" in etcetera of the parliamentary week. With my hon. Friend's Bill to debate, that is certainly not true of this week. He merits our highest regard and appreciation and that of everyone who is now prepared to challenge those who have treated the law of this country with studied contempt.

10.38 am

Dame Angela Rumbold (Mitcham and Morden): First, I congratulate the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) on promoting this private Member's Bill on what has undoubtedly been an exceedingly controversial topic for years. I am happy that he has done so because it is high time that the subject was debated in the House, where a broad set of views are represented which we can consider and determine when voting on his proposals.

I disagree with the Bill, not least because it is inconsistent and does not keep Sunday particularly special. The Bill seems to sanction Sunday shopping by trying to update the Shops Act 1950 and bring it into the 1990s.

As the predecessor of my hon. Friend the Minister of State, I spent much time talking to many people whose interests were almost entirely concentrated on ensuring that we change the Shops Act 1950. When I first approached the subject, I thought that we should try to stay within the existing framework and create as few changes as possible. I am a person who believes in as little change as possible, which is why I am a Conservative. I like to see things remain more or less as they are.

I studied the 1950 Act carefully. I looked at its provisions and wondered how they could be reshaped to suit today's circumstances. The first factor to strike me when I looked at the practice of shopping and retailing was that I could not compare the position in 1950 to that of the 1990s. It is as unlikely that we shall be able to compare what happens in the 1990s to what will happen in the year 2030.

If we produce a Bill that merely updates the Shops Act 1950—as I believe the Bill of the hon. Member for Ogmore does—it will not stand the test of time. The House should be in the business of enacting legislation that is both simple and lasting. I do not think that the hon. Gentleman's Bill will achieve those ends.

It is not just our shopping habits and the sort of goods that we purchase in today's economy that have changed, but there has been a dramatic change in our way of life. People's lifestyles today are different from those of 1950. We may regret that—part of me regrets it. It would be nice if things were much the same today as they were some years ago, but they are not. The economic realities of life mean that a substantial number of households no longer contain one person who stays at home and one person who works. They do not contain somebody who is available to carry out all the tasks within six days and devote himself of herself entirely to the family at home on Sunday.

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Greenwich): The right hon. Lady will recognise that the changes that she has described apply to other European countries? Will she explain how the French, Germans and Italians, who have experienced the same changes in social practices and economic factors as we have over the years, have been able to retain a Sunday without the commercialised opening of shops which she and her supporters appear to advocate in Britain?

Dame Angela Rumbold: I can explain that easily. I am a British citizen and part of the British legislature; I am interested only in what affects people in this country. I am not legislating for France, Germany, Italy or any other country, nor would I try to do so.

Mrs. Ann Winterton (Congleton): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Dame Angela Rumbold: No, I am sorry, but I shall not give way as I realise that many other hon. Members wish to participate in the debate.

I have set out why I believe that it would be enormously difficult to encapsulate all those factors simply by updating the Shops Act 1950, as the Bill does. I realise that we must make changes, but I want to keep them simple. I want simple changes to accomodate the needs of modern life. The simplest, most straightforward solution to the problem is deregulation, with protection for Sunday shop workers.

When I was a Minister and listened to debates on Sunday trading, I was forcefully struck by the fact that it would be difficult to persuade the House to accept total deregulation. I was pragmatic and realised that some concessions would have to be made to those people who wanted to restrict Sunday shopping.

We must consider carefully how to restrict Sunday trading. We could consider ways to restrict goods. We could decide to restrict certain goods from being sold on Sunday, but it would be almost impossible to make a durable list of items that could not be sold on Sunday. That is simply because, in 10 years' time, goods will have been invented that were not originally contained in the legislation. That would create anomalies, such as those that currently exist in the 1950 Act, which allows one to buy a Chinese takeaway, fried chicken and kebabs, but not fish and chips, which is nonsense.

If we rule out restricting what can be bought on Sundays, we could consider restricting where one can buy goods. The Bill tries to do that. It has been suggested that we could restrict the size of the premises from which goods may be bought on Sunday. We could restrict large hypermarkets and supermarkets from opening and allow to open only small corner shops, which people have, for many years, used by custom and practice. The hon. Gentleman's Bill also tries to do that, but we would create a mess if we tried to legislate for that.

We could allow all shops to open, but only within certain hours. Such restriction does work and is possible. If we restricted opening hours on Sunday, we would have to think carefully about whose businesses we should serve. Newsagents want to open first thing on Sunday morning as people like to read their newspapers with their breakfast. Chemists will have to open to provide medicines in the case of emergencies.

We could restrict commercial family activities on Sundays until after midday or 1 pm. We could ensure that everyone wanting to visit a garden centre or partake of similar activities would have to go in the morning, which would keep Sunday afternoon shopping-free. However, such regulation would not help in the case of licensed premises. People tend to drink alcohol on Sunday, as well as Saturday and Monday.

We would also have to consider new industries that have grown up, such as video shops, many of which would be forced to close down if they had to close after 2 pm on Sunday—that is a sad fact. I am not in hock to the video production industry, but I know that employees of its employees work on Sunday and a large number of people enjoy the opportunity to use video shops. We would have to build into the legislation provisions to cover such activities. If one wants the legislation to provide for exceptions, each one must be built into it. Over a period they will become untenable and the legislation will have to be amended.

Mr. Dicks: People who want to keep Sunday special for recreational activities often do not want professional recreational activities on Sunday, which is another anomaly. People who want to watch professional football or go to the races on their day of rest should be able to do so but it means that people will have to be employed at those events.

Dame Angela Rumbold: That is absolutely true—my hon. Friend makes a good point.

Another exceedingly worrying aspect involves those employed in the retail business, who may come under pressure to work seven days a week. I considered that subject carefully. Clearly, one must accept that a number of people in this country currently work on Saturday and Sunday. Like it or not, legions of women find working on Saturday more satisfactory and more beneficial to their family life. They work on Sunday so that their partners can participate in family life and be with the children. They also work on Sunday because the current economic circumstances—which have existed for some time—mean that it is important for women to contribute to the family finances. Are we to say that we will not allow such women to work on Sundays? The House should think seriously about that.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): The right hon. Lady's Government are busy trying to get rid of the wages councils, which are one of the few protections for low-paid women workers. Does she seriously suggest that women work on Sundays out of choice and not because they are driven to do so by appallingly low wages, which are still universal for the sort of jobs about which the right hon. Lady speaks?

Dame Angela Rumbold: It is obvious that the hon. Lady does not speak to the kind of people who come to speak to me about the importance of being able, if they choose, to work on Sundays. The hon. Lady might get a surprise if she spoke to some of those women because she would realise how important it is for them to have a choice.

Like it or not—and many do not—Sunday shopping has become a family activity. People like to go out as a family, even if only to the garden centre. Many people also enjoy Sunday shopping together. That is surprising to me because I intensely dislike shopping in a supermarket. I am greatly bothered by the notion of trying to restrict Sunday trading because many of the people—usually women, but occasionally men—who have to do the weekly shopping are forced by the restrictions to do it at the same time as everybody else. Many people have not experienced pushing a loaded supermarket trolley in a large crowd of people. People who work hard six days a week should not be told, perhaps by those who do not have to push loaded trolleys, that they will not be allowed to shop on Sunday. Such arrogance is unacceptable in this day and age.

It is no part of our work to restrict people's choice about when they should shop or their ability to work on days which many others might regard as unsocial; for some people such days and hours are a lifeline. I share some of the worries about making Sunday like Saturday or Monday, but I do not think that deregulation would cause that to happen. It does not necessarily follow that because shops are allowed to open they will. Apart from the times when they opened just before Christmat in the past two or three years or so, that has not been perceived generally to happen.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Dame Angela Rumbold: No, because I am coming to the end of my speech.

Mrs. Winterton: Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Dame Angela Rumbold: Yes.

Mrs. Winterton: It is generous of my right hon. Friend to give way towards the end of her speech, to which I am listening carefully. Does she agree that a totally deregulated Sunday allowing opening for even six hours a day would be a gamble as to whether the things that she mentions survived? She spoke in great detail about why, when she was in the Home Office, she had come to her conclusion that shops should be open for at least six hours. Why did she not have the courage of her convictions then to introduce such a measure?

Dame Angela Rumbold: As my hon. Friend knows, my career in the Home Office was, sadly, brought to an untimely end. I do not think that it is a gamble. We live in a reasonable and responsible society. We have to trust retailers and the British public to operate a voluntary code about how they behave on a Sunday as opposed to a Saturday, a Friday or a Monday. That is deeply built into the way of life in this country. I do not think that it would simply change overnight and it is somewhat hysterical of those who oppose that view to worry about it too much.

I share my hon. Friend's concerns about employee protection and it is important to establish that those currently in work should not be subjected to unreasonable pressure to work seven days a week when that is not their wish. It would be possible to establish a voluntary code of practice for retailers. However, it may not be possible, and on that issue alone I need to be reassured. That might be achieved by legislative protection to ensure that people could not be pressurised to work more than six days a week. I admire the hon. Member for Ogmore for introducing the Bill, but there is no way in which I will support it.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): The House is indebted to the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) for the adroit and humorous way in which he introduced his Bill on which we can base new laws. It commands support throughout the House, but it also has its opponents. I hope that it will be victorious.

I listened to the speech of the right hon. Member—I presume she is right hon.—for Mitcham and Morden (Dame A. Rumbold). Her time at the Home Office may have been brought to a premature conclusion, but it was not entirely clear from the exchange between the right hon. Lady and the hon. Member for Congleton (Mrs. Winterton) whether the right hon. Lady had been elevated to that title. I shall assume that she has.

The right hon. Lady gave a variety of reasons for being opposed to the measure. She said that the legislation would not last for eternity; but no legislation does and that is not a reason for voting against it. We regularly reform legislation: this is a reforming Parliament and, of course, no legislation is cast in concrete. Whatever the House decides on Sunday trading, I should be surprised if in 40 years' time we did not consider the issues again.

The right hon. Lady said that many of the changes in this country had not been for the good of our nation. Many of us agree when we look at the social ecology and at many of the things happening in our land. An estimated 1 million elderly people do not see a friend, relative or neighbour in an average week. One in three marriages end in divorce and the breakdown of family life, and there has been a great rise in criminality.

I agree that many of the changes in our society are not for the better, but that is another reason not for being defeatist, but for recognising that those are challenges and that we must do all that we can to enshrine family and community life and the values which, on other occasions, the right hon. Lady would certainly espouse. We must examine legislation with a view to seeing how we can keep relationships together and give people time together.

The right hon. Lady said that because we are British we do not need to take any notice of what is happening elsewhere in Europe. Given that we are making slow progress on another Bill, most people agree that that argument does not stand up.

Dame Angela Rumbold: I did not say what the hon. Gentleman says I said about this country. I said that I am in the British legislature trying to influence legislation for this country and for our people. That is my main point. Therefore, I do not need to take into account what happens in other countries.

Mr. Alton: That is a reversal of arguments that have been advanced in debates over the past few days. Ironically, the hon. Member for Congleton, who intervened in the speech of the right hon. Member for Mitcham and Morden, and the right hon. Lady would find themselves in different Lobbies in Divisions on the other legislation. It is slightly paradoxical for Europe to be quoted in this way.

Every other European Community country has been able to enshrine in its statutes legislation to safeguard their workers and Sundays—and I shall return to that point in my speech. It is not impossible for us to do the same in Britain. We do not have to do what everybody else does, but it is absurd to suggest that it is not possible to legislate in that way because we are British and somehow do not have the same capacity as our friends across the channel to introduce safeguards.

The right hon. Lady also said that there were anomalies in the Bill. The hon. Member for Ogmore has already generously stated that in Committee he will listen to the arguments and that, to use his words, he will be reasonable and pragmatic when considering any anomalies and any concerns that are raised then.

It is an interesting new theory that no legislation to be presented to the House in future by any Government will contain no anomalies. Many of us will be relieved to know that that will be the case. We were also told that registration might be too complicated. That will come as good news to everybody who has to pay value added tax. Presumably, therefore, VAT will be abolished. Why bother to register for elections? It is very complicated. People cannot put their minds to it. The whole House knows that these are pretty implausible arguments. All that came from the right hon. Member for Mitcham and Morden, who was responsible for trying impartially to change our laws. It is no wonder that so many of us were suspicious of her when she was in her former post.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (Colchester, North): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the Bill would require a large number of small businesses to register the nature of their turnover in a way that they probably do not even record at present? At a time when we are trying to lift the burdens on small businesses, is not that just what we ought not to be doing?

Mr. Alton: There are 200,000 small retailers in this country, many of whom will be forced out of business unless we ensure that the hypermarkets and supermarkets are unable to trade on Sundays, thus forcing them out of business. To suggest that it would be beyond the wit of a small retailer to fill in a registration form if he wished to trade on Sunday is absurd.

Mr. John Marshall: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Alton: No, not at the moment. I have given way on a number of occasions already.

The right hon. Lady referred to the question of choice. She said that choice should be elevated to the position of a religion or a philosophy. It was the Chief Rabbi, Jonathan Sacks, who, in his recent excellent book "The Persistence of Faith", said that the word "choice" comes from the same Greek root as the word "herasis". It may be that the word "choice" could be regarded today as a modern heresy: that it is my right to do whatever I want, regardless of the consequences. Choices are invariably made at other people's expense. Nowhere is that more likely to be the case than here. As the right hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Alison) said earlier today, there are plenty of opportunities for shopping. In the average retail week, 51 hours are available for shopping, so there are plenty of choices already.

It is worth recalling that, when we last considered this issue in 1986, a cross-party coalition in Parliament said that it did not want Sunday to be deregulated. It was the only time during that 13-year period that the Government were defeated on a whipped vote. But did they give up? No. They continued to come back to the House to try to find ways around it.

The story line has constantly changed. We were told to wait for the decision of the European Court; but it came out in favour of keeping Sunday special. No longer, therefore, were we told to wait for the decision of the European Court. We were then told to turn a blind eye to anyone who broke the law. That was said by people who on other occasions tell us that they belong to the party of law and order. That is no example to set to people in our cities and communities who are becoming more and more lawless.

The Home Secretary now offers us his well-known three-card trick. That is through the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Bill: if there are many different options, he will eventually get what he wants because people will be so confused. I have news for the House: I do not believe that that will happen.

If we had the Home Office's preferred option, which is riven with anomalies and confusion, we could end up with no legislation whatsoever, with no reform of the Shops Act 1950. That is why it is so good that the hon. Member for Ogmore has provided us with this practical alternative. It is not based on the principle of he who pays the piper calls the tune. It is based upon his experience of working with shop workers throughout the land who are entitled to protection, a view which has cross-party support in the House because it provides the best means of ensuring that Sunday is not turned into yet another Saturday.

As the European Court has recognised, workers are entitled to a common day off to be used for family and community activities, including time to go to church. Sundays also guarantee equilibrium and stability in busy and pressurised lives by balancing stressful work with time for leisure and recreation. By limiting retail activity on Sundays, we also protect shop workers and those employed in ancillary services from pressure to work unusual hours. For close on 1,000 years, Britain has had laws regulating commercial activity on Sunday, so it is not an impossibility. We have done it for nearly 1,000 years. It was Churchill who once said that our most prized institution is Sunday. He spoke wisely when he used those words. We should remember them today.

As the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) mentioned earlier, safeguards are enshrined in the German constitution. If one looks at the effects on the German economy, one can see that those safeguards have not caused economic chaos or the disintegration of the German economy. It may be the secret of Germany's success—the recognition that workers need time off, that their rights should be enshrined in the constitution and that they should be accorded dignity and respect.

Shop workers are already in a low-paid and vulnerable sector of the economy, for 70 per cent. of retail companies pay their workers less than £3·50 an hour. There is pressure, as we heard from the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), for even further deregulation in that respect. Shop workers who refuse to work unsocial hours will not get jobs; they will not be employed; they will not be promoted; they will be the first to be given redundancy notices. Deregulation will lead to inescapable pressure, particularly on women, to work on a day that they would prefer to spend with their families and children.

There is also the problem that faces people who live alongside shopping areas. Only a week ago residents in the Allerton road area of Liverpool came to see me at my advice centre to tell me about the problems that they are experiencing because Woolworths had decided to open its shop there on Sundays. That has led, in the streets of little terraced houses adjacent to that store, to early-morning deliveries, to car doors being banged, and to the roads being congested with parked cars. Even on the one day that they did not have to suffer that commercial activity, they now have to put up with the bustle of hectic business and the consequntial noise, hassle and stress. Most absurdly, of all, no extra money for shopping is available, anyway. If the advocates of Sunday secularisation could only see beyond their greed, they might realise that the financial gain will be negligible.

There is one more reason why I shall support the Bill. In a country where a crime is committed every two seconds and where one in three families experience divorce and the breakdown of family life, the Government are presumably concerned about the reasons for our chronic social maladies. Many of our problems stem from the inadequate time spent together by families. There is no substitute for parental interest, guidance and support. If the Home Secretary gets his way, many children and young people, to say nothing of the elderly relatives who enjoy a Sunday visit, will have even less time spent upon them in future. The social costs far outweigh any supposed advantages of unlimited shopping free for alls.

The Bill protects workers and family and community life. It recognises the basic human need that we all have for unpressurised time for leisure and recreation. It rightly takes a stand against the cult of materialism and the sheer greed that motivates so many other decisions that are taken today. The Home Secretary has made his position clear: a totally secularised, deregulated Sunday. Therefore, I am glad that we are in a position to ask someone else, who is opposed to that objective, to steer through the House a Bill that reflects the will of Parliament as it was expressed in our last vote on the issue.

It is for those reasons that I hope that we shall give the Bill a Second Reading today.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): For me, Friday mornings are very precious indeed—second only in importance to Sundays—because, like most north-western hon. Members, I like to be at home, in my case in Lancaster, on Fridays. I am here only because I regard the Bill as absolutely essential to the maintenance of family life.

My favourite occupation on Fridays, come what may, is to go around—we are lucky to have it—our covered shopping market. It is an old Victorian market which, sadly, was devastated by fire, but nevertheless it survives. I wander around the aisles of that lovely old market, do my shopping and natter to people. I vividly remember the previous time when the matter of Sunday trading was before the House. I saw a highly respected confectioner rushing around the market like a steam engine. I said to her, "Mrs."—I will not reveal her name—"what on earth are you doing? I have never seen you go around so fast." "Ooh," she said, "it's my birthday tomorrow, and if the Bill to deregulate Sunday goes through, it will be the last Sunday that our family will ever be able to spend together, because at least one of us will have to be on duty." That business is a family-run concern. That is concrete example of what will happen throughout the land.

I also represent a delightful country area. We are dependent on two things: our schools, which thankfully we have managed, with something of a battle, to maintain, and our village shops. These would be substantially threatened if we allowed the deregulation of Sunday and did not preserve Sunday by this Bill which strikes an admirable balance. I am proud to say that I admire the promoter of the Bill, the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell), for saying that he is willing to consider clearing up any uncertain matters in Committee, for example in relation to garden centres.

Whether you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, are bringing up a family—I have a rather hefty sized family—or attempting to keep law and order in the Chamber, which is by no means an easy job, or keeping law and order in the country, your prime duty is not to give in to law breakers. One does not give biscuits to a bad child. You, Mr. Deputy Speaker, should not call an hon. Member who is obstreperous—that includes me—and the Government should certainly not reward large, wealthy retail chains by scrapping the law that they have so flagrantly violated for the perfectly simple reason that they can afford the fines.

I am in favour of law and order, I am in favour of family life and I am very much in favour of the Bill.

Ms. Janet Anderson (Rossendale and Darwen): Thank you for calling me, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Whatever our views on Sunday trading, many hon. Members are grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell), who, by pursuing his private Member's Bill has at least given us an opportunity to have this debate—an opportunity which has so far been denied us by the Government, despite the Home Secretary's statement to the House on 26 November, when he declared his determination "to settle the vexed question of the reform of the law on Sunday trading in England and Wales."—[Official Report, 26 November 1992; Vol. 214, c. 997.]

My hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore has brought forward his Bill in a genuine and honest attempt to sort out the current mess and confusion over Sunday trading. My hon. Friend declared his interest. I should like to declare my long-term interest in this matter. Before I entered the House, when I was a prospective parliamentary candidate, I worked in my constituency as the northern region organiser for the Shopping Hours Reform Council.
